"First, although significant progress has been and will be made through NSF—supported research programs, the lack of special experimental and computational facilities make too difficult to pursue research in specialized building types such as masonry and concrete structures. At the present time, some of these opportunities are being pursued through cooperative programs with countries which have developed more adequate and modern facilities, especially Japan. These projects have been of great value, but as the recently published report on U.S. earthquake engineering facilities by the National Research Council states: 'A cooperative Japanese-American research/test program using the Japanese facilities will not meet the mission-oriented earthquake engineering needs of the United States. The Japanese use different construction and design techniques than are used in the United States. Because of the remoteness of the Japanese facilities, their use is constrained by the cost and time associated with carrying out American experiments and tests. Also, in the view of many there are significant language communication problems that perhaps can be minimized. Finally, there are serious problems in gaining access to the Japanese test facilities—particularly their large shaking table, because the Japanese already have the table heavily scheduled for several years into the future.'"

The facility created according to the guidelines of my bill would have just this sort of shaking table, which would be used for research relevant to American conditions and needs.

Following are excerpts from the NEHRP's report which detail the improvements that must be made in seismic engineering.

Substantial research is still needed in some major earthquake engineering areas. The response to seismic loads of the total structural system, of subassemblies, of nonstructural and architectural features, of foundations and their interaction with different soils must be continuously analyzed and reexamined in the light of experimental data and new technology. The results of these efforts need to be disseminated to users as quickly as possible so they will find their way into design practices.

Under the objective of fundamental and applied research to be carried out within the 5-year plan, work is organized into five broad research tasks, as follows:

1. Soil Dynamics and Earth Structures; 2. Ground Motions, Tsunamis, and Lifelines; 3. Dynamic Structural Analysis; 4. Dynamic Structural Experimentation; 5. Architecture and Planning.

Research efforts in the third, fourth and fifth tasks will be enhanced by the passage of my bill. Those who indirectly pay the targeted tax, the purchasers of elevators and escalators, would derive most benefit from research in these areas. A brief description of these tasks follows, beginning with structural analysis:

Understanding the behaviour of existing structures, or predicting the probable behavior of new ones, requires that an adequate mathematical basis be available to formulate deterministic and probabilistic methods. This also requires that loadings (which may include local geological and geotechnical effects) can be expressed in forms suitable for analysis and that computational methods, equipment and software are available. It is also necessary that data become available from material and laboratory tests of small components through full-scale structures, and from observations of the actual behaviour of structures. With these data, parameters are available for analysis, and analytical and computational approaches can be verified and improved.

Dynamic and static structural testing is closely related to the above task.

The data developed from task 4, experimental investigations, are * * * used to verify analytical procedures (task 3) and field practices, and to explore innovative concepts of design and construction.

As suggested by a 1969 report by the National Academy of Sciences, the goal of this effort is to determine the strength, stiffness, ductility, and deformation of structural components, and to compare the properties actually measured with the predictions from the analytical procedures.

Experimental studies may take various forms, depending upon the method of testing selected for a particular structural system. The ultimate test is an actual earthquake. There are several testing techniques available to simulate the effect of ground shaking under controlled conditions.

Research has only started on the broad topic of vulnerability of urban areas to major earthquakes. The (urban) planner is not so much concerned with damage to individual sites and buildings as with entire urban areas. Problems which need to be addressed include anticipated distribution and magnitude of damage, physical arrangements of buildings and land uses to property damage and loss of life, resiliency of urban forms to interruptions in economic functions and social fabric, and guideline development to minimize the consequences of major earthquakes.

Given that our seismologists predict that over the next three decades there is a better than even chance of a major earthquake occurring in California, an area relatively well prepared, and a strong possibility of an equally devastating quake occurring in the unprepared Midwest, I feel that these research efforts deserve the highest priority.●

STUDENT LOAN COLLECTION IMPROVEMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation, titled the Student Loan Collection Improvement Amendments of 1985. The purpose of this legislation is to reduce defaults and improve collections within the National Direct Student Loan [NDSL] and Guaranteed Student Loan [GSL] Programs, authorized under the Higher Education Act.

Over the past 20 years, the NDSL and GSL Programs have provided billions of dollars in student loans, opening the door to educational opportunity for millions of students. Most student borrowers have honored the terms of their loans and have paid them back in full or are currently in active repayment.

However, the default rate in the NDSL Program currently stands at 14.9 percent with $1.044 billion in defaults. The GSL Program carries a default rate of 4.8 percent with $1.1 billion in defaults; $2.3 billion is a significant sum. Every effort should be made to recover these funds and put the money back where it belongs—into new student aid.

The Department of Education has requested that statutory changes be made to the Higher Education Act to help improve the collection effort. These changes would strengthen provisions under current law to aid the Department, postsecondary institutions, and State guarantee agencies in their collection efforts.

The bill I am introducing on behalf of the administration would help improve collection efforts in the following ways:

First, loan checks would be made payable to both the borrower and the postsecondary institution—except in cases of parent borrowers.

Second, NDSL defaults would become liable for a certain amount of the costs borne by the Federal Government in trying to collect on defaulted loans.

Third, State guarantee agencies in the GSL Program would be required to report borrower default status information to consumer credit bureaus, currently, the Department of Education has this authority but the State guarantee agencies now handle the bulk of student loans.

Fourth, responsibility for the collections of defaulted NDSL's would be transferred from the postsecondary institution to the Department of Education in instances where institutions have a consistently poor collection record.

Fifth, the Federal statute of limitations—6 years—would be applied to GSL and NDSL defaults and recoveries of overpayments on other aid whenever an otherwise prevailing State statute provides a shorter time on the student's liability.

Sixth, eligibility requirements for Federal student aid would be broadened to provide that any student in default on a loan or owing a refund on a grant would not be eligible for further Federal aid. Current law applies this limitation to students applying for aid at an institution at which they are already in default or owe a refund, but does not prevent students in default from applying for aid at other schools.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this much-needed set of reforms to our student loan programs. We are working to preserve Federal student aid. However, in light of our current budget deficit and the severe funding crisis educational programs are experiencing, these programs cannot, and should not, be abused. Please join me in helping to keep student aid both equitable and economic.●

DR. EDGAR NELSON HONORED

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a truly great man, Dr. Edgar Nelson. On May 4, 1985, Dr. Nelson will be retiring as pastor of the First United Methodist Church in Yuba City, CA, after some 43 years in the ministry.

To the people of the Yuba/Sutter area, Dr. Nelson has been the embodiment of Christian goodwill and charity. Through his tireless efforts, he has been able to touch the lives of literally thousands of people all over the world, as well as in his own community.

Dr. Nelson started out as an associate pastor at Pioneer Memorial United Methodist Church in Oakland in 1943. In subsequent years he served congregations at Del Ray United Methodist Church, Sonora United Methodist Church, St. Paul's United Methodist Church in San Jose, and the Mill Valley United Methodist Church. In 1961 he was appointed senior minister to the Yuba City United Methodist Church where he has remained.

Among his many accomplishments, Dr. Nelson was one of the original supporters of the Faith Christian School, a nondenominational Christian school serving the Yuba-Sutter area. He has been a long-time supporter of the Asbury Seminary and has served, for over 40 years, as dean of Redwood Christian Park. Dr. Nelson has also dedicated his efforts to the California Council on Alcohol Problems and has been a noted spokesman on a variety of social problems in California.

One of Dr. Nelson's major priorities has always been missions. His leadership has helped the congregation of the Yuba City United Methodist Church to greatly increase their participation in mission work. His mission work has taken him all over the world and gained him the respect and admiration of many missionaries including Dr. Frank Laubach, a leader in world literacy work, Bishop Washow Pickett of India and Bishop Ralph Dodge of Africa.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most impressive things about Dr. Nelson is that, despite all of his accomplishments, he still sees himself as first and foremost a pastor. One of his favorite passages of scripture, Psalm 37:4, clearly expresses the nature of this man. "Delight thyself also in the Lord; and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart; . . ."

To Dr. Nelson I can only say thank you. He has truly shown himself to be a man who delights himself in the Lord and has never been ashamed of the Gospel of Christ which he shares with the world. While Dr. Nelson is retiring, this will not stop him from continuing on with his lifelong mission. For this we are blessed and most eternally grateful.●

TAMING THE TRADE DEFICIT, THE WAL-MART WAY

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, there is no question that our trade deficits have been of concern to all of us. And while we, in Congress, hope for voluntary import restraint agreements, and discuss quotas, surcharge taxes, and various other retaliatory mechanisms, a constituent of mine in the Third District of Arkansas has undertaken his own campaign to aid in balancing the trade deficit and putting Americans back to work.

Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., and its chairman, Sam Walton, have launched their own "Buy American" campaign in an effort to prove that American manufacturers can make merchandise that can be sold on a competitive basis with the same quality and value as products made overseas.

While Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., had its beginnings in the smalltown variety store business in 1945, when Sam Walton opened his first Ben Franklin franchise operation in Newport, AR, the company did not open its first discount department store until November 1962. In 1984, and 753 stores later, with sales of $4.7 billion (up from $3.4 billion a year ago), and earnings of $196 million (up from $124 million the prior year), Wal-Mart has remained the fastest growing retailer in the country as it has been in the past several years. During the last 10 years, the company's compound annual rate of growth has been 39 percent in sales and 47 percent in profitability. To the company's credit, buying smart has played a large part in Wal-Mart's success formula.

Realizing the serious threat that our international trade deficit is to our country's free enterprise system, as well as to the very existence of certain basic industries in our country, Wal-Mart has committed itself to the philosophy of buying everything possible from suppliers who manufacture their products in the United States.

While Wal-Mart is ready to offer its suppliers and manufacturers in the United States the same advantages provided to overseas vendors, such as providing longer lead times for placing orders and quicker payments, American vendors must in turn commit to improving facilities and machinery, to remain financially conservative, and most importantly, strive to improve employee productivity. With this cooperation, Wal-Mart believes that we can restore our manufacturing capacity, improve our national economy, and renew our pride in American craftsmanship.

This is not an idle philosophy. Wal-Mart has already experienced some success in working with American manufacturers on bringing production back home. For example, 3 years ago, the company imported all of their dress shirts from Taiwan and Korea; this year, 40 percent of these shirts will be produced in the United States in a 20-State territory. This percentage is expected to increase substantially this year. Wal-Mart has also made a commitment to a Fort Smith, AR, furniture manufacturer, which is likely to save not only the plant, but some 50 jobs.

Most recently, the company found that men's flannel shirts could be produced on a surprisingly competitive basis in the United States. Wal-Mart has entered into a $600,000 contract with a small manufacturer for 240,000 flannel shirts—one-tenth of what the company anticipates it will sell next winter. To help the manufacturer be price-competitive, Wal-Mart also helped locate and finance the flannel material it needed to meet the contract.

I am submitting for the RECORD, an article from the April 21 Washington Post which describes in detail Wal-Mart's "Buy American" campaign. Hopefully, the effort of one company will encourage other businessmen to seek American-made products and save American jobs.

WAL-MART FLYS THE FLAG IN IMPORT BATTLE—PRODS U.S. PRODUCERS WITH FAVORABLE TERMS

(By Caroline E. Mayer, Washington Post Staff Writer)

Late last year, Sam Walton, the chairman of Wal-Mart Stores Inc., gave his merchandise buyers an order: Think of a product that American manufacturers have given up on because of competition from cheaper imports.

An apparel buyer suggested inexpensive flannel shirts, virtually all of which are now made outside the United States.

Today, the 753-store discount chain has a $600,000 contract with a small Brinkley, Ark., manufacturer for 240,000 flannel shirts—one-tenth of what the company anticipates it will sell next winter.

"We've set out to prove that American manufacturers can make merchandise we well on a competitive basis with the same quality and value as products made overseas," said David D. Glass, president of Wal-Mart, one of the nation's fastest-growing and most successful discount chains, second to K mart Corp. in size.

"As a company, we are tremendously concerned with the trade deficit," Glass said. "We see a tremendous erosion of manufacturing jobs in this country as manufacturers accelerate the movement to go offshore to make their goods. None of us will believe what this country will be like five to 10 years from now if we continue to let this happen."

Between 1981 and 1984, an estimated 1.6 million American jobs were lost to imports, Walton recently pointed out in a letter to his suppliers. "In one year [1983 to 1984], non-oil-related imports grew $70 billion, an increase of 33 percent. The trade deficit reached $123.3 billion, an increase of 78 percent. Something can and must be done to reverse this very serious threat to our free enterprise system and our great country" he wrote.

Now Walton wants to try to turn the tide. Last month the company officially launched a novel and ambitious Buy-American campaign to prod domestic manufacturers to produce more goods at home. Last year the company purchased about 5 percent of its goods from Foreign manufacturers. This year, Walton said he hopes to reduce that to 4 percent through his campaign, with further reductions in the years ahead.

By offering unusually favorable terms—including longer lead times and more advantageous financial agreements—Wal-Mart hopes to prove that American manufacturers can make quality products that will match or beat the prices of imported goods.

"We are willing to work with the domestic manufacturers to a greater extent than we have done before," Glass said.

Also, Wal-Mart is willing to lower its margins to sell the goods at a competitive price, Walton said. "We are asking our manufacturers to lower their margins; in turn, we will lower ours."

However, Walton contended that profitability for the company—which earned $240 million last year on sales of $6 billion—should improve because it will force the company to make better buys. Perhaps even more significantly, the campaign will be promoted in Wal-Mart's stores, creating more "enthusiastic and appreciative customers," Walton noted.

The contract for flannel shirts with Farris Fashions Inc. is the first test of Wal-Mart's resolve.

To help Farris Fashions Inc. be price-competitive, Wal-Mart has helped locate and finance the flannel material it needed to meet the contract. "Without Wal-Mart's help, I would have given up on the project long ago," noted Farris' president, Farris Burroughs. "I kept beating my head to find piece goods and financing," he said, noting that he had called every textile manufacturer he knew, unsuccessfully looking for material. Ultimately, Wal-Mart called manufacturers to find goods and promised favorable financing terms for the goods to help Farris get a start.

Additionally, Wal-Mart "has agreed to pay us a little quicker than normal," Burroughs said,

"If I didn't have that work, I'd be hard pressed to keep my 100 employes busy," said Burroughs. "Without that contract, I'd be out beating the bushes. And with business now very slow in the shirt and blouse business, those bushes are almost all beat out."

Wal-Mart didn't have to make these arrangements, Burroughs said. "People are beating down Wal-Mart's doors to sell them goods," he asserted. "All Mr. Walton has to do is to say 'give me so many dozen,' He doesn't need to worry about" where his goods are being manufactured.

Yet he said Walton does have a direct interest in the import problem: A lot of the Americans who are losing jobs as a result of import competition are Wal-Mart customers.

"If his people are not working, they can't be buying anything. It's as simple as that," Burroughs noted.

Wal-Mart's campaign comes at the same time other major retailers are pressing the federal government to relax its import quotas on apparel. The retailers argue that the quotas hurt consumers by restricting the amount of lower-priced foreign-made goods, while raising the price of those goods that do reach this country.

"We're swimming upstream," Glass said.

Wal-Mart's Buy-American campaign was launched in a letter Walton sent to his major supplier last month. To date, it has resulted in about half a dozen new contracts with American manufacturers, some of which already had been producing goods for Wal-Mart's stores. Most of the contracts are for work at plants in Wal-Mart's selling area in the South.

Julie Girl—which has four plants in the Southeast—has been making ladies sportswear and loungewear for Wal-Mart for the past 13 years. But under the Buy-American campaign, the company has entered into new agreements that, among other things, give Julie Girl more time to meet Wal-Mart's orders.

"Normally, big retailers go overseas and commit their orders a year in advance and then come back here and domestically place their orders closer to their needs," explained Louis Perlman, president of Julie Girl. "Wal-Mart is now making their commitments to us about the same time they make their commitments overseas. The longer lead time enables us to make better deals with domestic piece-good mills. It also gives us better production planning and allows us to become more efficient in our plants, thereby lowering our overhead and our costs."

The new Wal-Mart contracts will create about 200 more jobs for Julie Girl, Perlman said. At the same time, he added, it may have a snowball effect on Julie Girl's suppliers as they, too, are given a longer lead time in filling the manufacturer's orders.

Wal-Mart's Buy-American drive comes at a good time, noted Robert Welsh, president of Capital Mercury Shirt Corp., which has been one of Wal-Mart's longtime suppliers.

"A year ago, two years ago, even three years ago, it wouldn't be the right time because the prices overseas were very depressed," Welsh said, Today, higher labor costs and the quotas are pushing overseas prices up, "making it feasible for American manufacturers to be within striking distance," he said.

As a result of Wal-Mart's drive, Capital Mercury, which makes many of its men's shirts outside the United States, decided to bring some production back to this country and even expanded some of its facilities in the hope that Wal-Mart's efforts will prod other retailers also to buy from domestic shirt makers.

"With Wal-Mart's advanced commitments as the nucleus of the Buy-American program, we believe we will now be able, on certain items, to equal or beat the offshore manufacturers—but not for all items," Welsh said.

Wal-Mart's drive goes beyond apparel. It also has entered into contracts to buy American-made electric fans and bicycles, and it has signed a $469,000 contract with a Ft. Smith Ark., manufacturer of casual furniture to make outdoor stacking chairs that will be sold for about $15 each. Wal-Mart had been importing the chairs from Taiwan.

"They've elected to give us the same arrangements they make overseas," said Don Flanders, chairman of Flanders Industries, a company with 100 employes and sales of $7 million a year. "They will make their commitments further ahead and they will pay us faster."

Typically, retailers agree to pay domestic manufacturers 30 days after an order is shipped, while they pay offshore producers at the time it is shipped, Flanders noted. By agreeing to pay Flanders when the chairs are shipped, Wal-Mart is enabling the company to produce the chairs "at least of a competitive disadvantage than an offshore firm." At the same time, the contract has created about 30 more jobs a year, Flanders said.

Until Wal-Mart offered to grant these favorable terms, Flanders said he would not have been able to include them in any of his contracts—even through they are standard provisions for his foreign counterparts.

"There are too many domestic manufacturers who compete with us that are not willing to make demands so they could get the business." Flanders said. "Only if we all went together and said, 'No, we won't do this unless you agree to this', would it work—and that's against the law."

Not all manufacturers are enthusiastic about Wal-Mart's drive.

"One of the disappointing things is when a manufacturer says he doesn't want to participate," Glass said, "Some manufacturers who produce many of their goods offshore say 'why should I have the headaches managing people and running a plant? I'd rather contract offshore and have the goods manufactured by someone else.' "

The Buy-American drive is "more work," Glass acknowledged. "You have to work with a manufacturer—meet with him and visit his plant to inspect it for quality control. But we do it abroad."

The campaign is also a gamble, Glass noted. "Retailers are generally reluctant to commit to longer lead times to guard against economic downturns or changes in fashion. So we are taking some risks. . . .

"It is not a quick fix. Down the road, we may get to the point where we feel we are beating our head against the wall because, by ourselves, we won't make a difference."

Yet manufacturers say Wal-Mart's drive already is beginning to have an impact.

"We're getting rumblings from other retailers," said Capital Mercury's Welsh. "They won't let Mr. Walton steal the march on them because it's going to catch them."

One of the interested retailers is Wal-Mart's midwestern rival, Venture Stores, a 60-store discount chain owned by the May Co.

"Mr. Walton is absolutely right," said Julian M. Seeherman, Venture's chief executive officer. Buy-American "is the kind of statement we've been making but not getting publicity on," he added plaintively. Nonetheless, he said, Venture is contacting some of the same manufacturers Wal-Mart is doing new business with—and its own suppliers as well.

"We would be willing to help these people," he said. "One way would be to give them a guaranteed order before they buy the first dollar's worth of material."

In addition to retailers, some of the manufacturers also are receiving inquiries from outside investors.

"A New York financier called me to say he would like to get involved in helping me finance my purchases of raw material," said Farris' Burroughs.

So far, Wal-Mart's agreements have been relatively small, considering its annual purchases amount to $8.5 billion a year, noted Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, who has played an active role in Wal-Mart's campaign, partly because Wal-Mart is based in his state and partly because of the state's high unemployment rate. Among other things, Clinton was instrumental in linking Wal-Mart with Farris.

"I think this will take off. But it will have to have a slow start—because they need successes at the beginning," Clinton said.

Glass, Wal-Mart's president, said, "We don't think we're going to make a major influence in changing the trade balance in the country, but someone has to start."●

PORTUGUESE AMERICAN SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, April 27, the Portuguese-American Scholarship Foundation will hold its annual dinner in Newark. At this event, a very special individual will be honored, and it is my privilege to pay tribute to him today.

Armando B. Fontoura is an individual whose service to the community transcends both his professional and private life.

A native of Tras dos Montes, Vilar de Perdizes, Portugal, he is a hard worker and strong supporter of programs that benefit Newark and New Jersey's Portuguese-American community.

He is a charter member of the Portuguese American Scholarship foundation, having been with the organization since its inception in 1967, and is very active in its fund raising programs.

A graduate of the FBI National Academy in Washington, DC, he has been a member of the Newark Police Department since 1967. He is dedicated to protecting the health and safety of city residents and to upholding the public peace. He has been cited for bravery or exceptional duty on 11 occasions.

Lieutenant Fontoura currently is an administrative assistant to the police director. He is responsible for helping to develop public policy and for issuing directives. He also serves as public information officer for the department, and in this role, he often is called on by both local and national press to answer questions pertinent to department activities and policies.

During his tenure on the force, Mr. Fontoura served as project director of the victim service center and the sex assault and rape analysis [S.A.R.A.] units. In these sensitive positions, he played an important part in ensuring that crime victims were treated in a dignified, humane and effective manner.

In addition to his law enforcement career, Mr. Fontoura has been a teacher at Lafayette Street School and Essex County College. He currently serves as a security consultant to Broad National Bank.

Despite the demands of his official duties, he still devotes considerable time to volunteer activities that better the community, and has received considerable recognition and numerous awards for his efforts.

During the last 10 years, Mr. Fontoura has organized softball games between the Newark Police Department and such organizations as the CBS-TV All Stars, which raised more than $40,000 for the fresh air fund.

He is a board member and former vice president of the Essex County Mental Health Association, and is in his second 5-year term as a member of the Newark Human Rights Commission. He is also a former town chairperson of the American Cancer Society annual fund raiser.

Currently, he is serving his second term as president of the Police Management Association, an international organization of law enforcement managers, based in Washington DC, and was recently appointed to the St. James Hospital's Advisory Board, and named chairman of its community relations committee. He is a founder and cochairperson of the Portuguese-American Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I offer my best wishes to Mr. Fontoura on this very special award. I also send my personal greetings to Mr. Fred Perry, president of the Portuguese American Scholarship Foundation and to all my good friends who are part of this fine organization.●

SAM HOUSTON AND SAN JACINTO DAY APRIL 22, 1985

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was San Jacinto Day in Texas, one of the most revered days in the history of the Lone Star State. The story of San Jacinto and the glory of one of the great immortal Texas heroes, Sam Houston, are inextricably and forever linked.

In his book, "Reflections of a Public Man," Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT recalls Sam Houston and that immortal day in 1836 when Texas won its independence on the battlefield of San Jacinto. I think it's appropriate to repeat the story of Sam Houston and San Jacinto to the House today. I read from JIM WRIGHT'S book now:

Sam Houston, a hero of Texas Independence, was as unorthodox as a beer party in church. He also could be as unexpectedly devout as a prayer in a saloon.

The conventional moralist can find a lot wrong in the life of Sam Houston. Like everything else about this remarkable giant, his shortcomings were king-sized. He swore profanely, so much so that the Mexicans referred to him as "Senor God Damn." He drank copiously, seemed at one point on the verge of drowning his future in alcohol, and earned among the Cherokees the sobriquet of "Big Drunk."

Mentioned prominently in his mid-thirties as a possible candidate for the Presidency, Houston threw away a promising political career and resigned the governorship of Tennessee under a cloud of suspicion which to this day has never been cleared up.

He married three times, once without the benefit of clergy unless you count Cherokee tribal customs. He fought duels in violation of the law and on one occasion was officially censured by the U.S. House of Representatives for thrashing a member on a public street.

But Sam Houston had one redeeming virtue: If his faults were bigger than lifesize, so was his faith. If his crudeness was colossal, so was his basic integrity.

The structure of his life could withstand numerous flaws in exterior design because it was upheld by two steel girders: an abiding faith in God and a deep sense of personal honor.

Sam Houston strode into the pages of enduring history on April 21, 1836. He was 43 and, at that point in life, a celebrated failure.

On that day, under Houston's command a hastily assembled and only partially trained contingent of fewer than 800 volunteers routed and put to flight the flower and elite of a military empire led by a self-confessed military genius who called himself the Napoleon of the West.

That victory is worthy of our contemplation today, not alone because of its historic consequences, but because its lesson is as timely as tomorrow's headlines.

The early Texans, who had come to the new frontier to establish peaceful colonies, had found promises of civil liberties and representative government cynically betrayed by the Mexican dictator, Santa Anna.

So certain was their determination for liberty that the Texans, though they were only a handful, met in a crude, unfinished building and formally declared their independence. So uncompromising was their hostility to enslavement that the entire complement of 182 men defending the Alamo under Travis against a siege of perhaps 3,000 troops openly rejected surrender and knowingly elected to die on their feet rather than live on their knees—a dramatic choice without parallel in the history of heroism.

It was against this backdrop that Sam Houston's little band crossed Buffalo Bayou into the San Jacinto prairie over which was to hang the acrid smell of gunpowder and the stench of death. General Houston paused before entering the battleground and spoke briefly and simply to his ragtag followers. He offered them a choice:

"If there are any here who shrink from the issue they need not cross the bayou. Some perish, but victory is as certain as God reigns. Trust in the God of the just and fear not."

They crossed. Houston ordered the bridge behind them burned to seal off retreat, and the unequal contest began. The odds seemed insuperable. But the God of the just was worthy of their trust. The signal results of that onslaught reveal the presence of something more than human will. Against the Texas casualties of eight dead and 27 wounded, the elite corps of the Mexican Army lost 630 killed and 730 prisoners. Santa Anna was among the captured.

The legacy of San Jacinto is the story of the invincible spirit of free men when finally aroused to righteous rage by the inevitable excesses of despotism.

Sam Houston was born in Virginia, left home at 15 and lived for three years with the Indians. He achieved his first military recognition against the Creeks under Andrew Jackson in what is now Alabama.

He began, and for a time ended, his political career in Tennessee. Thereafter he wandered aimlessly for many months and was reported drunk on a Mississippi River boat. He turned up in the Oklahoma Indian Territory living again with the Cherokees. And he was sent to Texas on a special mission by President Jackson, one of the few people who never lost faith in him and the one man who Sam Houston idolized.

Houston was a citizen of four nations; The United States, the Cherokee Nation which he once served as its Ambassador in Washington, the Republic of Mexico and the Republic of Texas which he served as President. Through it all his undivided loyalty was to the United States and statehood.

Sam Houston was never a citizen of the Confederacy. With all his heart, he believed secession to be a treason. He vacated the governorship of Texas rather than swear allegiance to an entity which made war upon his nation. Ironically, in light of later virtual canonization as Texas' Patron Saint, Sam Houston died reviled and rejected by many Texans.

Twice governor—once of Tennessee, once of Texas—he twice relinguished the position rather than compromise a conviction. Right or wrong, Houston held personal honor more valuable than public office. The decision which caused him to leave the Tennessee Governor's chair and the state involved his young first wife, Eliza Allen, his bride of only a few weeks, and her inability—for whatever reason—to live with him. Therein lies a mystery which has never been unriddled.

The nearest thing to an explanation appears in a personal note which Houston wrote the young lady's father. It read, ". . . I have been satisfied and believe her virtuous, as I have assured her. If mortal man dared to charge my wife, or say ought against her virtue, I would have slain him. That I have and do love Eliza, none can doubt, and that I have treated her with affection, she will admit. . ."

And then only this, ". . . she was cold to me, and I thought she did not love me. . ."

To the public he would say almost nothing. His supporters pleaded with him to make a statement but he would say only, "She is blameless." Asked to think of his future, he replied with steely firmness: "Whatever the price of silence, I will pay it." Then he resigned as governor, abandoned his promising future and left Tennessee.

After Houston left Tennessee and before he went to Texas—during the period when he represented the Cherokee Nation in Washington as its Ambassador—a congressman from Ohio named William Stanberry, in the course of an attack upon the Jackson Administration on the Floor of House, implied that Houston and Jackson were involved in some underhanded conflict of interest over the contracts to supply Indian rations.

Jackson took it in stride but Houston was outraged. He called at the door of the House Chamber for Stanberry, who declined to accept his note and refused to see him. Some days later, Houston encountered the congressman on Pennsylvania Avenue and demanded satisfaction. Stanberry pulled a pistol but it misfired. Houston man-handled him rather brutally.

Stanberry, invoking the law of congressional immunity, demanded that Houston be tried and punished by the House. Houston appeared in his own defense, humble and contrite, and said:

"I stand before this House, branded as a man of broken fortune and blasted reputation. Never can I forget that reputation, however limited, is the high boon of heaven. Though the plowshare of ruin has been driven over me and laid waste my brightest hopes, I have only to say, with the poet Byron:

" 'I seek no sympathies, nor need;
The thorns which I have reaped are of the tree
I planted; they have torn me and I bleed.' "

And so, Sam Houston—former congressman and former governor, once possible President—on May 9, 1832, was officially censured by the U.S. House of Representatives. But you can go back to that reprimand as it was spoken by Speaker Andrew Stevenson and recorded in the journal of the day's proceedings.

It contains 123 words of undiluted praise, followed by a single sentence in which the Speaker said: "I forebear to say more, General Houston, than to pronounce the judgment of this House, which is that you be reprimanded by the Speaker—and I do reprimand you accordingly."

All of this happened before Texas, before San Jacinto, before his presidency of the Republic, before his brilliant battle for statehood, his service in the Senate, his brave but futile fight to save the Union. Those came later and catapulted Sam Houston to immortality.

A motto for his life might well be the words he spoke on the eve of San Jacinto: "Trust in the God of the just, and fear not."

Sam Houston's faults were big but his faith was bigger. And perhaps in that there's hope for lesser men.

Though this is a Texas celebration, San Jacinto Day, April 21, is a time for all people to cherish their freedom and liberty. It is well for Texans to pause and remember this day, but it is also good for freedom-loving people throughout the world to remember it as well. Viva la San Jacinto Day! ●

TERRY DOWNEY, TRADE UNIONIST, HONORED

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1985, the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers honored one of their members, Terry Downey from Oakland, CA, on his retirement after 35 years of dedicated service to his union and fellow workers.

Mr. Downey, through his years of trade union leadership experience has created job programs, developed apprenticeship standards, and has made numerous other contributions benefiting working men and women.

First employed as a machinist for Standard Oil Co. in 1946, Mr. Downey became a business representative for the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers in 1964. He served in the California State government as a vocational rehabilitation specialist, as a field representative for the State OSHA Program, and as an apprenticeship consultant.

Terry Downey is retiring as a senior apprenticeship coordinator/administrator, having advised and assisted individuals, employers, and labor organizations within a six-county area in California. His concerns included apprenticeship standards and promoting equal opportunity for minorities and women in apprenticeship programs.

Despite his busy schedule, he has devoted time to a host of trade organizations and councils. Mr. Downey has served on educational advisory committees in automotive technology in various high school and community college districts in California.

Mr. Downey's commitment to the labor movement will be long remembered. His contributions to workplace safety, health, and the promotion of training opportunities are being felt.

I join Terry Downey's colleagues in paying tribute to his accomplishments.●

WE SHOULD NOT FORGET OUR OBLIGATIONS TO THE DOWNTRODDEN

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I must rise today to speak my mind on the direction this Congress and this administration appears to be taking. I am concerned regarding what we are doing to the people of our country, what message we are sending them.

Several weeks ago my subcommittee tried to extend the Federal supplemental compensation so that unemployed individuals, seeking employment, could continue to receive benefits beyond the normal 26 weeks, our efforts were rejected and soon there will be an additional 350,000 unemployed individuals who will not be receiving any unemployment compensation.

Prior to that this congress passed a farm credit measure to assist farmers in avoiding bankruptcy. It was vetoed and now there will be thousands of farm bankruptcies that did not have to happen.

On the other hand, this Congress and this administration had little difficulty passing a bill to provide $1.5 billion to build MX missiles, a weapon of dubious military value and no social value. Now I understand the President and Republicans of the other Chamber have reached an agreement to decrease proposed Social Security benefits by 2 percent in 1986 while increasing defense spending by 7 percent—assumes 4 percent CPI. They propose to freeze Medicare payments to hospitals and increase Medicare premiums charged to the elderly, at the same time they will reduce financial aid to college students, freeze Federal pay and eliminate the Legal Services Corporation and the Job Corps.

There is no question that this country has a severe financial problem and there is no question that we simply cannot keep on spending money we don't have. But, in our struggle with our financial problems can we afford to abandon our poor, our old, our disabled, our unemployed, our sick, our uneducated?

We cannot penalize these people because they are unable to defend themselves. We should not solve our countries' financial problems by taking from the poor. Gentlemen, I think before we take one more penny from programs that serve the underprivileged, the poor, the old, the ill, the struggling farmers and workers that we think long and hard about MX missiles, M-1 tanks that rarely work, $700 hammers and $1,500 coffee pots. We should wonder about corporate welfare—we hear of the guy who buys vodka with food stamps but little of the $8 billion bail out of the International Monetary Fund or $4.5 billion rescue of the Continental Bank—or the $1.9 billion energy research grant to Exxon or the $4.75 billion they received in tax incentives to encourage oil exploration in 1984.

When considering ways to balance the budget we should not forget our obligations to the downtrodden—we should not forget our promises to the elderly—we should not forget what was said to the electorate and above all we should keep intact our sense of fairness. For example, is it fair to reduce Social Security benefits when these benefits are not financed out of general revenues? The money saved can't be used to balance the budget, so why is a reduction proposed?

Gentlemen, let us pause and search carefully before we trade on the birthrights of Americans, before we barter away health care and education, the vitality of our cities, the income of our aged, the honor of Congress, for if we give up too much we may find we have very little to defend.●

THE MUJAHEDIN AND CONTRAS: DESERVING OF U.S. SUPPORT

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, as part of the ongoing debate over aid to the Nicaraguan Contras, I call the attention of my colleagues to an excellent analysis by our colleague from Illinois, HENRY HYDE. This article appeared yesterday in the Binghamton Sunday Press, and it argues that there are many parallels between the Mujahedin freedom fighters who are trying to liberate Afghanistan from Soviet tyranny and the Nicaraguan Contras who are likewise trying to liberate their country from the grip of Marxist oppression.

Our colleague also points out the folly of "Congressional insistence on micromanaging foreign policy" and the serious consequences this practice has for President Duarte and our other friends and allies in El Salvador. Mr. HYDE goes on to provide a very important and enlightening discussion of international law and how it relates to supporting the Contras in Nicaragua.

Perhaps the most compelling point in the article is the conclusion, which contains a quotation for the French philosopher Jean-Francois Revel's penetrating new book, "How Democracies Perish": "Communism is more skillful, more persevering than democracy in defending itself. Democracy tends to ignore, even deny threats to its existence because it loathes doing what is necessary to counter them. It awakens only when the danger becomes deadly, imminent, evident. By then, either there is too little time left for it to save itself, or the price of survival has become crushingly high."

I trust that this warning will receive the attention of every Member of Congress. For what is really at stake in Nicaragua, in El Salvador, in Central America is our own ultimate survival as a free people. The price of doing nothing is far greater and far more frightening than the price of aiding those people in Nicaragua who are trying to free their land from the tyrants who have made that country a conduit for terrorism, subversion, and repression.

I ask that Mr. HYDE's article appear at this point in the RECORD.

THE MUJAHEDIN AND CONTRAS: DESERVING OF U.S. SUPPORT

As a nation that was born of revolution, the United States has always taken a special interest in the fight of others for freedom and independence. With respect to Nicaragua and Afghanistan, security, self-determination and humanitarian concerns count heavily in decisions to assist the resistance forces in both nations. While Congressional support for the Afghans is overwhelmingly bi-partisan, the same cannot be said for their counterparts in Nicaragua. Indeed, Congressional endorsement of the Afghans is so sacrosanct that Members who condemn the Contras for reported human rights abuses ignore allegations that the Mujahedin are killing prisoners. Such contradictory behavior moved columnist Charles Krauthammer to write recently that "some Congressman to whom I pose the question argue that the crucial difference here is Soviet occupation. But by what moral logic are standards of human rights and democracy to be applied to those fighting domestic tyranny and suspended for those fighting a foreign variety?"

I believe a case can be made for backing both the Mujahedin and Contras, but for the balance of this discussion I will dwell primarily on whether we should assist the latter as many of my Colleagues find that politically and legally harder to justify.

In analyzing the Nicaraguan situation, one must remember that since the Korean conflict, our Communist adversaries have resorted to sophisticated covert operations, so-called "Wars of National Liberation," and surrogates to attain their goals. Unfortunately we have, for the most part, been unable to counter these tactics effectively.

One of the reasons why is that initially we were seduced into thinking that some of these "national liberation" revolutions were genuine turns for the better. In lawyer's lexicon, that amounted to fraud in the inducement. In this regard, I am thinking particularly of Cuba, Grenada and Nicaragua. By the time we awakened to what was really happening, it was too late in Cuba, almost too late in Grenada, and quickly getting too late in Nicaragua.

Duplicity in the pursuit of objectives is an acknowleged Marxist trait that is exemplified in some of the documents captured during the liberation of Grenada. Not only do these records reveal that the deposed leaders of Grenada were confirmed Marxists-Leninists but they also indicate that their Cuban mentors had advised them to pretend that they favored a pluralistic economy and middle-class participation in the governing councils. All of this, of course, was designed to entice much needed capitalist investment and fool the American public much like Fidel Castro did years before.

Mounting evidence suggests that we are seeing a rerun of the Cuba/Grenada experience in Nicaragua. Indicative of what I mean are the following remarks at a Havana Seminar by Sandinista Interior Minister, Tomas Borge, that appeared in the December 24, 1984 edition of Newsweek magazine: "We are not copying the Cuban revolution," he insisted, but added that he felt "clandestine love" for Cuba's system. "Because of the tactical moment, it is necessary not to fully articulate the viewpoint," he said, flustered after spotting tape recorders in the audience, which included 55 Americans.

Congressional insistence on micromanaging foreign policy is nowhere more evident than in central America where Congress has suspended aid to the Contras whose fortunes are inextricably linked to that of our ally, Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte. El Salvador, while still in the embryonic stages of democracy, is faced with an insurgency that is provided material, financial and political support by the Sandinistas in Managua. I realize that some Members of Congress question the legality of engaging in covert activities in Nicaragua, believing such actions violate the non-intervention provisions of the Rio Treaty and the Organization of American States (OAS) Charter that the U.S. has signed. However, in my opinion, if another signatory—in this case Nicaragua—violates those provisions, the United States is relieved of any moral or legal obligation to continue abiding by those same provisions vis-a-vis Nicaragua, so long as that conflict geared nation persists in its illegal, subversive activities in El Salvador. Indeed, such unilateral U.S. restraint would jeopardize the security of a struggling democracy that is also a signatory to the Rio Treaty and has sought our assistance to endure its survival. Notwithstanding the blatant preposterousness of the exporter of subversion—Nicaragua—claiming the law protects its lawlessness, I contend that proportionate covert or overt actions in furtherance of the self-defense of El Salvador and/or its neighbors are indeed sanctioned by every relevant treaty. The inherent right of self-defense, individual or collective, is fundamental in international law and is recognized as such in the OAS Charter and Rio Treaty.

I also see nothing wrong with using such measures to induce the Sandinistas to keep their 1979 promises to the OAS of free elections and democratic pluralism and reach a peaceful settlement with the Nicaraguan opposition, some of whom are prominent democrats and ex-Sandinistas betrayed by their own revolution. Freedom and democracy are being seriously challenged in Central America and it is imperative that the President and Congress work together to preserve them. Failure to do so could ultimately mean another socially disruptive and costly wave of refugees and a Communist Central America with the enemy just across the Rio Grande. Especially pertinent is the admonition of the French philosopher and journalist Jean-Francois Revel who observed that "Communism is more skillful, more persevering than democracy in defending itself. Democracy tends to ignore, even deny threats to its existence because it loathes doing what is needed to counter them. It awakens only when the danger becomes deadly, imminent, evident. By then, either there is too little time left for it to save itself, or the price of survival has become crushingly high."

In short, we either assist the Contras now or face the prospect of involving U.S. forces somewhere in the region later—a consummation devoutly to be avoided.●

RURAL TASK FORCE SURVEY

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share my deep concern about access to and quality of rural health care. I am sure many of my colleagues share this concern. The Task Force on the Rural Elderly conducted a survey sent to State nursing home ombudsmen. As chair of the task force, I share the results of this survey.

A Prospective Payment Survey was mailed to State long-term care ombudsmen on December 13, 1984. These ombudsmen oversee problems of patients in nursing homes and are paid by the Administration on Aging. Seventy-five percent—39—of the questionnaires were completed and returned. Afterward, six other respondents sent letters indicating that they have no statistical informaion enabling them to respond to the questionnaire. In addition, two responses were received after results were tabulated. This rate suggests a great interest and concern.

The purpose of the informal survey was to understand existing problems with Medicare's Prospective Payment System (PPS). In addition, the task force was trying to assess the effect of the Prospective Payment System on rural and urban settings.

The results indicate that problems are more severe now than before PPS. An overwhelming majority, 77 percent, said patients are discharged sicker or much sicker than before PPS. More sicker patients had led to a greater demand for after-hospital support services. Seventy-one percent of those responding said that "more or many more" people need skilled nursing care since PPS.

Further, it is clear that rural areas have more severe problems than urban settings. Of those responding, over one-half stated that existing skilled nursing care is not adequate to meet the needs of discharged patients in rural areas. One-third said care was inadequate in urban areas.

By a margin of 10 percent, respondents indicated that existing services are less adequate in the country rather than the city for each of the following: intermediate nursing home care, home health, and homemaker services.

Adequate personnel is a growing concern. Fifty-nine percent reported that nursing homes did not have enough trained people to provide care in rural areas before PPS and 67 percent after PPS. This compares with 49 percent responding that personnel in urban areas was inadequate before and 56 percent after PPS.

The increased demand for after-hospital support services, along with inadequate staff to provide care, make it increasingly difficult for people to use these services. Eighteen percent said that 25-50 percent of patients are having trouble getting skilled nursing facility beds in the country. In comparison, 13 percent of the respondents indicated that 25-50 percent of the patients in the city have difficulty getting skilled nursing facility beds.

Of those responding, 13 percent reported that 25-50 percent of the patients in the country have difficulty getting home health care. Only 2.6 percent of the respondents indicated that 25-50 percent of the patients are having trouble getting home health care in the city.

In conclusion, there is reason for grave concern. Problems regarding quality health care and access to health care, especially in rural areas, appear to have been exacerbated with the introduction of the Prospective Payment System. Results of this informal survey confirm the numerous anecdotal reports received by the Task Force on the Rural Elderly. Clearly, there is need for further and ongoing assessment in the area of quality health care, especially in rural areas.●

A WORLD OF ABSOLUTE EVIL

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, when President Reagan goes to Germany next month he plans to lay a wreath at a German military cemetery that includes the graves of 47 members of the Nazi SS. The SS were the notorious, elite arm of the Nazis whose responsibilities included operating the Nazi death camps and exterminating Jews. Collectively they exterminated some 6 million Jews.

It is this notorious group to whom President Reagan will pay homage on his visit to Germany. This group was part of "a world of absolute evil," as Anthony Lewis wrote his past Sunday, April 21, in the New York Times. The Jews death camps "were sustained by the faith that one day the human spirit would prevail, that mankind would see the evil for what it was and condemn it forever."

It appears, however, that in the mind of President Reagan, "forever" is but 40 years, and it is he who claims that the German soldiers of World War II "were victims just as surely as the victims in the concentration camps."

Mr. Lewis writes:

Mr. Reagan's handling of the planned visit to Germany has been an extraordinary exercise in self-revelation. He has shown us a man with no sense of history, a man of shattering insensitivity.

And so he has:

In this whole episode one has looked for some moral center in the President, some inner awareness that could finally be reached. But in the end, there was no center.

Mr. Lewis has written poignantly about President Reagan's decision to go to this German cemetery that includes graves of 47 members of the Nazi SS. The full text of his article follows. I urge my colleagues to read it. About President Reagan's plan, Eli Weisel has said, "The issue here is not politics, but good and evil." So it is, and Mr. Lewis explains why.

Thank you.

The text of article follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 21, 1985]

THE HOLLOW MAN

(By Anthony Lewis)

BOSTON.—When the Nazi death camps are discussed, there is a scene that comes to mind. An SS guard holds the hand of a small child, a 4-year-old, and leads him up the steps to the gas chamber.

We who were not there can never fully know what it was like to experience such horror—to be in a world of absolute evil. But we know one thing from those who were there and survived: They were sustained by the faith that one day the human spirit would prevail, that mankind would see the evil for what it was and condemn it forever.

That is the framework in which to place President Reagan's statement that the German soldiers of World War II "were victims just as surely as the victims in the concentration camps." For what his words tell us is that he sees nothing unique in the evil of the Holocaust; he sees no difference between war and genocide.

Mr. Reagan's handling of his planned visit to Germany has been an extraordinary exercise in self-revelation. He has shown us a man with no sense of history, a man of shattering insensitivity.

There was nothing wrong with wanting to use the occasion of his European trip next month to sound the theme of reconciliation with the Germans. It was understandable that he should want especially to help Chancellor Kohl of the Federal republic, who has so faithfully supported the President's nuclear policies and who was offended by exclusion from last year's celebration of the 1944 Allied landing in Normandy.

But there is all the difference between reconciliation with Germany and reconciliation with the Nazi experience. It is a difference that no other President has had any difficulty understanding in the 40 years since the war. Mr. Reagan has not understood. He has acted, and spoken, as if he wanted to put the Nazi experience out of mind.

When he first decided not to visit a concentration camp, he explained that he did not want to reawaken "the memories and so forth and the passions of the time." He said "the German people have very few alive that remember even the war"—when in fact 12 million Germans are alive today who were 20 or older in 1945. That was not just a slip to be brushed off as one of Mr. Reagan's familiar gaffes; it was an attempt to will memory out of existence.

Memory and responsibility. The survivors do not call for collective guilt, for ostracism of the German people as a whole: to the contrary. But neither they nor we can accept evasion of the fact that some Germans were responsible, among them notoriously those who served in the SS.

For an advance man planning an American President's trip to Germany, the first necessity is to avoid any Nazi symbolism. That is so obvious it should not need saying. But Mr. Reagan's aides arranged for him to lay a wreath at a German military cemetery that includes the graves of 47 SS men.

A president with a sense of the values at stake would have had no difficulty in changing the plan. In doing so he would have given the world an example of remembrance. And he would at that stage have done no injury to the Federal Republic or Chancellor Kohl; he would have shown, rather, that a democratic West Germany is strong enough to live with the past.

Instead, Mr. Reagan rigidly defended the mistake. He made his comment suggesting that German soldiers who fell in battle were as much victims as defenseless people picked out for annihilation. He worried about his own image, saying that changing his itinerary would "leave me looking as if I caved in in the face of some unfavorable attention."

The worst of it has been Mr. Reagan's inability to understand what this episode has done to American Jews. They feel themselves separated and isolated, having to beseech the President: a picture from the history of anti-Semitism. Mr. Reagan seems to believe that he can make up for that by other acts of friendship for Jews. He cannot.

In this whole episode one has looked for some moral center in the President, some inner awareness that could finally be reached. Elie Wiesel, speaking with unforgettable eloquence for the victims, for history, kept expecting a response from Mr. Reagan. He spoke almost in disbelief of his "pain and shame" that an American President for whom he had "genuine affection" would do and say such things.

But in the end there was no center. To recognize that is not, as those few defending Mr. Reagan in this affair suggest, to make a political point. "The issue here is not politics," Elie Wiesel said, "but good and evil."●

ALTERNATIVE WORK SCHEDULES

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which saves the American taxpayer about $26 million, and helps Federal employees. This proposal would make permanent the authority for Federal agencies to use flexible and compressed work schedules for their employees. Without further legislation, authority for these alternative work schedules would expire in July 1985.

Alternative work schedules provide a range of variation from the traditional, fixed weekly schedule of 5 days of 8 hours each. Under flexible schedules, employees have a considerable degree of choice in selecting arrival and departure times. Compressed schedules are fixed, but have a different pattern from the traditional schedule, such as 4 days of 10 hours each, provided the nature of the work allows such a pattern. The Federal Government now has over 300,000 employees on alternative work schedules, in nearly every agency.

Alternative work schedules have been in use in the Federal Government since 1979. The schedules have proven to be generally successful, to benefit employees, and to have relatively few drawbacks in productivity, service to the public, or costs. In order to guard against and resolve any problems, the current law includes standards and procedures to protect management's right to ensure that alternative work schedules do not adversely affect productivity, service to the public, or the cost of operations.

The proposal makes permanent the authority for alternative work schedules, and continues the current management control provisions of the program.

In addition, the proposal corrects an inequity created by the current law, which provides employees on compressed schedules with pay for 10 hours for a holiday, while employees on all other schedules are paid only for 8 hours for a holiday. The proposal provides that employees on compressed schedules will be paid for 8 hours for a holiday. The affected employees would make up the time difference either by taking leave or by working on another day or days designated by the agency.

The first section of the bill makes permanent the authority for Federal agencies to establish and administer flexible and compressed work schedules for their employees under subchapter II of chapter 61 of title 5, United States Code. Under section 5 of the Federal Employees Flexible and Compressed Work Schedules Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-221), these provisions would expire in July of 1985. The bill repeals section 5 of Public Law 97-221, thus making permanent the provisions of law authorizing the flexible and compressed schedules.

Section 2 of the bill amends section 6128(d) of title 5, United States Code, in order to correct an inequity under current law in the pay for employees on compressed schedules with respect to holidays. Currently, an employee on a compressed schedule who is relieved or prevented from working on a holiday is paid basic pay for the number of hours that the compressed schedule normally requires on that day, for example, 10 hours. Because employees on flexible schedules and those on regular, fixed work schedules receive pay for only 8 hours when they are relieved or prevented from working on a holiday, the current law has granted a holiday pay windfall to employees on compressed schedules. The revision adds a new paragraph (2) to section 6128(d) to provide that an employee on a compressed schedule who is relieved or prevented from working on a holiday will be paid for 8 hours. The new paragraph (2) provides that an employee whose basic work requirement for a holiday exceeds 8 hours may make up the time difference either by charging leave or by working on a workday or workdays at times designated by the agency.

In addition, the revision amends the current provisions of section 6128(d) on pay for an employee on a compressed schedule who performs work on a holiday, in order to conform these provisions with the change to the 8-hour pay provision for employees who do not work on the holiday. Thus, an employee on a compressed schedule who is required to perform work on a holiday will be paid basic pay, plus premium pay at a rate equal to basic pay, for work up to 8 hours, will be paid basic pay for work above 8 hours but not over the employee's basic work requirement for that day, and normal overtime for work on the holiday in excess of the basic work requirement for that day.

I hope that my colleagues will support this necessary and positive legislation.●

TRIBUTE TO SIDNEY KLUGER

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, it is a personal pleasure for me today to pay special tribute to my dear friend Sidney Kluger. Sidney has accomplished more in his 72 years than a score of men of average ability and drive. He is indeed a person who embodies the best of our American ideals—hard work, compassion, perseverance, and a commitment to service to others.

A native of New York, Mr. Kluger received his B.S. from the City University of New York and did graduate work at the Universities of Oregon, Columbia, and Mexico. In 1930, he helped organize college students for Franklin D. Roosevelt's New York gubernatorial race.

During the difficult period of the early 1930's, Sidney worked with New York's young people. Later he taught high school in Eugene, OR, and then in Mexico City. He organized his own publishing firm, Publicaciones Panamericanes, which published novels, nonfiction, textbooks, and children's books. His firm published "America's Choice" by then vice-president Henry Wallace shortly after his good will tour of Mexico. Sidney was instrumental in revising the Panamerican Copyright Convention to deal with violations of the spirit of that treaty.

In the 1940's Sidney became involved with the International Rescue Committee in Mexico City. The Committee helped arrange visas for prominent Europeans to leave France to save their lives during the Nazi occupation.

In 1945, under the auspices of the American League for a Free Palestine, Senator Guy Gillette (Iowa) and Congressman Andrew Somers (New York) came to Mexico to seek help from the Mexican Government for the survivors of European Jewry. Though their mission was not successful, they did involve Sidney Kluger in the cause. He became executive director of the Latin-American League for a Free Palestine and publisher of its journal, La Respuesta (The Answer). In 1946 the journal published a two-page story on the life of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swede who dedicated himself to saving Hungarian Jews from Nazi extermination camps.

With the creation of the State of Israel, the League was dissolved and La Respuesta ceased publication. Mr. Kluger then served for 4 years as executive director of the 20,000-member Centro Deportivo Israelita—a sports and community center for the Jewish Community in Mexico City.

After his return to the United States in 1963, Kluger became executive director of Temple Sherith Israel in San Francisco. In this position, he organized the first Israel trade fair in the Western United States, which attracted over 10 thousand people and received wide publicity.

In order to combat anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union and to pressure the Soviet Government to observe its obligations under the Helsinki Final Act, Kluger became a cofounder of the Bay Area Council for Soviet Jewry. This organization, part of the national network of councils throughout the United States, played an important role in attracting attention to the problem of Soviet human rights violations. Sidney organized the San Francisco celebration of the 25th anniversary of the rescue of Danish Jews by Sweden, at which the consuls of Denmark and Sweden were honored.

One of Sidney Kluger's hobbies has become a major effort for good. In 1966, he organized Book Bank USA, a foundation dedicated to the development of public libraries throughout the world. Members of the national advisory board include such prominent writers as James Michner, Saul Bellow, Isaac Bashevis Singer, Pearl Buck, Irving Stone, William Manchester, and others.

In 1968, Book Bank contributed a bookmobile to the city of Jerusalem which was the subject of a story in Life magazine. Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek praised the gift as promoting better relations between the Arab and Jewish population of the city. Book Bank is still operating after almost 20 years, and it is currently involved in a project to supply books to Ethiopian refugees now living in Israel.

In recognition of the work of Book Bank in providing more than million books to public libraries throughout the world, Sidney Kluger was given the Daniel Koshland Award of Merit.

Book Bank also played a role in promoting cultural interchange by organizing a course on the mass media in cooperation with the University of California at Davis and the University of London. Participants in the course met with the editors and other officials of leading British newspapers, the British Broadcasting Company, and British film studios, and the conference participated in a two-way conversation with the White House.

Mr. Kluger is the chairman of the Northern California Board of Boys' Town Jerusalem, an organization devoted to the promotion of vocational education of 1,250 underprivileged students. In 1982 Kluger was honored by having a gymnasium in Kiryat Shemona named after him.

Mr. Speaker, the issue on which I have had the most extensive contact with Sidney Kluger is in connection with Raoul Wallenburg—the Swede who saved one hundred thousand Hungarians from Nazi death camps, and among those he saved were my wife, Annette, and I. In 1979 Kluger provided invaluable service to Annette when she established the first International Free Wallenberg Committee.

After my election to Congress in 1980, we discussed the possibility of making Wallenberg and honorary citizen of the United States in order to increase our ability to intercede on his behalf with Soviet Union. Our efforts culminated in a moving Rose Garden ceremony on October 5, 1981, when President Reagan signed my legislation making Wallenberg an honorary American citizen.

Few men have been privileged to lead the kind of lives that Sidney Kluger has led. He has consistently applied his intelligence and leadership to projects which benefit his fellow men. I am delighted to call to the attention of my colleagues the accomplishments of this remarkable man.●

TRIBUTE TO REV. JAMES McNEAR

HON. GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to call to your attention and that of our fellow colleagues an outstanding community servant, the late Rev. James McNear of Joliet, IL. A deeply religious man, he devoted his life to making his community a better place in which to live for his fellow man.

At a very early age he became involved in religion which resulted in his attendance and graduation from the Baptist Institute in Chicago in 1949. As he moved among his congregation, he began to instill in their hearts and minds a new way of life. He is recognized today for his tireless efforts in striving for dignity in resistance to ghetto life for his community.

In 1965 Reverend McNear was instrumental in organizing the Fairmont Improvement Association after eight children died in a fire due to lack of water in their community. The purpose of this organization was to have water, sewer service, and street lights installed in their area. This group was very successful and while much development is still needed in his community, the legacy of this man can be found as we look around the community in which he worked. Today other black community leaders take up the task where Reverend McNear left off. He is remembered for leading others as he showed them that there is, indeed, a better way of life. Currently, the young blacks in his community are reaching out toward goals and aspirations that their parents only a generation ago would not have imagined attainable for themselves.

I am proud to announce that this past February, in observance of Afro-American History Month at Lewis University in Lockport, IL. Reverend McNear was honored posthumously with the well-deserved Outstanding Citizen Award. Reverend McNear will be long remembered for his devotion to his community and his determination to instill in others a desire to improve the quality of their lives.●

CONCERNED BLACK MEN, INC., 1985 PRESIDENT'S VOLUNTEER ACTION AWARD RECIPIENTS

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the Concerned Black Men, Inc., of Philadelphia, who will be honored today by President Reagan as recipients of the 1985 President's Volunteer Action Award.

Concerned Black Men was founded in 1975 by a group of police officers as a response to the problem of youth gang violence. Their objective was to offer juveniles positive adult role models and opportunities for constructive activity. The group is now composed of black men from all walks of life, and has earned the support of the Philadelphia community.

Over 2,000 individuals and organizations were nominated for the President's Volunteer Action Awards, and 18 winners were named. Because they are the only minority civic organization to earn this honor, I am particularly proud that the Concerned Black Men has been selected to represent our city and State.

The President has chosen wisely to honor this outstanding volunteer group. Their record of service, and the incentives and role models they offer to our often troubled youth, merit our respect, our congratulations, and our support.

Mr. Speaker, I salute the Concerned Black Men and wish them continued success through their volunteer efforts to build communities that are safe, just, and filled with opportunity.●

UNIVERSITY HIGH SCHOOL CELEBRATES 60TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of University High School in Los Angeles, which will celebrate its 60th anniversary on April 27, 1985. In honor of this celebration, I would like to insert the following resolution:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, University High School is completing 60 years of service as an educational institution, and

Whereas, University High School was established in 1924 as a one building school and has since grown into a highly respected center for learning, and

Whereas, University High School has offered a quality educational program to its more than 50,000 graduates, and

Whereas, University High School has graduated students who have gone on to achieve outstanding recognition in the various professions, the theatre, the arts, and athletics, and

Whereas, University High School has maintained a diverse program of instruction regardless of various vicissitudes over the years, and

Whereas, University High School has provided innovative educational programs created by members of the faculty, and

Whereas, University High School has promoted intercultural programs that have contributed to better understanding among all ethnic and racial groups in the Greater Los Angeles community, and

Whereas, Faculty members and students can be rightly proud of their association with a school credited by many students who have graduated into distinguished careers, and

Whereas, University High School has contributed toward civic pride as demonstrated by the many contributions made by its graduates for the betterment of the quality of life for all citizens of the City of Los Angeles.

Now, therefore, be it resolved that Congressman Mel Levine hereby highly commends University High School, its Administration, Faculty, Students, and Community on the achievements and scholastic progress accomplished during the past 60 years, and extends its sincere wishes for continued success in providing excellence in education.●

TRIBUTE TO MR. KENNETH WALKER

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to pay tribute to the award-winning work of ABC News Correspondent Kenneth Walker, who has received national acclaim for his outstanding coverage in South Africa for ABC's Nightline television news program.

Through Mr. Walker's coverage, the social and political environment was vividly presented to the American public, and his commentary was both thoughtful and thought-provoking. It is in large part Mr. Walker's coverage that made the South African Nightline telecast the recipient of international critical acclaim.

Mr. Speaker, Kenneth Walker has a long and illustrious career in journalism. Prior to joining ABC News, he was a national and foreign correspondent for the Washington Star newspaper from 1969 to 1981, covering the Department of Justice, Congress, the Supreme Court, the White House and the Republic of South Africa. In addition, Mr. Walker hosted and produced a local talk show in 1978 for WJZ-TV, the ABC affiliate in Baltimore.

During his tenure with ABC News, Mr. Walker has served as general assignment correspondent, Justice Department correspondent, and senior correspondent for the Presidential campaign of the Reverend Jesse Jackson. He is also coauthor of a book to be published this year on the life of Reverend Jackson.

Mr. Walker's career has been marked by a high sense of professionalism, with insightful and provocative analysis of global events. It is in recognition of his many achievements in the field of journalism, and particularly the breakthroughs he made during his Nightline coverage in South Africa, that I make special mention of Kenneth Walker before the House of Representatives today. I applaud Mr. Walker's accomplishments, and fully anticipate continued success in all his future assignments.●

THE GREAT SOCIETY: SUCCESS OR FAILURE

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, this past week, the LBJ Library in Austin, TX, sponsored a symposium on the Great Society. It was well attended by many of the leaders and architects of that period in our history. For the most part, they all reaffirmed their faith in the principles, practicalities, and achievements of the Great Society. Though some of the programs have been modified, many of the programs are still just as valid today as they were when they were enacted. Job Corps, Head Start, Elementary and Secondary Education: I could go on and on. These programs helped people, and I submit they will always be a part of our national agenda in some form or another. Therefore, for the benefit of the Members, I would like to include in the RECORD an account from the Austin American-Statesman of the proceedings of the symposium.

The proceedings follow:

[From the Austin American-Statesman, Apr. 19, 1985]

GREAT SOCIETY REMEMBERED—LEGACY'S BUILDERS RECALL GOVERNMENT AS TOOL

(By Steve Reed)

Lyndon Johnson recognized government as a tool to defeat the traditional enemies of American Society and not as the enemy, Barbara Jordan said Thursday in opening a two-day retrospective of the Great Society by its contributors and contemporary critics.

"The legacy of Lyndon Johnson continues to enrich our lives," said Jordan, a three-term member of Congress who retired from politics in 1979. "He saw the enemy, and the enemy was not government. The enemy was ignorance, poverty, disease, ugliness, injustice, discrimination. He believed that it was the duty of government to defeat the enemy."

In her keynote speech before an LBJ Library audience of about 700 people, including Lady Bird Johnson, Jordan said Great Society programs were different from conventional welfare programs because Johnson made them different.

"He addressed root causes and tried to bring resolution at the point of beginning," she said. "He did not simply say let's provide children with better education and the unemployed with jobs. Lyndon Johnson wanted to prepare children to receive an education; he wanted to provide those without work employability."

After joining a panel considering the mood of the country 20 years ago, Jordan raised the issue of how a major anniversary of the Great Society could be celebrated with a national "conspiracy of silence."

She said the answer lies in the mood of the country today, a mood to which Presidents Carter and Reagan contributed by campaigning against Washington and big government. Americans cannot expect the federal government to be doing good things on behalf of people when two presidents have expressed negative sentiment about Washington's role in society, she said.

Two dozen Johnson administration aides and Great Society architects and observers spent most of the rest of the day recalling the spirit and intentions of Great Society legislation, tracing its roots, and evaluating its successes and failures.

Reagan administration treatment of social program funding and the more conservative climate in the country came in for considerable criticism.

Ray Marshall, a secretary of the Labor Department in the Carter administration, attacked the arguments that Great Society legislation contributed significantly to inflation and that the poor are worse off today than when the War on Poverty was initiated.

"I don't believe that the War on Poverty had anything to do with inflation as we experienced it in the 1970s and 1980s, and if it did, it was imperceptible," he said.

"The main reason for the inflation was external shocks to the American economy," he said, citing the quadrupling of energy prices in 1973 and 1974 and their doubling in 1979.

"The argument that somehow these programs didn't make any difference because of a simple before-and-after comparison is simplistic, naive, and ridiculous," Marshall said.

"If you looked at the detailed evidence of the programs, it seems to me that obviously poverty was cut in half during the decade, the incidence of poverty, during the 1960s."

Marshall said critics of Great Society programs asked then and now about cost-effectiveness. He said programs such as Head Start, which places poor children in preschool and kindergarten and encourages parental involvement, and the Job Corps cannot be judged by an arbitrary bottom line.

"It costs you a lot not to deal with poverty and unemployment and discrimination and that range of problems," he said. "You can get these things out of the federal budget, but you can't get them out of the country. And we will pay for it one way or another.

The Reagan budget now before Congress calls for the elimination of the Job Corps, which several participants identified not only as a centerpiece of Johnson's programs but as a success story.

Otis Singletary, president of the University of Kentucky and the first director of the Job Corps, said he was more fearful for the agency's future today than at any time since its creation.

"What we did was, in a country where there were a lot of jobs out there going begging and a lot of kids out there who were unprepared to handle them, we took some of those kids and readied them for some of those jobs, and they're showing today that it can be done," Singletary said.

He said the criticism that there was ample opportunity for those who wanted to work overlooked the "clientele" he described as the most difficult to reach in the United States—"that 16 to 20-year-old kid who is out of school, out of work, and literally has no place to go. If we didn't do anything else . . . we did manage to shrink the pool of those Robert Frost had in mind when he described them as people with nothing to look back to with pride and nothing to look forward to with hope."

Sargent Shriver, former Peace Corps and Office of Economic Opportunity director, criticized a new American selfishness that makes gods out of millionaires, tells the poor they've already had their chance, and blames people who are handicapped for their afflictions.

"I think we've got somehow or other to convince Americans that John Wayne and individualism are not the only symbols of our society," Shriver said, describing the nation's founding as a time when people shared a sense of community and responsibility for one another.

Today, "nobody cares about anybody else, and especially nobody cares about anybody who's a loser, and if you're a loser because you're black or because you haven't got a high I.Q., or if you're a loser because you're crippled, you're just a loser and we don't want to see anything about you or talk to you." he said of the attitude of some Americans.

Shriver said poverty in America is growing dramatically under Mr. Reagan and has affected or threatened 47 million people.

"We may be talking today about what the War on Poverty attempted to do, what it failed to do, the stupid mistakes we made, the overpromises that we were guilty of, but the issue before this group and especially before any students here is, what's going to happen in the United States if we continue to slop along the way we are now, forgetting 40 million Americans who are poor," Shriver said.

One of the strongest attacks on Reagan funding cuts for social programs came from Rep. Augustus Hawkins, D-Calif., the only current member of Congress participating in the symposium, who also was critical of the news media.

"Unfortunately it seems to me that we're drifting in the direction now of a complete abdication of federal responsibility not only of education but also employment training, health, and other phases of national life," he said. "If this continues, it obviously will undercut the social programs that affect us at the community level as well.

"The fact that the public is not aware of it, it seems to me, is strictly a question of the media itself . . . the public is not being advised, is not aware of what is going on in the nation today."

Hawkins said the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, another linchpin of the Great Society, has suffered a 50 percent funding cut during the Reagan presidency and faces another 16 percent reduction in the proposed budget.

"Public education is a great thing that we need to indulge in if we're going to protect the Great Society," he said. "Otherwise if we meet here five years from now, 10 years from now, there isn't going to be anything to critique because nothing is going to be left."●

TRIBUTE TO RAYEN HIGH SCHOOL—STATE BASKETBALL CHAMPIONS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to pay tribute to a group of young men from my district who have achieved greatness and have distinguished themselves and their community. I am speaking of the members of the Rayen High School Basketball Team in Youngstown, OH, who recently won the State Double A Basketball Championship. At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to extend my congratulations and praise to the principal of Rayen High School, my brother, Sam Traficant, and the head coach of Rayen's Basketball Team, Frank W. Cegledy, Jr. Both of these men played an important role in molding together a winning team of young men—both on and off the court.

Rayen High School finished the season with an incredible 26–1 record. They completed an amazing season by defeating Linden McKinley High School of Columbus, OH, by a score of 50 to 46 to win the AA Ohio State High School Basketball Championship. I am extremely proud of this team because of its hard work and relentless drive. This team does not boast a super-star or one key player. They achieved greatness this year through hard work, team play, and determined spirit. Their amazing drive to the State championship is emblematic of the spirit and feistiness of the Youngstown community. Like the people in my district, the young men of Rayen High School's basketball team worked together—through hard times and good—and they refused to give in when the going got rough and when the pressure was on.

In paying tribute to these fine young men and Rayen High School, I would also like to pay tribute to their parents and families who supported them throughout the season. Everyone associated with Rayen High School should be proud—proud of their team, their school, and their outstanding community.●

JEWISH EDUCATORS SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS PRESENTED

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the recipients of the 1985 Association of Jewish Educators scholarship award. The Association of Jewish Educators is affiliated with the community relations committee of the Jewish Federation Council, Los Angeles. It consists of teachers, administrators, and classified employees of the Los Angeles Unified School District and provides professional, social, and educational support to its members and the Los Angeles Jewish Community.

Each year the Association of Jewish Educators holds a scholarship fundraiser and awards scholarships to outstanding Jewish students from Los Angeles' 49 senior high schools who have met requirements of outstanding academic performance, service to their school, service to the Jewish community and to their community at large. The 1985 scholarship winners are:

Caroline Nelson, senior, Alexander Hamilton High School.

Hali Helfgott, senior, Alexander Hamilton High School.

Stacey Mills, senior, Alexander Hamilton High School.

Daniel Rubenstein, senior, Francis Polytechnic High School.

Mitchell Moss, senior, James Monroe High School.

Lisa Levine, senior, Banning High School.

It is my honor to ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating these fine young ladies and gentlemen.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1985, I was unavoidably absent for two votes. Had I been present for the vote on Senate Joint Resolution 15, a joint resolution to designate May 7, 1985, as "Helsinki Human Rights Day," and to request the President to raise the issue of Soviet and East European human rights violations at every available opportunity, I would have voted in favor of passage. On House Concurrent Resolution 110, a concurrent resolution to express the sense of Congress that Taiwan should cooperate in the extradition of any Taiwanese involved in the murder of Henry Liu, I would have voted in favor of passage.●

THE JAPANESE MARKET EXPANSION ACT OF 1985

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to expand the Japanese market for beef, citrus, and frozen vegetables. This bill, known as the "Japanese Market Expansion Act of 1985" seeks to address the serious tariff and nontariff barriers which these U.S. commodities face.

The Japanese, through a series of both quotas and nontariff barriers, have severely limited the amount of certain U.S. agricultural products which they will accept. In the past, the Japanese have acknowledged this problem and have pledged to correct it. Unfortunately, their pledges have not been translated into significant reductions of these barriers.

Mr. Speaker, the time for talk is growing short, and the time for action is quickly approaching. The Japanese must realize the seriousness of this problem and make the necessary changes in order to promote good trade relations with the United States.

If the Japanese wish to continue to have free access to the U.S. market for their automobiles and other products, then they must treat our commodities with the same free trade attitude which we accord their products.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that at a time when the United States is removing quotas on Japanese automobiles, we should see some reciprocity by the Japanese Government. I urge all of my colleagues to support this legislation and work to achieve fair trading practices with the Japanese.●

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, on April 18, 1985, I was absent from the floor of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 56: H.R. 1617, Bureau of Standards Authorization, the House rejected the Walker amendment to the Walgren amendment that sought to reduce the total authorization level to $122.5 million, "aye";

Rollcall No. 57: H.R. 1617, Bureau of Standards Authorization, the House agreed to the Walgren amendment that reduces the total authorization level to $127.8 million, and reallocates funds among the various functions, "aye"; and

Rollcall No. 58: H.R. 1617, Bureau of Standards Authorization, the House passed the measure to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1986 and 1987, "no".●

SPRING BREAK

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Education recently stated that today's college students could afford the administration's massive cutbacks in student aid if they merely "divested" themselves of their cars, their stereos, and their spring vacations in Fort Lauderdale.

I'd like to advise the Secretary that there are millions of college students across our Nation who put their spring breaks to good use by studying, working, and doing good works.

One such group of students from the College Misericordia in Dallas, PA, recently spent their spring break helping the needy in Appalachia. These 10 selfless students volunteered their time to help needy residents of Lancaster, KY, with minor home repairs, and they visited and distributed food to the elderly

These students are excellent proof that today's college students do care about their fellow man and not just about themselves. Let's help them make a better and more productive world for all of us by providing them with the financial aid they need to get through college. Our investment in them today will be paid back with interest in future years in terms of higher productivity, higher worker satisfaction, and higher earnings and income tax revenues.

Rather than casting aspersions on our college students, or slashing their financial aid, perhaps it is time for some of our policymakers to divest themselves of some of their antiquated prejudices about today's college students.

CONCERNED BLACK MEN, INC., EARNS PRESIDENT'S VOLUNTEER ACTION AWARD

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, 1985 marks the 10th anniversary of the founding of Concerned Black Men, Inc. This organization, firmly established in the city of Philadelphia, is deserving of our highest praise and recognition. Through its volunteer service of providing positive role models to black youths, our society has been richly rewarded with a new generation of caring, gifted, and creative men and women prepared to meet the challenges of tomorrow.

Concerned Black Men, Inc., was started in the 1970's by a group of black policemen and firefighters who wanted to do more than simply react to gang activity in Philadelphia. Their strong dedication and commitment to caring for our children led to their sponsoring a variety of cultural, recreational, and educational activities focused on helping both men and youths understand each other, themselves and their community.

After 9 years, many of the original members continue to work tirelessly to expand opportunities for black youths. Mr. Ervin R. Urquhart and Mr. Charles Patton remain a driving force in the movement to inspire young people to achieve their very best.

Concerned Black Men, Inc., has indeed earned the 1985 President's Volunteer Action Award. It is the only group from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to be selected for the award this year, and the only minority civic organization in the United States to be so honored.

The leaders of Concerned Black Men, Inc., realize that its recognition is also a proud reflection of the accomplishments of its black youths. The group's own honor winners will be saluted at the "Tenth Annual Black Youth Recognition Award Banquet" on June 1, 1985.

To this partnership of men and youths, I say thank you for bringing into being a very special way of passing on a real and meaningful hope to successive generations.●

A TRIBUTE TO EAGLE SCOUT BERNARD J. VORDERER III

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before my colleagues to recognize and honor a remarkable young man from my district, Bernard J. Vorderer III. I am pleased to bring Bernard Vorderer to the attention of my colleagues since he has been chosen for promotion to the rank of Eagle Scout at a ceremony on May 4, 1985, at Five Holy Martyrs Church in Chicago, IL.

Bernard Vorderer has had a distinguished career in the Boy Scouts. In September 1978, he joined the Five Holy Martyrs Cub Pack 3465 and advanced through the ranks of Bobcat, Wolf, and Bear. The following year, Bernard was promoted to Webelos where he earned all 15 activity badges, the Webelos badge, and Arrow of Light. After joining Boy Scout Troop 465 in October 1981, Bernard obtained the ranks of First Class, Star, Life, and Eagle. He earned all 12 skill awards, 35 merit badges, and the World Conservation Award. In 1983, Bernard was elected to the Order of the Arrow, Tschitani Mawat Chapter. This fine young man has also received the Cub Scout Parvueli Dei Religious Award, the Boy Scout Ad Altare Dei, and the Pope Pius XII Religious Award.

Presently an honor student at Quigley South High School, Bernard Vorderer is also involved in many activities outside of Scouting. He is a member of the school band and wrestling team, has served as an altar boy, and has played Little League Baseball. Bernard's future plans include obtaining a bachelor's degree in computer science and a master's degree in business administration.

I deem it a great honor for me to congratulate Bernard Vorderer on the occasion of his obtaining the rank of Eagle Scout. He is truly an example of the dedicated youth of our Nation. I ask my colleagues to please join me in wishing him continued success in the future.●

SALUTE TO HUBBELL, ROTH, & CLARK OF BLOOMFIELD HILLS, MI

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the firm of Hubbell, Roth, & Clark of Bloomfield Hills, MI, for their excellent design of the Chevrolet Livonia interim pretreatment facility.

The Chevrolet Livonia facility was cited for excellence in engineering design by the American Consulting Engineers Council and was one of only five grand awards presented by the council.

This facility was built in only 3½ months in order to meet a tight deadline imposed by the Environmental Protection Agency and is located in one of the world's largest metal finishing plants.

The firm of Hubbell, Roth, & Clark should be saluted for their fine effort and work. Since only five grand awards were given away, their achievement is a notable one. Fine workmanship, excellent design, and efficiency are always an inspiration to all of us.●

A TRIBUTE TO GENERAL EDWIN F. BLACK

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, America lost a good and compassionate man last week with the passing of Gen. Edwin F. Black. Ed served his country with honor and dignity in time of war and peace. He was a key military planner in the Pacific and in Washington during World War II and later during the Vietnam War.

After his retirement from the Army, Ed remained a staunch defender of a strong national defense and spoke out often on the need to upgrade our military preparedness. During his rich and productive retirement, he expanded his public service activities by serving as vice president of the Pacific and Asian Affairs Council, as well as being a founder and chairman of the Honolulu Committee on Foreign Relations. Ed also served as a president of the Honolulu chapter of the American Cancer Society.

Mr. Speaker, with Ed's passing Hawaii has lost a great leader and a concerned and compassionate human being. Ed was a good man and we in Hawaii will all miss him. I feel very fortunate to have known Ed. His deep devotion to America and his great love for Hawaii will continue to inspire all who knew him. My deepest condolences go out to Ed's widow Cobey and their six children.●

CONGRESSMAN MILLER LAUDS PARTNERS IN LEARNING

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, as the chairman of the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, I would like to bring to the Members, attention a very important program which has been operating in my district since 1982.

"Project Partners in Learning" is a model program for assisting non-English speaking and limited English proficient parents and children at Liberty Union High School in Brentwood, CA. The project has had outstanding results in its attempts to provide parents with skills which will enable them to reinforce student learning and become a part of their children's educational process.

The project has developed a comprehensive program including instruction, instructional and counseling support for students and parents in transitional language and reading classes and in basic subject courses. Participants attend leadership training conferences to ease their community acceptance and transition into the mainstream of education and community life.

I would like to especially recognize the program's director, Art Gonzales, who has devoted countless hours to the administration of the "Project Partners in Learning." He has shared his knowledge and experience with many other school districts and programs. Numerous letters have been sent to him from school district personnel from around the country commending him for providing an outstanding example for them to mirror. I know that my colleagues in this House join me in commending both Mr. Gonzales and his program.●

TRIBUTE TO TESSE MAZZINA

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, on April 30, 1985, Miss Tesse Mazzina will retire from her position as office supervisor and city clerk with the city of Los Banos, CA, after almost four decades of service to her community. During this long career, Tesse's name has become synonymous with city hall.

In 1946 Tesse was hired by the city as a one-woman office. As the number of city employees began to grow in the 1950's, she was appointed office supervisor. In 1972 she was elected city clerk. Over the years Tesse has also been very active with many local service organizations, including the Salvation Army, the Los Banos Emergency Relief Committee, the Los Banos Coordinating Committee, and the local volunteer fire department.

As Tesse retires from the city of Los Banos, she will be sorely missed. On behalf of the citizens of Los Banos, I would like to express my gratitude to Tesse Mazzina for her many years of selfless and dedicated service to our community. It is greatly appreciated.●

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF HOMES FOR THE AGING

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an event that occurred last week which deserves our support—the 13th Annual Spring Conference of the American Association of Homes for the Aging [AAHA].

The American Association of Homes for the Aging is the national representative of 2,500 nonprofit facilities which provide health care, housing, and supportive services to over half a million older persons across the country. Administrators, other personnel and trustees of AAHA member facilities participated in a comprehensive educational program, visited with many of their elected officials, and gained a Washington perspective on significant Federal initiatives affecting the delivery of health, housing, and community services to older Americans.

On Thursday, April 18, MARK O. HATFIELD—the senior Senator from my home State of Oregon—was honored as the recipient of AAHA's Distinguished Service Award, in recognition of his leadership and efforts on behalf of America's elderly.

As chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD has been a leading policymaker, battling to preserve the Federal Government's commitment to, and financing of, programs which provide vitally needed services to America's older citizens.

The Senator's cooperation with AAHA was readily apparent last year when the Department of Housing and Urban Development proposed overly restrictive admissions requirements that jeopardized the viability of many elderly housing projects. MARK HATFIELD responded immediately, bringing the issue to the Senate floor, focusing the attention of his colleagues on the potentially devastating impact of the regulations, clarifying congressional intent, and firmly establishing foundations for any future action we might initiate in Congress to ensure that the department institute a flexible admissions approach.

Additionally, last year, Senator HATFIELD demonstrated his longstanding and enduring support of continuing care retirement communities, which are a unique housing and health care option for the elderly. Provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act threatened to impose an income tax liability on residents of these communities. The Senator helped mobilize his colleagues to petition the Treasury Department to exempt residents of existing continuing care retirement facilities from these unfair taxes. In recognition of his numerous endeavors to protect the well-being of elderly Americans, AAHA conferred upon MARK HATFIELD its Distinguished Service Award. I join the Association in commending this dedicated public servant.●

DEDICATION OF THE FOUNDERS' WALL OF THE CENTRAL QUEENS YOUNG MEN'S AND YOUNG WOMEN'S HEBREW ASSOCIATION

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives the dedication of the Founders' Wall of the Samuel and Lucille Lemberg Building of the Central Queens Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association. This joyous ceremony will take place on April 28, 1985.

The modern Lemberg Building opened in 1982, and is an impressive addition to the Central Queens YM/YWHA facilities. To commemorate this occasion, the Y has commissioned Joseph Dzindshkashvili, the famous Soviet Georgian artist, sculptor, and designer, to design a unique plaque, which will be permanently displayed in the Lemberg Building.

Mr. Speaker, this occasion is a proud one for the Central Queens YM/YWHA and for the entire Queens County community, which it serves. The Hebrew Association's Center has made a tremendous contribution to all of us, and has enriched our lives in countless ways.

The Center draws neighbors, families, and friends together through many educational and athletic activities. Its programs reach out to all members of our community, concentrating on many of our special needs. The YM/YWHA's after-school day care is designed to provide an atmosphere of safety, guidance, and love for children whose parents work past school hours. The lectures and recreational activities for seniors at the Y are an important part of the lives of many elderly citizens interested in art, current events, and fellowship with their peers and neighbors. In addition, the facility sponsors a summer day camp for mentally disabled youngsters that enables them to share in the fun and relaxation of summer that all children enjoy.

Mr. Speaker, the broad range of services and programs offered by the Central Queens YM/YWHA, and its special attention to the community's real needs, have made an invaluable contribution to the quality of life in Queens County.

Today, when career opportunities cause many adults and families to move away from their friends and relatives, this Center in Central Queens provides an especially valuable service—by giving us a means to make new friends, share the interests and activities of our neighbors, learn about our community, and take part in its warmth and fellowship.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the center's outstanding officers for their dedication to enriching the Queens community: President Jeffrey S. Aaron, vice presidents Michael Barr and Howard L. Kleiger, Secretary Allen Fagin, Chairman of the Board Julius Leventhal, honorary Presidents George Kossoy, Harry Leventhal, and Herman M. Metz, and all of its fine directors.

Mr. Speaker, I rise now to ask all of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join with me and the Central Queens Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association in celebrating the dedication of the Founders' Wall of the Lemberg Building.●

STORE FRONT MUSEUM/PAUL ROBESON THEATRE CELEBRATES 14TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues, the 14th anniversary celebration of the Store Front Museum/Paul Robeson Theatre in Jamaica, Queens.

In celebration of the museum's 14th anniversary as Queens' first Art Museum and the borough's only African-American Museum, the museum's board of directors has assembled a major exhibition entitled "Early Photographs and Documents of African-Americans to Queens County, New York."

The exhibition, the result of many years of museum research, chronicles the energy, spirit, and vitality of the borough's African-American citizens of a bygone era, by utilizing early photographs and documents that have been recaptured and preserved. The exhibit provides tangible proof of African-Americans' historical roots and meaningful early presence in the Borough of Queens.

Most of the material collected is an outgrowth of the museum's original book project entitled "African-Americans in Queens County, New York, 1683-1983," coauthored by Dr. James Rose and Margot S. Webb, and edited by James B. Gwynne, scheduled to be published in late 1985.

This important exhibition, of significance to both black history and the history of the borough, will crown the museum's list of achievements during its 14-year history of providing cultural services in southeast Queens.●

THE CONGRESSIONAL CAUCUS FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY SALUTES CHRISTINA KOCH, FOR AN OUTSTANDING SCIENCE PROJECT

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, recently some of our brightest young scientists were given the chance to enter their research sceince projects in science fairs. I am pleased to bring to the attention of my colleagues, a student who received an outstanding award and citations for her hard work.

Christina Koch, who is 12 years old and a seventh grade student at St. Jane Frances de Chantal, Bethesda, Md, entered her project in the Washington Area Science Fair in Montgomery County. Sponsored by the Board of Education, District Council of Engineering and Architectural Societies and the Washington Academy of Sciences.

Christina was recognized by the Washington Junior Academy of Sciences—medical sciences and health division—and the Institute of Food Technologists—Washington, DC section—for an outstanding science project in the fields of food Science and nutrition. This young researcher designed a questionnaire and conducted a survey to determine "Why People Overeat?" The results of her project revealed that people overeat when they are depressed or bored; tense or envious. She also discovered that people ate more in the evenings.

As chairman of the congressional caucus for science and technology, I commend Christina for such an outstanding achievement and hope that she serves as an inspiration and role model to other young people.●

THE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA DEBATE TEAM PLACES SECOND IN THE 1985 NATIONAL DEBATE TOURNAMENT

HON. COOPER EVANS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. EVANS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the University of Iowa debate team for placing second at the 1985 National Debate Tournament held at Gonzaga University in Spokane, WA, March 29 through April 2, 1985.

Of the hundreds of teams that participated in debate throughout the Nation, only 62 are selected for national tournament. The 12th and final round of the tournament, between the University of Iowa and Harvard University was extremely close as it took the judges 1½ hours to come to a decision. The University of Iowa received the George Walker Memorial Trophy, signifying second place.

I take this moment to congratulate Iowa debaters Karla Leeper, who was named 10th best debater for the tournament, and Robert Garman; the Iowa coaches Robert Kemp, Dale Herbeck, John Katsulas, and Greg Phelps; as well as the Harvard University debate team for their fine accomplishments in debate. The timely topic for the year's tournament was the exploration and development of outer space.●

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present Wednesday afternoon, April 17, 1985, when, after 12:10 p.m., there was a vote on H.R. 1210, the National Science Foundation Authorization Act for fiscal year 1986. The bill passed by a vote of 407 to 4 and was rollcall No. 54. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, April 23, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

The Senate met at 8 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Eternal God, the pressure builds! Many enjoy the luxury of their opinions regarding vital national issues. They are free to speak, to argue, to pontificate, to criticize. But it remains with those who occupy the desks in this Chamber to decide. They are not infallible and no one knows that better than they; but the burden of judgment rests with them after all the deliberations are over, and they cannot "pass the buck." They are more deeply concerned than most and their legislative staffs do all in their power to provide comprehensive information. But facts are often confusing at best and the hours move inexorably to the moment of decision. The vote must be cast whatever the consequences. Gracious Lord, grant to these your servants wisdom and courage commensurate with their profound responsibility. "Your will be done on Earth as it is in Heaven." Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

COMMENDATION OF THE CHAPLAIN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me say that I commend again the Chaplain of the Senate. He phrases it well. We have another way of referring to that out in my part of the country, that it is easier to sit on the corral fence and watch the cowboy who tries to break the horse, but the credit goes to the fellow down in the arena doing it. We have a great many remarkable observers and commentators in this place. Again, the Chaplain puts it in beautiful perspective.

SCHEDULE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President pro tempore, the two leaders under the standing order enjoy the opportunity of 10 minutes each. Special orders this morning are in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senators PROXMIRE, WEICKER, DOMENICI, and SPECTER.

Mr. President, by unanimous consent, special orders not executed by the hour of 9 a.m. will resume following final disposition of Senate Joint Resolution 106, supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

If time permits, there will be routine morning business until the hour of 9 a.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes. By unanimous consent, the Senate will stand in recess from 12 until 2 p.m.

By unanimous consent entered into on April 4, 1985, at 9 a.m., the Senate will begin consideration on Senate Joint Resolution 106, supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

Senators DOLE, BENTSEN, HELMS, and BYRD all have given notice in writing, in accordance with rule No. V of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to suspend that part of the rules for the purpose of each proposing an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 106. That debate for a motion to suspend, and amendments, will be coming out of the 10-hour statutory limitation. Therefore, rollcall votes will be expected on motions, amendments, and eventually, final disposition of Senate Joint Resolution 106.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

I defer to the minority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank the assistant Republican leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve my time up to the point of the Senate's taking up of the Nicaraguan resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I encourage those who have special orders to proceed to the Chamber for that purpose, since that hour of 9 a.m. is in force under the unanimous-consent agreement.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR WEICKER

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to go on my special order ahead of Senator PROXMIRE and that he follow mine at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] is recognized.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the Chair.

S. 974—THE PROTECTION AND ADVOCACY FOR MENTALLY ILL PERSONS ACT OF 1985

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, Earl Warren, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, once said:

> When the weak or oppressed assert the rights that have been so long denied them, those in power inevitably resist on the basis of the necessity of tranquillity.

From the outside, State facilities for the mentally disabled, with their mostly rural settings, indeed look tranquil. In 3 days of testimony to the Subcommittees on the Handicapped, and Labor-Health and Human Services, and in a 6-month investigation by staff, the Senate received disturbing evidence of the willingness of many State and Federal officials to maintain that facade of tranquillity.

There was Wilbur Savidge, whose son went into a State facility for the retarded with the ability to walk and feed himself. Now, young Jonathan Savidge can do neither, and his father told us of a harrowing midnight ride to get Jonathan to the hospital on one occasion for the adequate emergency medical care he would otherwise have been denied. In little more than 4 years, Jonathan has been injured a total of 124 times.

There was the story of August Bartholomay, institutionalized for 44 years in a State facility, the last 3 years in a shower stall with nothing but a thin cotton sheet between his naked body and the tile floor.

And 14-year-old Chris Cocherham, whose parents were able to capture on film the scars and bruises of dozens of separate acts of violence and abuse.

As a U.S. Senator, and a member of the Appropriations Committee, I was outraged that the facility where this burtal abuse took place was certified by the United States to receive $8.5 million in fiscal year 1985.

The Cockerham family tried to contact the U.S. Justice Department, but despite the documents and the photographs the family provided to the Department, they were told repeatedly that more evidence would be needed to get the Nation's top civil rights enforcement agency involved.

The Savidge family tried to get the Justice Department to help as well. They were also turned down.

As an official of the Federal Government, I felt ashamed when Wilbur Savidge looked me in the eye and asked two reasonable questions:

> We would ask why does the Federal Government allow these atrocities to go unchecked? Who can we turn to when the Justice Department refuses to investigate abuse and death in State institutions?

Mr. Savidge tried to answer this question in the manner many Americans would; he called for a lawyer. But the answers Mr. Savidge received to his calls cannot be recorded as a proud moment for the legal profession.

Nine requests, nine lawyers, nine refusals. Mr. Savidge told us the attorneys he contacted seemed to agree, basically, that the investment in Jonathan's case was not worth the potential return. A retarded boy who developed a near-fatal brain infection, after periods when he was observed chewing on a urine soaked stocking and crawling through human feces in a State institution was not worth the return.

Fortunately for Jonathan, legal assistance was obtained through a special foundation set up by a man whose own son drowned because of neglect in a State institution.

In the case of August Bartholomay, his years in the shower stall might have gone past 3 years but for a lone employee who blew the whistle, and an attorney who worked 5 years to secure Augie's release and placement in a group home.

During 3 days of testimony, we heard that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of individuals without access to legal representation or advocacy, whose lives could be restored by those willing to give of their time and their talents.

We also heard that many of those whose job it is to protect the mentally disabled in institutions from the inside, are themselves walled in by rules that restrict both their access to the most basic information, and their ability to fully investigate conditions and acts of violence.

This is especially true as it relates to protecting the rights of the mentally ill. I am talking here about the basic right to live, without fear of physical harm, and even death. Without protection and aggressive advocacy this right guaranteed under the Constitution and Federal statutes is meaningless.

We heard from witnesses of rape cases between patients that were not investigated by State officials because they did not meet the State's definition of "abuse."

We heard of young people tied naked to the floor in four-point restraints for hours, or even days.

We heard of filthy living conditions where flies covered the residents as they sat, overmedicated, in their rooms day after day with no active treatment program and seemingly less hope.

A nurse told us of a State hospital that was found to be below "minimally accepted standards" for 2 years in a row, yet no action was taken by State or Federal officials who received her reports. At the same hospital, the nurse told us, some patients suffered malnutrition because there simply was not enough food provided.

A State senator told us he saw patients who were dehydrated because the staff would not provide them with water. The reason, incredible as it may seem, is that the staff did not want the patients urinating very often.

Yes, some of these patients are considered dangerous. But we would not allow society's most dangerous criminals to be treated in this fashion.

I might add that the investigative reporter who testified before the committee, who had done investigative reports both in mental institutions in New Mexico and the State prison facilities in New Mexico, said that, without question, he would rather be in the prison facilities than the mental institutions. Yet, these people are not criminals.

Likewise, we recognize the illness of these patients, yet we would not allow cancer patients or leukemia victims to suffer such deprivation.

For our part in the Congress, we cannot allow such atrocities to continue. There are matters of law that must be changed or adjusted so that our emotional reactions to the stories of abuse and neglect behind institutional walls are forged into action. In the face of flagrant and festering conditions of abuse and neglect, the Government's response has been indifference and delay.

I stand today to alter that response. I stand today to introduce a bill on behalf of myself, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. DODD, which will ensure that the rights of mentally ill persons residing in institutions and other residential treatment facilities will be protected.

This bill, the Protection and Advocacy For Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985, will provide for the establishment of a protection and advocacy program for the mentally ill in each State. This is not a new idea to the Congress. Protection and advocacy programs currently exist for our developmentally disabled citizens. The bill I introduce today would authorize similar protection to our citizens who require residential treatment because of mental illness. It would allow the investigation of reported incidents of abuse and neglect of those citizens, and the protection of their rights through enforcement of Federal and State statutes and the U.S. Constitution. And it enumerates a bill of rights for the mentally ill—rights which currently exist as title V of the Mental Systems Act, but which are relocated to the Protection and Advocacy For Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985.

Protection and advocacy programs for the mentally ill are not a new idea to this esteemed body. In the wake of a Presidential commission's recommendation, Congress passed the Mental Health Systems Act, which provided protection and advocacy services to these citizens. But this legislation was repealed with the passage of the 1981 Budget Act, which replaced most Federal mental health programs with a block grant.

In effect, passage of the Protection and Advocacy For Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985 will restore to the mentally ill the protection we have already recognized as essential for their full citizenship.

As we have seen, the interests of tranquillity and secrecy require that the voices within these walls be muffled and the truth, where it is told, be related in whispers between agonized family members and isolated advocates. In this climate the clear and insistent demands of the Constitution and Federal statutes exist as little more than rumors of hope.

This condition may fit well the passivity of this administration's legal officers or the bottom line of some State budgeteers. But it must no longer reflect the attitude of the Congress toward a group of our most dependent citizens.

I urge my colleagues to examine the record on these issues and join me in this vital reform. I ask unanimous consent that the Protection and Advocacy For Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985, in its entirety, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, these matters have been under investigation now for the best part of 2 years. I especially express my appreciation, on the record, to Steve Snider, Maureen Byrnes, Terry Muilenberg, Bob Wilson, Jane West, Marjorie Harris, and Tracy Crowley for the work they did in this investigation.

It also has to be said that, aside from whatever entertainment was supplied to the American people in the sense of hearings and what they saw by film and testimony, if it is to surpass entertainment, we have to do something. Otherwise, it is worse than if we had no hearings at all, because the matter has been laid before the American people. They have seen it, and they have turned their backs on it.

I realize no dramatic legislation will come forth de novo, but there is much fine tuning that can be done. The bill which I offer today is just such a fine tuning. It will go a long way with existing legislation to correct many of the situations which we witnessed during the course of those hearings.

In the final analysis, no legislation or no fine tuning will substitute for the proper community setting for the mentally retarded and mentally ill where, indeed, these persons are under the watchful eye of their neighbors rather than behind the walls of an institution. That is the best guarantee against abuse. Nobody would stand for 1 minute the treatment accorded these mentally ill and mentally retarded were it a member of their family or friend suffering from leukemia or Alzheimer's disease or cancer or whatever. But in the recesses of our mind we have set these people apart. We have put them closer to being criminal rather than being ill—90 percent of them can live normal, decent lives within our communities and be good neighbors given that opportunity. That will be the best guarantee against any abuse. But in the meantime, until we can accomplish that, and accomplish it well, not dumping them in the communities but placing them in the communities with support facilities, there are certain actions which should be taken immediately.

It was so appalling to me as I would read complaint after complaint of Justice Department action invariably taking 20 months, 30 months, 50 months. What if this were your child who was being beaten? What if this were your parent or your friend who was left in worse conditions than would be accorded an animal? I do not think any of us would wait 20 months or 50 months. We would act right away. Indeed, in many of these instances the parents and friends spoke of how, when they found out about the situation, they did everything they could to get their loved one, their child, out of the institution.

In this session of the Congress, I hope this legislation is passed both in the House and in the Senate and signed by the President—in this year, in the year 1985. There is nothing here which is so revolutionary it requires extensive hearings spanning a course of years. Rather, it should be our well-reasoned response to an atrocious and tragic portrait that has now been presented to us, presented to us now for viewing or presented to us for action. That is the question which arises with submission of this legislation.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Protection and Advocacy for Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) Mentally ill persons in State residential facilities are vulnerable to abuse and serious injury;

(2) Mentally ill persons in State residential facilities are subject to neglect, including lack of treatment, adequate nutrition, clothing, and health care; and

(3) State systems for monitoring compliance by State residential facilities with respect to the rights of mentally ill persons vary widely and are frequently inadequate.

(b) The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to ensure that the rights of mentally ill persons in residential facilities are protected; and

(2) to assist States to establish and operate a protection and advocacy system for mentally ill persons which will—

(A) protect and advocate the rights of such persons through activities to ensure the enforcement of the Constitution and Federal and State statutes; and

(B) investigate reported incidents of abuse and neglect of mentaly ill persons in residential facilites.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "abuse" means any act or failure to act by an employee or a resident of a residential facility which was performed, or which was failed to be performed, knowingly, recklessly, or intentionally, and which caused or may have caused physical injury to a mentally ill person in a residential facility, and includes acts such as the rape or sexual assault of a mentally ill person, the striking of a mentally ill person, the use of excessive force when placing a mentally ill person in bodily restraints, the unwarranted use of bodily restraints, the unwarranted use of chemical restraints, and the use of verbal threats of physical or emotional harm.

(2) The term "eligible system" means the system established in a State to protect and advocate the rights of persons with developmental disabilities under part C of the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act.

(3) The term "residential facility" means a publicly or privately operated institution, hospital, nursing home, or other facility or portion thereof which provides care 24 hours a day or mental health services to mentally ill persons.

(4) The term "mentally ill person" means an individual—

(A) for whom a diagnosis of mental illness has been made; and

(B) who has been classified as an inpatient in, or who resides for 24 hours a day in, a residential facility.

(5) The term "neglect" means an intentional or negligent act or omission by any person responsible for providing services in a residential facility which caused or may have caused physical or emotional injury to a mentally ill person or which placed a mentally ill person at risk of physical or emotional injury, and includes acts or omissions such as the failure to carry out a prescribed individual program plan or treatment plan for a mentally ill person, the failure to provide adequate nutrition, clothing, or health care to a mentally ill person, or the failure to provide a safe environment for a mentally ill person.

(6) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

(7) The term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, the Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

BILL OF RIGHTS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that each State should review and revise, if necessary, its laws to ensure that mental health patients receive the protection and services they require, and that in making such review and revision, States should take into account the recommendations of the President's Commission on Mental Health and the following:

(1) A person admitted to a program or facility for the purpose of receiving mental health services should be accorded the following:

(A) The right to appropriate treatment and related services in a setting and under conditions that—

(i) are the most supportive of such person's personal liberty; and

(ii) restrict such liberty only to the extent necessary consistent with such person's treatment needs, applicable requirements of law, and applicable judicial orders.

(B) The right to an individualized, written, treatment or service plan (such plan to be developed promptly after admission of such person), the right to treatment based on such plan, the right to periodic review and reassessment of treatment and related service needs, and the right to appropriate revision of such plan, including any revision necessary to provide a description of mental health services that may be needed after such person is discharged from such program or facility.

(C) The right to ongoing participation, in a manner appropriate to such person's capabilities, in the planning of mental health services to be provided such person (including the right to participate in the development and periodic revision of the plan described in subparagraph (B)), and, in connection with such participation, the right to be provided with a reasonable explanation, in terms and language appropriate to such person's condition and ability to understand, of—

(i) such person's general mental condition and, if such program or facility has provided a physical examination, such person's general physical condition;

(ii) the objectives of treatment;

(iii) the nature and significant possible adverse effects of recommended treatments;

(iv) the reasons why a particular treatment is considered appropriate;

(v) the reasons why access to certain visitors may not be appropriate; and

(vi) any appropriate and available alternative treatments, services, and types of providers of mental health services.

(D) The right not to receive a mode or course of treatment, established pursuant to the treatment plan, in the absence of such person's informed, voluntary, written consent to such mode or course of treatment, except treatment—

(i) during an emergency situation if such treatment is pursuant to or documented contemporaneously by the written order of a responsible mental health professional; or

(ii) as permitted under applicable law in the case of a person committed by a court to a treatment program or facility.

(E) The right not to participate in experimentation in the absence of such person's informed, voluntary, written consent, the right to appropriate protections in connection with such participation, including the right to a reasonable explanation of the procedure to be followed, the benefits to be expected, the relative advantages of alternative treatments, and the potential discomforts and risks, and the right and opportunity to revoke such consent.

(F) The right to freedom from restraint or seclusion, other than as a mode or course of treatment or restraint or seclusion during an emergency situation if such restraint or seclusion is pursuant to or documented contemporaneously by the written order of a responsible mental health professional.

(G) The right to a humane treatment environment that affords reasonable protection from harm and appropriate privacy to such person with regard to personal needs.

(H) The right to confidentiality of such person's records.

(I) The right to access, upon request, to such person's mental health care records, except such person may be refused access to—

(i) information in such records provided by a third party under assurance that such information shall remain confidential; and

(ii) specific material in such records if the health professional responsible for the mental health services concerned has made a determination in writing that such access would be detrimental to such person's health, except that such material may be made available to a similarly licensed health professional selected by such person and such health professional may, in the exercise of professional judgment, provide such person with access to any or all parts of such material or otherwise disclose the information contained in such material to such person.

(J) The right, in the case of a person admitted on a residential or inpatient care basis, to converse with others privately, to have convenient and reasonable access to the telephone and mails, and to see visitors during regularly scheduled hours, except that, if a mental health professional treating such person determines that denial of access to a particular visitor is necessary for treatment purposes, such mental health professional may, for a specific, limited, and reasonable period of time, deny such access if such mental health professional has ordered such denial in writing and such order has been incorporated in the treatment plan for such person. An order denying such access should include the reasons for such denial.

(K) The right to be informed promptly at the time of admission and periodically thereafter, in language and terms appropriate to such person's condition and ability to understand, of the rights described in this section.

(L) The right to assert grievances with respect to infringement of the rights described in this section, including the right to have such grievances considered in a fair, timely, and impartial grievance procedure provided for or by the program or facility.

(M) Notwithstanding subparagraph (J), the right of access to (including the opportunities and facilities for private communication with) any available—

(i) rights protection service within the program or facility;

(ii) rights protection service within the State mental health system designed to be available to such person;

(iii) system to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons established under section 5; and

(iv) qualified advocate; for the purpose of receiving assistance to understand, exercise, and protect the rights described in this section and in other provisions of law.

(N) The right to exercise the rights described in this section without reprisal, including reprisal in the form of denial of any appropriate, available treatment.

(O) The right to referral as appropriate to other providers of mental health services upon discharge.

(2)(A) The rights described in this section should be in addition to and not in derogation of any other statutory or constitutional rights.

(B) The rights to confidentiality of and access to records as provided in subparagraphs (H) and (I) of paragraph (1) should remain applicable to records pertaining to a person after such person's discharge from a program or facility.

(3)(A) No otherwise eligible person should be denied admission to a program or facility for mental health services as a reprisal for the exercise of the rights described in this section.

(B) Nothing in this section should—

(i) obligate an individual mental health or health professional to administer treatment contrary to such professional's clinical judgment;

(ii) prevent any program or facility from discharging any person for whom the provision of appropriate treatment, consistent with the clinical judgment of the mental health professional primarily responsible for such person's treatment, is or has become impossible as a result of such person's refusal to consent to such treatment;

(iii) require a program or facility to admit any person who, while admitted on prior occasions to such program or facility, has repeatedly frustrated the purposes of such admissions by withholding consent to proposed treatment; or

(iv) obligate a program or facility to provide treatment services to any person who is admitted to such program or facility solely for diagnostic or evaluative purposes.

(C) In order to assist a person admitted to a program or facility in the exercise or protection of such person's rights, such person's attorney or legal representatives should have reasonable access to—

(i) such person;

(ii) the areas of the program or facility where such person has received treatment, resided, or had access; and

(iii) pursuant to the written authorization of such person, the records and information pertaining to such person's diagnosis, treatment, and related services described in paragraph (1)(I).

(D) Each program and facility should post a notice listing and describing, in language and terms appropriate to the ability of the persons to whom such notice is addressed to understand, the rights described in this section of all persons admitted to such program or facility. Each such notice should conform to the format and content for such notices, and should be posted in all appropriate locations.

(4)(A) In the case of a person adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction as being incompetent to exercise the right to consent to treatment or experimentation described in subparagraph (D) or (E) of paragraph (1), or the right to confidentiality of or access to records described in subparagraph (H) or (I) of such paragraph, or to provide authorization as described in paragraph (3)(C)(iii), such right may be exercised or such authorization may be provided by the individual appointed by such court as such person's guardian or representative for the purpose of exercising such right or such authorization.

(B) In the case of a person who lacks capacity to exercise the right to consent to treatment or experimentation under subparagraph (D) or (E) of paragraph (1), or the right to confidentiality of or access to records described in subparagraph (H) or (I) of such paragraph, or to provide authorization as described in paragraph (3)(C)(iii), because such person has not attained an age considered sufficiently advanced under State law to permit the exercise of such right or such authorization to be legally binding, such right may be exercised or such authorization may be provided on behalf of such person by a parent or legal guardian of such person.

(C) Notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B), in the case of a person admitted to a program or facility for the purpose of receiving mental health services, no individual employed by or receiving any remuneration from such program or facility should act as such person's guardian or representative.

PROTECTION AND ADVOCACY OF THE RIGHTS OF MENTALLY ILL PERSONS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) The eligible system of a State may apply for an allotment for each fiscal year under this section.

(2) Payments from such allotment shall be used by such eligible system to establish in the State a system to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons which complies with subsection (b).

(3) An eligible system may not use more than 5 percent of any allotment under this section for any fiscal year for the costs of monitoring the administration of the system which complies with subsection (b).

(b)(1) A system established in a State pursuant to paragraph (2) to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons shall—

(A) have the authority to pursue legal, administrative, and other appropriate remedies to ensure the protection of mentally ill persons who are receiving treatment in the State;

(B) be independent of any agency which provides treatment services (other than advocacy services) to mentally ill persons;

(C) have reasonable access to residential facilities for mentally ill persons in the State;

(D) be able to obtain access to the records of a mentally ill person if a complaint has been received by the system from or on behalf of such person;

(E) be provided with a copy of each annual survey report and plan of corrections for cited deficiencies made pursuant to title XIX of the Social Security Act with respect to any residential facility for mentally ill persons within 30 days after the completion of each report or plan;

(F) establish a board which complies with paragraph (2) to advise the system on policies and priorities to be carried out in protecting and advocating the rights of mentally ill persons; and

(G) on January 1, 1987, and January 1 of each succeeding year, prepare and transmit to the Secretary a report describing the activities, accomplishments, and expenditures of the system during the most recently completed fiscal year.

(2) Each board established under paragraph (1)(F) shall be composed of members who are attorneys, mental health professionals, individuals from the public who are knowledgeable about mental illness, family members of mentally ill persons, and mentally ill persons who have received or who are receiving assistance from the system which complies with this subsection. At least one-third of the members of each such board shall be mentally ill persons who have received or are receiving such assistance.

(c)(1)(A) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Secretary shall allot the amounts appropriated under subsection (h) for a fiscal year to eligible systems on the basis of a formula prescribed by the Secretary which is based equally—

(i) on the population of each State in which an eligible system has been established, and

(ii) on the population of each State weighted by its relative per capita income.

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A)(ii), the term "relative per capita income" means the quotient of the per capita income of the United States and the per capita income of the State, except that if the State is Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or the Virgin Islands, the quotient shall be considered to be one.

(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1)—

(A) the allotment of the eligible system of each of the several States and the District of Columbia shall not be less than $125,000; and

(B) the allotment of the eligible system of each of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or the Virgin Islands shall not be less than $67,000.

(3) The amount of an allotment to an eligible system for a fiscal year which the Secretary determines will not be required by the eligible system during the period for which it is available for the purpose for which allotted shall be available for reallotment by the Secretary from time to time, on such date or dates as the Secretary may fix (but not earlier than thirty days after the Secretary has published notice of the intention of the Secretary to make such reallotment in the Federal Register), to other eligible systems with respect to which such a determination has not been made, in proportion to the original allotments of such eligible systems for such fiscal year, but with such proportionate amount for any of such other eligible systems being reduced to the extent it exceeds the sum of the Secretary estimates such eligible system needs and shall be able to use during such period; and the total of such reductions shall be similarly reallotted among the eligible systems whose proportionate amounts were not so reduced. Any amount so reallotted to an eligible system for a fiscal year shall be deemed to be a part of its allotment under paragraphs (1) and (2) for such fiscal year.

(d) No allotment may be made to an eligible system unless an application therefor is submitted to the Secretary. Each such application shall contain—

(1) assurances that amounts paid to such system from an allotment under this section will be used to supplement and not to supplant the level of non-Federal funds available in the State in which such eligible system is established to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons; and

(2) such other information as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe.

(e) For each fiscal year, the Secretary shall make payments to each eligible system from its allotment under subsection (c). Any amount paid to an eligible system for a fiscal year and remaining unobligated at the end of such year shall remain available to such system for the purposes for which it was made for the next fiscal year.

(f)(1) The Secretary shall include in each report required under section 107(c) of the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act a separate statement describing—

(A) the activities, accomplishments, and expenditures of systems to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons supported with payments from allotments under this section, including—

(i) a specification of the total number of mentally ill persons served by such systems;

(ii) a description of the types of activities undertaken by such systems;

(iii) a description of the types of residential facilities for mentally ill persons with respect to which such activities are undertaken;

(iv) a description of the manner in which such activities are initiated; and

(v) a description of the accomplishments resulting from such activities;

(B) a description of the relationships between—

(i) systems to protect and advocate the rights of mentally ill persons supported with payments from allotments under this section; and

(ii)(I) activities conducted by States to protect and advocate such rights; and

(II) mechanisms established by residential facilities for mentally ill persons to protect and advocate such rights; and

(C) recommendations for activities and services to improve the protection and advocacy of the rights of mentally ill persons and an estimate of the amounts necessary to carry out such activities and services.

(2) In preparing the statement required by paragraph (1), the Secretary shall use and include information submitted to the Secretary in the reports required under subsection (b)(1)(G).

(g) The Secretary shall carry out this section through the Director of the National Institute of Mental Health.

(h) For allotments under this section, there are authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $10,500,000 for fiscal year 1987.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. Title V of the Mental Health Systems Act is repealed.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, does the Senator from New Mexico have a special order to speak at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DOMENICI

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Thank you, Mr. President.

S. 975—SECURITIES SAFETY AND SOUNDNESS ACT OF 1985

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Securities Safety and Soundness Act of 1985 to temporarily halt certain financing schemes that threaten, in my opinion, our capital markets and financial institutions. Specifically, the proposed act places a moratorium through the remainder of this year on the use of so-called junk bonds to finance hostile takeovers. In addition, the bill permanently prohibits federally insured financial institutions from purchasing additional junk bonds.

As we are all well aware, our Nation's deficit has reached unprecedented proportions; $185 billion in 1984 and a projected $222 billion in 1985, and absent some dramatic action by Congress it will not go down but go up. While on Capitol Hill we are making efforts to curb Government expenditures by $52 billion and making sure that every dollar is used wisely, it seems ironic that Wall Street is engaging in 14 billion dollars' worth of takeovers which could result in the infusion of massive corporate debt into the economy. I further believe that the financial soundness of some of our federally insured depository institutions is being undermined when these institutions participate in and act as part of the secondary market for these noninvestment grade securities.

Of course, not all mergers and acquisitions are tainted and neither is issuing noninvestment quality bonds in certain instances. My concerns rest with the recent rash of corporate takeovers that have used junk bonds with the expectation of selling the acquired firm's assets to service the debt. The result is reduced research and development and exploration expenditures, lost jobs, shortsighted management, and potential disaster, especially in the event of an economic downturn. These concerns have led me to introduce this bill. The threat to the stability and financial soundness of some of our financial institutions lends additional support to this measure.

Concerns expressed by the business community are numerous. Some of the most significant are:

Creation of a speculative climate that encourages professional traders to become shareholders with the objective of seeing the company sold.

Financing of the acquisition largely from the assets of the target company followed by liquidation of the assets to pay off the debt.

Loading the company with debt that weakens it for the future.

I emphasize that my proposal regarding takeovers is a temporary one; however, my proposal regarding financial institutions would be permanent. I am not wedded to the bill's precise language, rather I am interested in focusing the debate on questionable practices.

History has shown us a number of cases where speculative bubbles have hurt investors, corporations, and the economy as a whole. We can ill afford to ignore warning signals of impending trouble. Thus, while various committees continue to examine problems associated with hostile takeovers, I urge us to apply caution and temporarily stop the use of this risky financing mechanism until we can learn all facts and craft legislation that appropriately addresses the situation.

A number of my colleagues have introduced legislation which deals with hostile takeovers and questionable practices associated with them. I am a cosponsor of Senator CHAFEE's and Senator BOREN's bills. I also appreciate the efforts Senator METZENBAUM is initiating to create a more rational and fairer tender offer process with his so-called Shareholder Fairness Act.

Before turning to the major elements of my bill I would like to describe how junk bonds are used in hostile takeovers. Following the bill's description I will detail some of my reasons for advocating a moratorium.

JUNK BONDS IN HOSTILE TAKEOVERS

A junk bond is a noninvestment grade high risk, high yield corporate security. Investment grade is defined as issues rated BB or higher by Standard & Poor's and Baa or higher by Moody's.

The new issue junk bond market has grown from approximately $250 million in 1979 to $14.3 billion in 1984. The secondary market in outstanding junk bond issues is estimated at $65 billion. Examples of recent hostile takeover bids that included junk bonds are as follows: $5.4 billion for Ted Turner to take over CBS; $3 to $3.4 billion for Mesa Partners II to take over Unocal Corp.; $1.78 billion for Golden Nugget Inc. to take over Hilton Hotels Corp.; $1.02 billion for Lorimar to take over Multimedia, Inc.; $807 million for Sir James Goldsmith to take over Crown Zellerbach; $600 million for Coastal Corp. to take over ANR Co.; $395 million for Triangle Industries to take over National Can Corp.; and $275 million for Carl Icahn to take over Uniroyal.

All of these transactions were to be financed with noninvestment quality bonds carrying interest rates of 15 to 18 percent. These interest rates are generally higher than the rates of return the businesses are likely to earn in periods of economic downturn. If a recession should occur, the new management may experience difficulties in servicing the speculative debt. The leveraging of corporate America today may result in significant bankruptcies for corporations and banks that hold these securities in the future.

BILL PROVISIONS

My bill is simple: it amends the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 by establishing a moratorium through December 31, 1985, on hostile takeovers where at least 20 percent of the acquisition is financed by junk bonds. A takeover is considered to be hostile if the acquirer would, first, be entitled to 15 percent or more of the target firm's securities, and second, the acquisition is disapproved by a majority of the issuer's board of directors who are not officers or employers.

The second major component of the Securities Safety and Soundness Act focuses on depository institutions that are federally insured. Such institutions are prohibited from adding noninvestment grade obligations to their portfolios.

The exact language of the bill is included at the end of my remarks. I shall now address more fully the concerns I alluded to before.

EXPLORATION/RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT DECLINE

A December 3, 1984, report by Salomon Bros., Inc., indicates that major oil company U.S. exploration and production expenditures for 1985 are below the total for 1984. The surveyed companies attributed this decline to the recent trend of mergers among large oil companies. Furthermore, many companies expected to underspend their original 1984 budgets—43 percent of those surveyed. The most common reason for this underspending was to conserve capital to acquire companies or properties.

Two examples of firms that have been involved in hostile takeovers and have reduced their U.S. exploration and production expenditures are Chevron and Phillips Petroleum. The Salomon survey shows that Chevron's expenditures in this area dropped 9 percent and Phillips' fell over 32 percent between 1984 and budgeted expenditures for 1985. The majority of other surveyed firms either maintained or increased their expenditures.

Not only is the domestic exploration of merged companies suffering, exploration and drilling programs overseas are similarly affected. Projects in the Gulf of Mexico, China, and Kenya have been postponed.

Operations are closing and people are being laid off in the research and development areas. Gulf Oil, bought by Chevron, has recently closed its Pittsburgh research facility. Both of the firms, along with other merged companies, have withdrawn research grants from MIT, the University of Texas, Stanford, Columbia, the Colorado School of Mines, the University of Wyoming, and the University of Southern California.

When debts must be serviced, research and development is often the first to go. Experience in the energy industry is demonstrating that buying out present stockholders with debt exacerbates this shortsighted trend.

Right now roughly one-half of this Nation's imported oil comes from an area of the world where men are killing each other with reckless abandon. I believe that all of us have a stake in continuing to explore for more oil and in looking for alternative sources of energy. This becomes even more important in light of Department of Energy projections that show our imports doubling over the next decade. The odds are high enough that we will suffer further disruptions in supply from the Middle East over the next decade that the short-term view imposed by the oil industry's need to meet its increased debt obligations will be considered a grave mistake.

ENSURING THE INTEGRITY OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Deregulation of both the asset and liability sides of the balance sheet under the Garn-St Germain Act and the Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act of 1980 did not envision that federally insured institutions would become participants in or involved in the secondary market for noninvestment quality bonds. Such speculation has nothing to do with helping savings and loans provide housing to America. Such speculation has nothing to do with helping banks compete with Sears, Roebuck. Furthermore, I do not believe that our Federal deposit insurance fund should be jeopardized to insulate such financial institutions from this type of investment practice. Regardless of the congressional intent, financial institutions and pension funds are actively investing in noninvestment quality bonds and securities.

Many proponents of these bonds point to their historically low default rate. But with the rapid emergence of new uses for these securities we should not assume a similar rate for the future. I am not persuaded by performance studies on bonds issued by companies like Chrysler. These studies are unpersuasive and do not address my concerns about the risk involved in this new generation of bond issuers. It is an understatement to say that the quality of a bond issued by a new shell corporation created as part of a hostile takeover bears any resemblance to a well-established company. However, it is no understatement when I say that the volume of these new bonds is astronomical. Quality and volume are two reasons why this question needs to be resolved soon.

The prospect of an economic downturn is even more alarming. Approximately 80 percent of outstanding new issue noninvestment quality bonds were issued during a time of economic expansion and generally declining interest rates. In the event of a recession, companies laden with debt could experience severe cash flow problems. These issuers are likely to default with much of the financial loss being shouldered by federally insured financial institutions. FSLIC and FDIC are not insurance policies against speculative risk, and they should not be.

Let me suggest that unless we take action to prohibit federally insured financial institutions from participating in, and serving as part of the secondary market for these bonds, sometime in the not too distant future, the Senate will be debating another bailout for our financial institutions. I would venture to guess that the institutions will say, "help us, we only bought noninvestment grade investments because Congress allowed us to."

I am not alone in my concern for this issue. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board is working on a study to determine the extent of S&L participation. Chairman Grey at the Bank Board has expressed his concern and caution. By introducing this bill I am expressing my concern and caution.

CONCLUSION

In summary, I would like to reiterate that although I do not portend to be an expert on the technicalities of hostile acquisitions and methods used to finance them, I strongly believe in the need to maintain a healthy economy and the safety and soundness of our financial institutions. And this is the gist of my bill. By placing a temporary moratorium on hostile takeovers which are financed by takeover securities and prohibiting federally insured financial institutions from investing the taxpayers' funds into these high risk securities I hope to buy time for us to examine the complexities surrounding this issue.

The fact that numerous agencies, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Reserve, Department of Treasury, Department of Labor, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation are all concerned with these so-called junk bonds lends credence to the degree of complexity we are talking about. I hope that my colleagues will join me in endorsing a cautious approach and I request unanimous consent that the RECORD be left open until the end of the day so that additional cosponsors of the Securities Safety and Soundness Act of 1985 may be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that three articles that I am sending to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN IDEA WHOSE TIME HAS GONE

(By Allan Sloan and Allan Dodds Frank)

Have you ever wondered where the money for the current wave of corporate takeovers comes from? Of course, commercial banks are financing a good part of this frenetic and costly asset-shuffling. But a growing portion of the money flowing to the T. Boone Pickenses and Saul Steinbergs of the world comes from savings and loan associations.

Savings and loan associations? Takeovers? Aren't S&Ls supposed to be making home mortgage loans? Why are they financing corporate piracy?

Credit the law unintended consequences. Two years ago, with savings and loans dying by the hundreds, Congress and various states freed S&Ls to engage in nonmortgage businesses. The theory was that expanding the power of S&Ls would help homeowners, because profits from new businesses would allow S&Ls to subsidize their sickly mortgage portfolios.

But markets are perverse. Instead of acting the way politicians hoped they would, many savings and loans are using their new freedom to lend money where it will earn the highest return—and takeovers do pay well. Just what you would expect, unless you were a politician.

No one expected S&Ls to use their new powers to support takeovers, using federally insured deposits the way banks do. But you can't liberate an industry as big and diverse as S&Ls—$900 billion of assess and 3,400 institutions—and predict what will happen. Instead of sticking to automobile or commercial loans, as the legislation intended, some sharp-pencil boys running S&Ls realized there was a hell of a lot more money to be made financing Steinbergs and Pickenses in million-dollar pieces than in making 510,000 car loans. They also figures it was better to buy ten-year junk bonds yielding 16% than make 30-year home mortgages at 14%.

Under the post-1982 rules S&Ls could raise cheap money by selling deposits through brokers. Because of arcane S&L accounting rules those cheap deposits could leverage an S&L owner's cash investment 200 or 300 times. No other institutions had this degree of leverage. It was granted to the savings and loans because they were presumed to be safe, and the higher leverage would help them help Americans buy homes.

The irony is that the new powers aren't helping the mainline, traditional S&Ls, the ones they were designed to save. Many of these institutions, entering the fray with little capital and not much expertise, are finding it devilishly difficult to compete with banks for run-of-the-mill new business—commercial and consumer loans, checking accounts and trust powers.

But if the new rules didn't do a great deal for conventional savings and loans, they did suggest an idea for some folks with a yen to make use of Other People's Money. Here was a way to raise relatively cheap money from the public under federal guarantees, and to do with it as you pleased. No need for expensive head and branch offices, no need for costly mortgage evaluation. With securities trading a little slow, there are all those stockbrokers out there willing to sell certificates of deposit for you. And what will it cost you? About $1.50 on $100, far cheaper than renting a palatial building, filling it with clerks and offering free videocassette recorders to new depositors.

Heritage Savings & Loan Association in St. George, Utah has trebled its assets in a year, even though it has sold three of its four offices and raises money chiefly through stockbrokers. Instead of doing business with local folks in St. George, a desert community 115 miles northeast of Las Vegas, Heritage gets money via brokered deposits and advances from the Federal Home Loan Bank of Seattle, and invests the money in mortgage-backed securities bought from dealers.

By operating as it does, explains Heritage Chairman H. Brent Beesley, the former head of the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corp., Heritage can match assets with liabilities and lock in a profit, protecting itself against changes in interest rates. "You can't do that if you're restricted to the St. George market," he says.

Beesley himself works not in Utah but in the Jacksonville, Fla. headquarters of Charter Co., which acquired Heritage in October 1983 by agreeing to put $4 million of capital into it. The S&L, unlike the businesses that put Charter into Chapter 11, is quite profitable. Heritage, founded in 1917, had foundered in 1983 precisely because it wasn't protected from interest-rate risk. It had used short-term deposits to make "safe" long-term, fixed-rate mortgage loans. Though the loans were sound, Heritage's capital was wiped out after interest rates rose sharply and it had to pay more for deposits than its mortgages were yielding.

We don't cite Beesley's S&L as a horror story—the money does, after all, find its way back into the mortgage markets—but as a relatively benign example of how S&Ls are using their new powers to move far beyond their old boundaries. Beesley's S&L is positively old-fashioned compared with some of what's been going on.

Butterfield Savings of Santa Ana, Calif. has acquired the 33-restaurant Love's barbecue chain and 10 Wendy's outlets. First Texas Savings Association of Dallas, a $7 billion S&L, has purchased hundreds of millions of dollars worth of junk bonds. Columbia Savings of Beverly Hills, Calif., the Belzberg family's Far West S&L, and a group of other S&Ls helped finance Saul Steinberg's raid on Disney, Boone Pickens' raid on Gulf Oil and presumably one involved in his raid on Phillips Petoleum. Financial Corp. of America bought 10 billion shares of American Express stock in a takeover try and 900,000 shares of Walt Disney as an arbitrage play. Goldome of Buffalo, N.Y. is using tax-loss carryforwards to buy into leveraged buyouts. Western Savings & Loan of Phoenix bought and sold 25% of Del E. Webb Corp., the casino company, and has invested $35 million in Broadview Savings of Cleveland in return for Broadview's buying $35 million of Western's Arizona real estate. Olney Savings Association of Olney, Tex. even bought the local funeral home, which it sold last year.

What do funeral homes and barbecue restaurants and leveraged buyouts have to do with financing housing, which is the thrift industry's reason for being? Nothing.

Many of the new, diversified S&Ls say, for the record, that they are using profits from their diversified business to subsidize their mortgage department. Off the record, many say they keep their mortgage departments only because they are afraid that if they stop making mortgages, some future regulator will rule they aren't an S&L, and take away their charter. Does this sound familiar? Of course. Don't bars in some states serve a few dishes to keep up the fiction that they are really restaurants serving booze on the side?

While savings and loans are still major factors in the mortgage business, mortgages and mortgage-backed securities make up a declining portion of the S&L industry's assets (see chart, p. 87).

Anything wrong with S&Ls preferring nonmortgage business? Isn't that capitalism? Sure. But why do we need special thrift institutions with special subsidies to do these things?

Deregulation was presented to the public as a way to keep S&Ls in the housing business. But the way it is working out, the thrift institutions that manage to survive will look less and less like institutions whose role is to provide reasonably priced home mortgages. By "saving" S&Ls, then, the politicians turned them into something different from what they were intended to be.

In the old days, say five years ago, there was a clear distinction between savings and loans and their deadly enemies, the commercial banks. S&Ls were allowed to pay an extra quarter point to savers and could offer relatively cheap mortgage loans because of tax breaks. In return for this protected universe, the thrifts agreed to restrict themselves primarily to mortgage lending. Only banks could offer checking accounts, trust services and commercial and consumer loans.

As long as interest rates were relatively low (25 years ago 8% was considered outrageously high for a home mortgage), there were no problems. It was a tidy universe in which the thrifts prospered by putting short-term deposits into long-term mortgages that carried little credit risk—that is, the risk that the thrift would lose money if customers defaulted.

But S&Ls were vulnerable to something more dangerous than credit risk: interest-rate risk. Borrowing short and lending long left savings and loans naked if rising rates wiped out profits and devastated the value of their mortgage portfolio.

Inadvertently, Paul Volcker, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, did in the industry. He allowed interest rates to rise to levels previously undreamed of in the U.S. Almost overnight in the early 1980s, hundreds of thrifts were so far underwater that they would have needed a submarine to come up. In addition to adopting whistling-past-the-graveyard accounting, the industry's answer to its problems was to seek broad new powers. These powers, granted by the Garn-St Germain bill of 1982, included the right to offer checking and trust services and to make consumer and commercial loans. The bill also allowed thrifts and commercial banks to pay whatever rate was necessary to attract deposits. Garn-St Germain inspired some states to pass deregulation bills granting their state-chartered institutions even greater powers than Garn-St Germain granted to federally chartered thrifts.

It's at the state-chartered thrifts that most abuses of S&L charters take place. Several states, primarily in the Sunbelt, allow their S&Ls to do virtually anything—buy stocks, enter real estate joint ventures, engage in outside business. These are powers most banks only dream of.

By accepting Garn-St Germain's gift of many of the powers of banks, the thrifts blurred the distinction between bank and S&L, and raised the question of whether thrifts any longer deserve their special benefits. These include lenient capital requirements and the ability to get cheap money from Federal Home Loan Banks, which borrow it by using the Treasury's credit rating.

What was intended to bolster a social goal—housing—ends up financing greenmail and stock speculation. Stock speculation? Before he was deposed as czar of Financial Corp. of America, Charles Knapp (Forbes, July 30) frequently used this S&L's money to buy stocks on a grand scale: 5% of American Express, 2.5% of Walt Disney.

More popular than stock speculation for the S&Ls, however, is real estate speculation. That's potentially very lucrative but exceptionally risky, especially for S&Ls already in such weakened condition that they have little capital left to lose. "There is a big difference between lending 80% of value, which is what S&Ls are used to doing, and putting your own money on the line," says Christopher Leinberger, president of Robert Charles Lesser & Co., a California real estate consulting firm. "In a loan, you're protected by the equity the developer puts up. If a joint venture screws up, the developer walks away, and the S&L is stuck."

There are indications that many S&Ls have run into trouble in the real estate business. Beverly Hills S&L, which is run by developer Paul Amir, reported recently that it lost $10 million in the third quarter, $4.5 million of it represented by negative cash flow on a hotel the S&L owns. Empire Savings of Mesquite, Tex. collapsed because of massive losses in condominiums in which it invested.

It was ever thus. Politicans can make rules, but markets produce results. In the case of S&L deregulation, little effort seems to have gone into trying to figure out how S&Ls would act, as opposed to how politicans felt they should. The Garn-St Germain bill contains a preamble proclaiming its intent to allow S&Ls to continue investing in housing and limits the amount that federally chartered S&Ls can put into new businesses. But, while the bill contains incentives for S&L to hold mortgages, it doesn't penalize them if they don't.

Senator Jake Garn (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate banking committee, says he didn't intend to encourage thrifts to give up their role as specialized housing lenders. But it is happening in spite of his intention. Ironically, it looks as if traditional, mortgage-oriented thrifts—those that deregulation was supposed to help—have traded their birthright of protected turf for the right to engage in businesses that aren't going to help them much, if at all. "The powers that Garn-St Germain gave the thrifts was like giving them permission to sell ice in the wintertime," says Ernest Leff, a California S&L lawyer.

Richard Pratt, president of Merrill Lynch Mortgages Capital, Inc., who was chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board in 1982, says he made it clear that Garn-St Germain was the end of the thrifts as a special industry. "You can't have all sorts of institutions competing to buy money in the marketplace, and then tell thrifts they can only do certain things with it," Pratt says. "If you deregulate what you pay for liabilities, you have to deregulate what can be done with assets." House banking committee member Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) agrees. "It used to be that the thrifts could argue, with just about complete acceptance by the Congress, that they provided as special service and deserve special treatment," he says. "Those days are fading, and will be gone shortly."

Scattered through this article are tables showing how slim are the thrifts' profit margins, how high their failure rate and how increasingly large are payouts from the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corp.'s fund. If the FSLIC insurance fund taps out, Congress has pledged the full faith and credit of the U.S. to supplement it. That gives us all a stake in what happens to the thrifts. Does the taxpayer want to bail out an S&L that went bust through speculating in real estate, in stocks, in low-grade bonds?

The S&Ls' insurance fund, which seems to have well under $5 billion available despite its stated value of $6.3 billion, can't possibly cope with a rash of large failures. It's no coincidence that when Financial Corp. of America suffered a $6 billion deposit run last summer, the Federal Home Loan Bank of San Francisco, rather than the deposit insurance fund, provided the necessary money.

Federal Home Loan Bank Board Chairman Edwin Gray seems to be trying to turn back the clock to a time when banks were banks, thrifts were thrifts and markets were local rather than national. Good luck, King Canute.

Gray, who declined to be interviewed, wants S&Ls to make and hold adjustable-rate mortgages. That would diminish interest-rate risk but increase credit risk—borrowers might not be able to afford higher payments if rates change. In any event, customers are resisting ARMs. And ARMs aren't automatically worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Gray has ordered the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp. to bolster S&Ls' capital by giving them $600 million of preferred stock, a drop in the bucket. He wants to rein in state-chartered S&Ls. He is calling for unrealistic capital requirements for S&Ls that want to expand, and is trying to stop stockbrokers from selling CDs.

But Gray is dealing with symptoms, not the problem. The problem is that the world has changed. The advent of national capital markets, for instance, makes it more efficient for S&Ls to raise money through Merrill Lynch than to build branches every three blocks.

The functions of thrifts and banks are converging. Giving S&Ls special privileges only opens the door to things that regulators never intended, like financing greenmail and real estate speculation. Sure, S&L depositors should be protected. But the only people with a stake in preserving thrifts as a separate class of institution are the people who run them. Remember that when the S&L industry comes, little tin cup in hand, asking for another bailout.

THE POWER AND THE PERILS OF JUNK BONDS

(By Fred R. Bleakley)

The financial press has been bulging with the latest examples of a world seemingly gone mad with corporate takeover fever. On Thursday alone, no fewer than half a dozen deals for companies worth a billion dollars or more each were reported to be on the trading block. The big names in corporate raiding—T. Boone Pickens, Carl Icahn and Sir James Goldsmith—were all on the scene, along with newcomer Stephen Wynn of Golden Nugget.

However varied the prey and their pursuers, there is one common denominator in all of these deals: All are likely to rely on an increasingly popular technique—known as junk bond financing—that has raised the stakes and helped fuel the takeover frenzy that has gripped the nation in recent months.

In the arsenal of today's takeover buccaneers, the junk bond is the latest—and perhaps most deadly—weapon, sparking so much takeover activity that Congress is now scrutinizing it and corporate executives across the country are charging that it threatens the very fabric of American business.

"Junk bonds are the Holy Grail for hostile takeovers, at least for now" says Roger Miller, co-director of mergers and acquisitions at Salomon Brothers, the firm that often defends companies from raiders.

Junk bond financing involves putting together a package of securities whose high rates of interest and dividends will be paid mostly by the target company once it is acquired. All a raider must do to lunge at even the mightiest corporation is to get a small circle of private investors to make a commitment to purchase such securities.

With that financing lineup in hand, or even the threat of it, he can then mount a takeover bid, especially when a target company's management is unresponsive to a friendly overture. And, unlike the old days, he can stalk his prey without first winning his banker's support.

Today, the reach of the junk bond is vast and growing, drawing a widening circle of investors, raiders and investment bankers. With junk bond financing, takeover entrepreneurs of even modest size can rattle a mighty saber when attacking a giant prey. Small corporations can go big-game hunting. And many major corporations, newly vulnerable, must now scramble to lift their stock prices out of striking range. It is a development that is causing increasing alarm.

"Junk bond financing of takeovers is a further exacerbation of increased leverage in the economy," says Martin Lipton of Wachtel, Lipton, Rosen & Katz, one of the law firms used most frequently by giant corporations under attack. He believes that increasing speculation and dependence on debt is "creating a system which historically goes back to the tulip bubble in the 17th century; the South Sea bubble in the 18th century, the money panics in the 19th century and in 1929, which have resulted in crashes, panics and great devastation."

What's more, the small group of junk bond investors, which includes such aggressive financiers as the Belzberg brothers, Charles Knapp and Saul Steinberg, has come under heavy criticism. It is said to be an opportunistic cadre more eager to collect commitment fees and share in a raider's legal blackmail of a company—greenmail—than to sock away the securities as a long-term investment. And critics say that despite the raiders' claims that they are the champions of shareholders, hostile takeovers financed by junk bonds are often structured so that many original investors in a target company can be worse off than before.

The issues are called junk because in most cases so far, most, if not all, of the debt may not qualify for a blue-chip rating, tarnished by the heavy debt load that the acquired company will carry. Only securities rated Baa and above by Moody's, for instance, are considered "investment grade," meaning that they are, presumably, safe for even the most conservative investors.

But the name junk bonds—which Wall Street firms prefer to call "high-yield securities" instead—belies their power. Saul Steinberg used them in his thrust at Walt Disney Productions last June, so alarming the company that it paid a premium to buy out his shares. Carl Icahn, in February, used them, too, forcing Phillips Petroleum to yield to a recapitalization plan, which netted him a hefty profit. Two large friendly takeovers now pending, National Can Company and American Natural Resources, were originally initiated on a hostile basis through the clout of junk bond financing. And investment bankers from Drexel, Burnham, Lambert Inc., are now lining up junk bond commitments worth $2.4 billion so a T. Boone Pickens Jr. investment group can pay cash to shareholders for a controlling interest in Unocal, the nation's 12th largest oil company.

Hostile takeovers financed by junk bonds are the brainchild of Drexel Burnham. By giving seemingly pipsqueak raiders that Charles Atlas look, "Drexel has become more potent than the commercial banks," says Irwin Jacobs, a Minneapolis corporate raider. He said he would "have no hesitation" about tapping the firm's junk bond sources if he decided to pursue a bigger target than his now-enlarged war chest would allow. "The pendulum is shifting and Drexel is now giving the opportunity to a new group of people," Mr. Jacobs adds.

Although business has begun to stiffen its spine against the raiders, the use of junk bonds to wage a hostile takeover may well be just beginning. Wall Street executives and a growing number of concerned Congressmen say that many more raiders will be tempted to go on the prowl. And the big money at stake for putting the deals together is likely to make investment bankers willing to help finance aggressive takeovers from small-fry companies, even if they must incur the wrath of their major corporate clients by doing so.

Drexel Burnham, the driving force behind junk bonds, has been tapping its investor base for a number of friendly leveraged buyouts of corporations or their subsidiaries since late 1983. Farley Industries, for instance, will rely on Drexel to help raise the money for its planned $1 billion buyout of Northwest Industries.

But junk bonds became an instrument of takeover warfare diring Mr. Pickens' move against Gulf Oil in early 1984. In effect, junk bonds gave Mr. Pickens the muscle to be taken seriously by Gulf management, which then scurried into the arms of Chevron for the largest acquisition in history.

Since then Drexel has been the financial engineer for six more junk bond hostile takeover attempts. It is involved in several other takeover attempts, including the move against Hilton Hotels by Golden Nugget, a Drexel client; Lorimar's $1.02 billion offer for Multimedia, Mr. Icahn's bid for control of Uniroyal and, Sir James Goldsmith's foray against Crown Zellerbach. Drexel is expected to call on its junk bond investors for help in at least some of these deals.

"If managements would sit down and talk, there would be no need to take this route," says G. Chris Anderson, a managing director of Drexel. "The trouble is that entrenched executives stonewall you. And unless you are a company like Chevron they refuse to take you seriously."

Corporate chieftains, of course, do not quite see it that way. They say that the long-term interests of shareholders will best be served by following through on a well-thought-out corporate game plan—and not by yielding to takeover overturns for a quick stock gain. In any event, Mr. Anderson said, when a client puts together a takeover bid, he often has no choice but to line up junk bond financing and take a laid directly to shareholders via a public tender offer for their shares—rather than go through hostile management. "All we are doing is giving the right to someone who is aggressive to put some money where his mouth is," he argued.

Junk bond financing commitments give a raider credibility in the early stages of a takeover attempt, when bank financing normally is not available—particularly when a small company pursues larger prey. Big companies have no trouble finding bank financing for acquisitions, especially when they are friendly from the start, Mr. Anderson points out. And unfriendly ones between the giants don't occur often because "it's a very clubby thing: They don't pick on each other," he says.

But for smaller companies, the junk bond has become a big part of a takeover strategy—friendly or otherwise. Triangle Industries, for instance, had net income of just over $3 million last year on sales of $291 million. Yet last week, the $1.9 billion National Can Company agreed to yield to a sweetened offer from Triangle's boss, Nelson Peltz.

Triangle will finance nearly all of the $430 million cash offer to National Can shareholders by calling upon the money committed by 36 junk bond investors. If the shareholders turn down the offer or if National Can had thrown a roadblock in its way before it turned agreeable, then the timing on the commitments would have expired and the would-be investors would not have put up any money.

So far, Triangle's deal is the only one that has relied on junk bonds to finance virtually the whole package. In takeovers, the term junk bond is used loosely to encompass debt obligations as well as preferred stock, both of which are offered to raise necessary financing.

Sometimes banks agree to come in for most or all, of what's left of the outstanding shares after junk bond financing has helped a raider gain voting control of a company. The successful raider might then offer the remaining shareholders a mix of debt and preferred stock securities. Carl Icahn did that in his Phillips deal and Mr. Pickens plans to do it if his offer for control of Unocal is successful.

The participation of private investors is the key to getting an unsolicited offer to shareholders off the ground. Yet it also is the least understood and, to some critics, the most troublesome aspects of these deals.

These critics, who include some of Drexel's rivals in investment banking and some lawyers who defend takeover targets, contend that many investors only commit to buy these securities because of the fees, which range between three-eighths of a percent and 1 percent for merely signalling a commitment to later put up financing if necessary. What also draws them, critics say, is the possibility of turning a big profit by riding the coattails of a greenmailer.

"The commitment to buy junk bonds is just like a loud "Boo!" to scare companies into finding a white knight or paying greenmail," says Edmund Kelly, vice chairman of the Dominick & Dominick Company, a small investment banking firm. Robert Willard, director of mergers and acquisitions at Prudential-Bache Securities, calls some of the small group of investors who seem to show up in many of the deals "a wolfpack."

Even if investors do eventually have to fork up the money, they are likely to unload the securities at the first opportunity so they can start over again, contend some critics of the Drexel approach. "If you have to fire the gun, the key is how fast can you reload," says Richard Omohundro, a manager of the high-yield bond group at Merrill Lynch Capital Markets.

On the surface, there seems to be a strong element of "one hand washing the other" in these deals. Many of the biggest backers of a raider's junk bonds are other raiders, like Saul Steinberg, or heads of companies, like Eugene Phillips of Southmark which have been financed by junk bonds.

In fact, it has become apparent that in each of the junk bond commitments, where several dozen investors are involved, more than half of the money comes from names that appear at least once in another such deal.

Nonetheless, "while this market may be narrow compared to the public market for junk bonds, it clearly is not a house of cards erected by five unattractive men who wear body jewelry," said Charles G. Phillips, a managing director of Morgan Stanley. Many of the investors in Drexel takeovers, he added, "are among the country's largest and most sophisticated institutional investors."

The attraction, claim investors, is a yield based on the commitment fee plus interest rates and dividends that are richer than comparable securities in the marketplace. Drexel Burnham also lets it be known that the private securities will be registered soon after the takeover so that the investors can then trade them to the public if they wish. Because of their hefty investment yields, such as the 16 percent notes offered in Mr. Icahn's financing of the Phillips Petroleum deal, the securities should command a premium in the market to comparable issues, say investors. Until just recently, very few of the junk bond takeover commitments had been called upon, however. Walt Disney Productions paid about $30 million in greenmail to Mr. Steinberg, for instance, and his Drexel-led investor group shared in the bounty, with a percentage of the profits beyond just the commitment fee.

The recent takedown of $600 million in commitments for the American Natural Resources deal will be an important test of how many of the private investors in the deal will want to be long-term investors in the new company.

If commitments are not called upon, investors still receive the fee and have a shot at possible greenmail profits. Under individual agreements set into most deals, investors may receive a piece of the raider's profits above a certain price per share if a target company pays greenmail to avoid a raider. In Mr. Pickens's bid for control of Unocal at $54 per share, for example, investors will receive 15 percent of the profits above $50 per share if the Pickens investor group sells out at a profit instead of going through with the takeover and restructuring the company.

Very few of the investors in Drexel's deals would talk about their commitments, either on the record of for background. Those who would maintained that commitment fees and greenmail were not their motives.

"The commitment fee is just a kiss on the cheek. We participated in the Icahn financing for Phillips because of the merit of the investment," says William Huff of W. R. Huff Asset Management, which received $37,500 for its never-used $10 million commitment. And Samuel Belzberg, chief executive of the First City Financial Services Corporation, a major investor in Drexel deals, said the "commitment fee doesn't mean a hill of beans to us. Once we commit we assume we will own the securities and we want to."

And Mr. Phillips of Southmark said that his company has been a regular investor in the senior notes of three of the Drexel deals "for the yields offered. These people are willing to pay more to raise money quickly."

One investor who does look at the allure of a short-term return on his commitment is Talton Embry, president of Magten Asset Management, a frequent Drexel investor in hostile takeover deals. He figures that his firm's $11 million investment in the preferred stock of the new entity created by Coastal Corporation's takeover of American Natural Resources could well realize a 37 percent annualized rate of return. Assuming that the securities will be sold in the public market in about three months time, he looks for an expected capital gain of 5 percent, annualized to 20 percent, a three-quarters of a percent commitment fee, annualized to 3 percent, and a dividend that is slated to pay 14 percent annually.

But another criticism of the junk bond financings is that many shareholder of a target company would not fare as well as the original junk bond investors. That is apparently the case when, after a cash tender offer gives control to an acquirer, the buyout can be structured so that the remaining stockholders receive junk bonds of a lower quality or preferred stock, which is junior to any debt obligations. While the value of those securities may be equal to the cash received in the first portion of the tender offer, those securities are at the bottom of the totem pole: When it comes to collateral, they are behind most of the securities received by the original commitment group.

In the event of a bankruptcy, for instance, bank debt, senior bonds and notes and common stock have the first call on assets, ahead of most of the junk securities paid out to shareholders of a takeover company. Mr. Anderson of Drexel says, however, that investors who receive those securities have the opportunity to sell out in the public market for cash right away and receive approximately the same payout as offered in the initial tender offer when control was gained.

Drexel draws its takeover investors from more than 700 regular institutional and corporate investors in the $100-billion junk bond market through a high-powered sales team based in Los Angeles. The group is headed by Michael Milken, a 39-year old who gets credit for Drexel's dominance of the market and who, according to news reports, earned $25 million last year.

The firm keeps investors enthusiastic about junk bonds by holding a conference each March. At the most recent one, some 2,000 investors, company presidents and corporate raiders participated in what one money manager likened to "a revival meeting where we shared a religious and emotional experience."

But several money managers who made junk bond commitments on a Drexel hostile takeover financing say they are reluctant to do it regularly. "We don't want to be known as a hot money investor. We don't know how our clients would react," said Mr. Huff.

Mr. Anderson maintains that such inhibitions won't crimp his game because those money managers will buy the securities when they later trade in the open market.

Critics contend that a key assumption in takeover financing is that a big chunk of the company's assets can be sold to reduce debt. But Mr. Anderson argues that the assets sold are, relatively speaking, not as productive as the remaining parts of a company, and that their sale leaves the company stronger and with less debt. Many of the formerly junk securities will then qualify for an investment grade rating, he believes. Furthermore, in some of the cases, he says, the securities will receive investment-grade rating even when no assets are sold.

In any event, very few acquisitions, friendly or unfriendly, are completed these days without a high degree of debt leverage. Hostile junk bond takeovers, in fact, are essentially nothing more than hostile leveraged buyouts. Leveraged buyouts, the vogue of the past few years, are friendly deals using the company's assets as collateral for debt financing. The fear among many observers of the leveraged takeover trend is that all that debt will be tough to service if business takes a downturn and cash flow slows to a trickle.

And that concern has spread to Congress, where in the past few months there have been nine sets of hearings for pending bills aimed at curbing takeovers. Not surprisingly, several of the proposed bills attack junk bonds used in hostile deals by eliminating their interest expense deductions from corporate income taxes.

And Congressional aides say the staff of one senator is working on a bill that would impose an immediate moratorium on the financing of hostile takeovers with junk bonds. So far, however, neither the Administration nor the Treasury Department has shown any interest in supporting the bills. Without Federal legislation, junk bond financing of takeovers is likely to proliferate.

But if all this sounds as if a takeover bubble is developing, Mr. Gleacher of Morgan Stanley offers a sobering thought. "There is always the risk of an economic recession when highly leveraged companies will be hurt the most," he said. "Junk bond investors understand that and normal market forces will prevent a mushroom cloud of takeovers from changing corporate America."

JUNK BONDS AND OTHER SECURITIES SWILL

(By Felix G. Rohatyn)

Raids and takeovers, in many cases financed with junk bonds and other high-leverage, high-risk investments, are at an all-time high. The financial collapse of firms such as Drysdale Securities Corp., Lombard-Wall Inc., E.S.M. Government Securities Inc. and Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Management Corp. menace the apparently safe world of government bond trading.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been lost by banks, cities and state agencies under the impression that they were making perfectly safe investments backed by government securities. And in the more staid world of commercial banking equally disturbing events have taken place. A small Oklahoma bank, Penn Square, was able to persuade large reputable institutions such as Continental Illinois and SeaFirst Corp. to acquire enough bad loans to result in the collapse of these institutions.

The common thread running through such stories is the failure to assess risk on the part of financial institutions and fiduciaries eager to perform. There'd be no junk bonds—the name Wall Street has attached to high-yielding, often unsecured, debt securities rated double-B or lower by financial ratings services—if institutions weren't often willing to ignore substandard credit ratings in exchange for higher yields. There'd be no Drysdale Securities Corp., E.S.M., or similar situations if savings bank trustees asked themselves why they were getting higher yields on some government bonds if they were really as safe as Treasury bills. And there'd be no Continental Illinois or Penn Square if more emphasis were placed on credit and less on growth.

A GLANCE AT THE PAPERS

Under the banner of deregulation and total faith in the marketplace, we're impairing our greatest of assets: the credibility of our capital markets and the faith in our financial institutions. The basic strength of our capital markets has relied, as opposed to other markets around the world, on the principle of protecting investors. This protection, the result of securities legislation of 1933 and 1934, is based on disclosure, anti-manipulative and anti-insider trading regulations, and the ethical standards of securities firms. It can be argued that our capital markets were, in large part, responsible for the postwar boom in the U.S., carrying well into the 1970s. Of course, elements of speculation and merger fever (for example, in the "go-go" years of the 1960s) have always been present. But something very different is happening now.

The growing feeling today is that the capital markets have become the property of insiders and of speculators, of raiders and other professionals, to the detriment of the general public. Unfortunately, a simple glance at the daily pages of the financial press confirms this suspicion. In editions of The Wall Street Journal published in the first two weeks of April, a casual reader would have found the following transactions or proposals:

1. Lorimar, with a net worth of $105 million, proposes to acquire Multimedia Inc. for $1 billion, to be financed with junk bonds.

2. Sir James Goldsmith proposes to acquire Crown Zellerbach Corp. for $1.1 billion, to be financed by junk bonds.

3. Uniroyal Inc. asked shareholders to approve two anti-takeover measures to fend off takeover threats like Carl Icahn's proposal to acquire the company for $600 million in a package financed by junk bonds.

4. Golden Nugget Inc., with a net worth of $230 million, proposes to acquire Hilton Hotels for what appears to be $1.8 billion, to be financed by junk bonds.

5. Mesa Petroleum, et al., with a net worth of $500 million, proposes to acquire control of Unocal Corp. to be finaced by junk bonds.

6. Triangle Industries, with a net worth of $65 million, proposes to acquire National Can for $428 million, to be financed by junk bonds.

7. Farley Industries, with an undisclosed net worth and earnings of $6 million, proposes to acquire Northwest Industries for $1 billion, financed by junk bonds.

These transactions all were to be financed with junk bonds carrying interest rates of 15% to 18%. They were all to be issued by acquirers with thin equity. And at the time they were made, all the proposals were subject to financing actually being completed.

The New York Times also yielded similar evidence in the same two-week period. It reported that Ivan Boesky, an arbitrager who had acquired 8.7% of CBS, might join Ted Turner (who was trying to borrow $50 million each from William Simon and MCI Inc.), to acquire all of CBS for $4 billion.

CBS stock was driven up to more than $110 a share by these speculative stories, including stories from unnamed sources indicating that GE would acquire CBS for $150 a share. Other unnamed experts opined that the breakup value of CBS might be $200 a share. On Tuesday the paper reported rumors that Mr. Turner had engaged E.F. Hutton & Co. to make a bid for CBS at $175 a share. Even if Mr. Turner makes his bid for CBS, as is expected today, the general public can be forgiven for believing that a massive touting operation was going on, fed by deliberate leaks to an all-too-willing press, in order to drive more stock into speculative hands and ultimately drive CBS into a merger.

The protective reaction to the speculative aspect of such takeover activity is, in some ways, equally unhealthy. Legislation is being proposed to outlaw hostile takeover bids completely. "Poison pill" securities that make such takeovers prohibitive have, so far, been upheld in the courts. The "one share, one vote" principle is being abandoned by the New York Stock Exchange in favor of securities carrying as much as a 10-to-1 differential in voting rights. "Shark repellents," "crown jewel options" and various other defensive tactics are being used. Extreme responses of this sort, which may disenfranchise public stockholders or entrench existing management structures regardless of their quality, are also harmful. It's hard to know which is worse: the vaccine or the disease?

Junk bonds, in amounts estimated at a total of between $50 billion and $70 billion, have now been placed as a result of takeover or other financing activities. In certain instances, the use of a reasonable amount of high-yield debt can be easily justified. If the assets and earnings are there to support it, sophisticated investors may well take greater risk for greater return. Increasingly, however, the use of these instruments appears excessive. The interest rates they carry are mostly higher than the rates of return the underlying businesses are likely to earn in periods of economic downturn. These securities are therefore based on the ability of new management to sell assets in order to service debt.

Whether such sales will be possible in a period of recession is questionable. Whether large corporations can be treated like artichokes and simply torn apart without any regard for employees, communities, or customers, solely in order to pay off speculative debt, is a further question for public policy.

The public should pay attention to these activities, because in the last analysis the public always pays. When savings institutions get into trouble with junk bonds or "repos," the public pays. When banks make careless loans, the public ultimately pays. This is particularly true when the amounts involved are huge, as they are today.

The answer to these excesses is intelligent regulation, as opposed to total deregulation or over-regulation. This is true of takeovers and junk bonds; it is true of "repos" and other excesses in the government securities markets; it is true of banks.

To curb excessive use of junk bonds, consider the following suggestions:

(a) Federally and state-insured and regulated financial institutions should be sharply limited in their ability to invest in obligations carrying below-investment-grade credit ratings.

(b) Tender offers "subject to financing" should be prohibited and declared to be a manipulation of the public markets. Anyone making a tender offer should be required to have firm financing commitments in hand.

To curb the excesses of takeover activity both on offense and defense, consider the following:

(a) Any acquisition of more than 20% of a company's stock should require an offer for 100%, at one price.

(b) The minimum tender-offer period should be extended to 60 days.

(c) Shareholder approval should be required by the acquirer's shareholders if the target represents more than 25% of the market value of the acquirer. Shareholder approval should also be required by the target's shareholders if the target proposes to reacquire more than 5% of its shares, to issue or option securities having more than 10% of its voting rights, or to sell or option assets having a value of more than 10% of its market value.

PART OF A TOTAL PACKAGE

To maintain the integrity of stock ownership we should:

(a) Eliminate any form of "poison pill."

(b) Delist companies with various classes of voting securities.

(c) Eliminate "shark repellents," staggered bonds, "fair-price amendments" and similar devices.

These actions would be part of a total package of legislation and/or regulation. They are all interconnected. Public confidence in the integrity of our securities markets and our financial institutions is rapidly eroding. All takeovers don't have to be friendly, but they have to be fair and soundly financed. The appearance of excessive speculation in takeovers, as well as the repeated scandals in the government securities market and the lingering problems of many banks, is very much in the public's consciousness.

The word "credit" derives from the Latin credere: to believe. The belief in the integrity of our securities market is a national asset that we should not dissipate carelessly.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send the bill to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 975

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Securities, Safety, and Soundness Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 14 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78n) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(h) During the period beginning on April 23, 1985, and ending on December 31, 1985, it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by use of the mails or by any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of any facility of a national securities exchange or otherwise, to acquire, directly or indirectly, the beneficial ownership of any equity security of a corporation which is registered pursuant to section 12 of this Act, or any equity security of an insurance company which would have been required to be so registered except for the exemption contained in section 12(g)(2)(G) of this Act, or any equity security issued by a closed-end investment company registered under the Investment Company Act of 1940, if—

(1) after consummation of such acquisition, such person would, directly or indirectly, be the beneficial owner of equity securities which would entitle such person to then cast 15 percent or more of the votes that all holders of securities would be entitled to cast in an election or directors of the issuer; and

"(2) such acquisition is disapproved by a majority of those members of the issuer's board of directors who are not officers or employees of the issuer; and

"(3) 20 percent or more of such acquisition is financed, directly or indirectly, with the proceeds of the issuance of takeover securities, the aggregate of which exceed $25 million. For the purpose of this section, the term 'takeover securities' means unrated bonds or preferred stock; bonds or preferred stock with a rating at or lower than Ba by Moody's Investors Service, BB by Standard and Poor's Corporation, or an equivalent rating by a nationally recognized bond rating house; other debt instruments that are, or will become in connection with such acquisition, subordinated in right of payment to the payment of any substantial amount of unsecured indebtedness; or any equity or quasi-equity instruments other than common stock or preferred stock (except as provided above), including warrants or other rights to acquire such equity or quasi-equity intruments.".

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be unlawful for any insured bank or insured institution to purchase for its own account non-investment grade securities.

(b) The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation shall, by regulation, prescribe limitations and restrictions to prevent insured institutions from carrying non-investment grade securities as loans.

(c) Compliance with the provisions of this section shall be enforced under—

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act in the case of insured banks; and

(2) section 407 of the National Housing Act in the case of insured institutions.

(d) As used in this section—

(1) the term "insured bank" has the same meaning as in section 3(n) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act;

(2) the term "insured institution" has the same meaning as in section 401(a) of the National Housing Act;

(3) the term "non-investment grade securities" means any securities or obligations other than—

(A) marketable obligations in the form of bonds, notes, or debentures which are commonly regarded as investment securities, and which are not predominately speculative in nature; and

(B) any security which is exempt from the limitations and restrictions of paragraph Seventh of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes (12 U.S.C. 24 Seventh) by virtue of the fifth full sentence of such paragraph.".

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I wish to commend our colleague from New Mexico. I think he has touched upon something that is extremely important. In our economy today, for reasons that clearly mirror the attention of this Congress, it is easier to explore for oil on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange than it is in Pennsylvania, Washington, or Illinois out in the fields.

We are absorbing credit in this country, and keeping interest rates high not for constructive purposes, but for purposes that do not add to the productivity of this country. For example—and this goes beyond what the gentleman from New Mexico is talking about—when United States Steel buys Marathon Oil for $6.5 billion, it does not add one job to this country. It does not dig one oil well. All it does is absorbs credit, and the average American taxpayer has to foot the bill through tax writeoffs.

So I simply wanted, while the gentleman from New Mexico was on the floor, to commend him for his bill. I join in cosponsoring it. I think it is a step in the right direction.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

S. 976—CONSOLIDATED RAIL CORPORATION PROFIT TRANSFER ACT OF 1985

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I introduce the "Consolidated Rail Corporation Profit Transfer Act of 1985." This legislation will solve two problems relating to the Federal Government's involvement in the railroad business. First, it will save Amtrak, which currently is threatened with being phased out as a budget-cutting measure. Second, it will allow Congress further time to consider both the question of whether Federal subsidies of Amtrak should be continued, and the manner in which Conrail should be returned to the private sector.

The Amtrak passenger railroad and the Conrail freight line—two of the Nation's largest rail systems—currently are facing major reorganization of their operations. Combining these two systems by a profit transfer, even on an interim basis, will aid the railroads during this reorganization phase.

Amtrak is threatened with the elimination of its Federal subsidies by September 30 of this year. The savings from this proposed elimination are projected to be in the area of $574 million. Conrail's earnings during 1984 were approximately $500 million. According to a April 1, 1985 report issued by the U.S. Railway Association, this earnings trend is expected to continue.

By transfering Conrail's profits to Amtrak—the National Railroad Passenger Corporation—for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986 and September 30, 1987, Conrail's continued profitability would, in effect, subsidize Amtrak's operation, and allow these two systems to maintain their present respective rail services. Without any monetary loss to American taxpayers, this transfer provides Congress sufficient time to consider the crucial questions surrounding the retention of both of these vital railway systems.

Amtrak, during 1984, remained the sixth largest transportation company in this country, providing transportation for 20 million people. It performs an important public function in reducing overcrowding and delays in air and road travel, and should not be phased out.

The proposed sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp. for $1.2 billion represents a giveaway sale of a company with over $1 billion in cash. Further, the combination of Conrail's 15,000 miles of track with Norfolk's 18,000 miles of track will create the Nation's largest railroad, and will result in insurmountable anticompetitive problems. The eventual result will be a reduction in rail freight competition, and increase in freight rates, and an increase in consumer prices.

The bill I introduce today will provide for the continued operation of both Amtrak and Conrail, at no cost to taxpayers, with resulting benefits to all who utilize these systems. Congress will be able to utilize the interim period contemplated by this proposal to consider the best long-term approach for operating each system.

Mr. President, my bill is designed to consolidate Conrail and Amtrak for recordkeeping purposes to deal with two very material problems facing these two rail carriers which directly affect the national interest. During the course of the budget proceedings this week, there will doubtless be consideration about the future of Amtrak because of its importance as a linchpin in the national rail system. These considerations will include the question of the continuation of Amtrak and its Federal subsidies in the range of $500 million a year.

I submit, Mr. President, that it is a matter of great national importance that Amtrak be maintained. It performs vital services for the Nation in providing rail transit service, especially on the Eastern Seaboard, but really affecting the Nation as a whole.

If the subsidies for Amtrak are not maintained, I suggest that traffic in this country will be in a snarl, especially on the Eastern Seaboard from Boston to Washington where I predict the airports would be clogged and the highways would be jammed. It would be a virtual impossibility to get through the tunnel in Baltimore. It would be extremely difficult, with delays, to land an airplane at any of the airports serving the major Eastern cities. And I think it would even be difficult to get a quorum in the U.S. Senate.

On the other side of the ledger, Conrail is under consideration for a private sale, under the recommendation of the Secretary of Transportation, to the Norfolk Southern Railroad system. On this issue, again, Mr. President, I submit that the national interest strongly militates against such a sale for many reasons.

First, the price is much too low.

The taxpayers of this country have expended over $7 billion in Conrail. Conrail has assets and a book value in the range of $4 billion. Conrail has cash in excess of $1 billion. It is therefore an extraordinarily low price—and a forced "fire sale" of Conrail—for 85 percent of the stock to be sold to Norfolk for only $1.2 billion.

Beyond the figures already announced, Norfolk would be the beneficiary of some $1.4 billion in tax savings. It does not make sense for the Federal Government to sell Conrail, and give the buyer a greater reduction from the Government's tax collection potential than the sale price constitutes.

Since the Conrail issue arose, and bids were solicited, a very significant change has taken place with respect to the public and private attitudes toward Conrail. For one thing, the additional 1 year-plus of operation resulted in Conrail earning in the range of $500 million—with very, very substantial earnings even if the regular taxing procedures had been applied to Conrail. Although the profits were somewhat down during the first quarter of 1985, Conrail continues to be a viable and profitable operation.

The proposed consolidation of these two railway systems for financial and fiscal purposes, Mr. President, is logical because of the overlapping considerations in the operations of Amtrak and Conrail. It is not unusual for railroads which operate both freight and passenger services to have one subsidize the other. The benefits derived by the Nation from the Amtrak operation in facilitating the movement of executives, laborers, and passengers of all sorts doubtless have an indirect, if not a direct, benefit for the operation of businesses which utilize Conrail, and which provide material profits for Conrail.

The thrust of my legislation would consolidate Conrail and Amtrak for fiscal, financial, and bookkeeping purposes for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, and September 30, 1987. It is a bill with a relatively short timeframe. But that period of time would enable Congress to give further consideration to the ultimate plight of Amtrak. There would be an opportunity for studies to examine a reduction perhaps in some Amtrak services, but with the bulk of Amtrak remaining in operation, to restructure Amtrak as an independent entity so that it can continue to exist, without requiring extensive governmental subsidies.

At the same time, this bill would enable Conrail to continue under its present excellent management, and would provide a window of opportunity for the Department of Transportation to solicit other bids—and there are other bids in the offering, Mr. President. There would also be sufficient opportunity for further exploration of the issue of a public sale of Conrail—established investment bankers, Morgan Stanley specifically, have offered testimony that a public sale of Conrail will yield an additional return in the range of $400 to $600 million over the $1.2 billion purchase price offered by Norfolk Southern.

There are in addition, Mr. President, very substantial issues to be considered by Congress on the antitrust implications of merging the 18,000-mile Norfolk system with the 15,000-mile Conrail operation. The Department of Justice has ruled that the merger would be a violation of the antitrust laws unless there were divestitures which would permit competition to exist on key portions of overlapping Conrail and Norfolk lines. The testimony heard so far, Mr. President, before the Judiciary Committee, demonstrates that the proposed divestitures to Guilford and the Pittsburgh Lake Erie Railroads are totally unrealistic in terms of providing competition. If this merger of Norfolk and Conrail were to occur, there would be very substantial damage to the Nation's economy.

Therefore, Mr. President, it makes good sense to have this merger, of Conrail and Amtrak for fiscal and financial purposes.

At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as if presented in full on the floor of the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 9 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes.

FOR THE NEXT 4 YEARS THE NAME OF THE ARMS CONTROL GAME IS RONALD REAGAN, WHICH MEANS ARMS CONTROL IS GOING NOWHERE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this is the second in a series of speeches I am giving on the conditions necessary to achieve progress in negotiating an agreement with the Soviet Union to control nuclear weapons. The first dominant fact about arms control is that whether this country negotiates an agreement with the Soviet Union or does not, every aspect of what we propose to the Soviet Union in such an agreement, how far we are willing to go to modify our proposals, what counter proposals they make that we will accept if any, to what extent we will accept such Soviet proposals, all of this depends on the President of the United States and the President alone. The role of any other institution of American Government in nuclear arms control is a virtual nullity. This country is still haunted by the ghost of Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations fiasco after World War I. President Wilson wanted this Nation to join the League of Nations. Undoubtedly the biggest disappointment of Wilson's political career, his most monumental failure came when the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the League of Nations treaty, and the United States never joined the League of Nations. In that case obviously the U.S. Senate played a major and decisive role.

Is it possible that the Senate could play such a role with respect to an arms control treaty successfully negotiated by the President and brought to the Senate for ratification? The answer is: "No!" The Senate has refused to ratify arms control treaties in the past—most recently and notably the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty II, or SALT II. But first President Carter and then President Reagan announced that as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces we would abide by the treaty, until they—not the Senate—not any other institution but until the President decided for whatever reason we would not.

Consider how absolutely dominant the President is in negotiations on arms control. The President selects our nuclear arms treaty negotiators. He can replace those negotiators at will. Whatever agreement the negotiators may achieve, the President can accept, or as in the well-known case of ace negotiator Paul Nitze's walk in the woods, the President can reject the agreement. If all the President's Cabinet and arms control officials and advisers, all the Members of the Congress, a unanimous American press, and yes the American people wanted a particular arms control proposal accepted or rejected, it would matter not one whit. The only voice that counts on arms control is not the Secretary of State, not the persons who negotiate with the Soviet Union for months or years, not the Members of the Congress of even the entire Congress as a collective whole and the American people, it is one man: the President of the United States.

The most dramatic example of the President's absolute, unquestioned and total domination of the nuclear arms negotiation process can be seen in the present situation. Over the past few years statewide referenda, professional polls of unquestioned competence and integrity, and in fact every available popular expression has shown a universal American desire for negotiating a mutual, comprehensive, verifiable agreement with the Soviet Union to stop the testing of nuclear weapons, the production of nuclear weapons and the deployment of nuclear weapons, that is a nuclear freeze. On the other hand the President of the United States over the past 25 years has been on record in opposition to every nuclear arms control treaty this country has ever negotiated including some that have been ratified by an overwhelming bipartisan vote in the U.S. Senate.

Has the President had a change of heart on arms control? Isn't his administration engaged at this very moment in the opening stages of an arms control negotiation with the Soviet Union designed according to the President to reduce the number of nuclear warheads on both sides by 50 percent? He is indeed. But the prospects of reaching an agreement seem at best dim and distant. Would this be a safer, more secure world if both sides had 5,000 nuclear warheads instead of 10,000? The arithmetic may be appealing. But the simple fact is that by itself the reduction would have little meaning. Both superpowers would still have the capability of utterly demolishing the other several times over. And the President has introduced a new and highly unstable element in his so-called "star wars" or antimissile program.

For more than 30 years the superpower nuclear peace has been conspicuously based on the massive deterrence of the offensive missiles of this country and the Soviet Union. A nuclear attack by one superpower on the other would be an act of suicide. Star wars could change that. How could it change the deterrent stalemate? The answer is that it could nullify the present Soviet deterrent. How do the Soviets answer that challenge? The obvious way they answer is by building more offensive missiles. A star wars defense could stop some, maybe most Russian ICBM's. So what is the logical way for the Russians to respond? Simple. Build more missiles. If star wars can stop half their offensive warheads they just deploy twice as many. That's easy and relatively cheap. If star wars can stop three-quarters they simply increase the number by a factor of four. Where does that leave the predictable Russian response to a United States proposal that they reduce their warheads by 50 percent—down to 5,000, at the same time the President is insisting that star wars is not negotiable. The answer is obvious to a 10-year-old. The Russians will, "Nyet," no way.

So my conclusion, Mr. President, is that this President's record on arms control is clear. And his insistence on building star wars—the prime Reagan military initiative—is tailormade to prevent any significant progress in President Reagan's stated objective: The reduction of offensive missiles on both sides. President Reagan is in charge of arms control. His position is clear. What does that mean? It means that for the next 4 years arms control is going nowhere.

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE LIBERATION OF THE NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMPS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today we commemorate the anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps. It is vital that we remember these liberators, for they stand as crucial witnesses to the Holocaust, a horror of unparalleled proportions in the history of mankind.

Mr. President, it is vital that we remember. For when we forget, we cease to care. And it was the moral indifference of the civilized world that allowed the Nazis to proceed so far with their final solution.

In July 1938 representatives of 32 nations met in France to determine what could be done to aid the victims of Hitler's anti-Semitic campaign. But not one of these nations offered asylum for the Jews living under control of the Third Reich. Hitler offered to let them emigrate, but everywhere they turned, the doors were closed.

The French Foreign Office even went so far as sending a memorandum to the German French Foreign Ministry stating that:

> None of the states would dispute the absolute right of the German government to dictate with regard to its citizens such measures are within its sovereign powers.

Last week our colleague, Representative STEVE SOLARZ noted that during the course of Hitler's Third Reich, 78 specific speeches were made in the House of Representatives describing the persecution of the Jews by the Nazis. Yet despite the speeches and the resolutions, the killings went on, the cries of the dying went unheeded, and our immigration policies remained unchanged. Is it any wonder that Hitler dismissed foreign outrage with the quip "Who remembers the Armenians?"

Yet we must remember, Mr. President. We must remember. For the millions who suffered and died, and for the survivors who may have suffered even more. For the men we honor today, the liberators who fought and died to end the suffering. And we must remember, Mr. President, because to forget the Holocaust today could permit genocide to occur tomorrow.

Today we commemorate the survivors of the death camps and their liberators, and it is right and good that we should do so. Yet words are empty without actions. Let us act, Mr. President; let us ratify the Genocide Convention.

FARM PROGRAM FAILS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I feel compelled to call to the attention of my colleagues an article in the State Journal-Register in Springfield, IL, written by Bob Estill of the Copley News Service, in which Mr. Estill outlines the shortcomings of the administration's Guaranteed Loan Program which is supposed to bail out debt-ridden farmers.

Bob Estill's column, Mr. President, makes it clear that this program has been a failure. It was announced last September, before the November election, that the administration was going to make available $650 million in guaranteed loans in order to assist farmers in restructuring their debt so they can survive as family farm operations.

As of March 30, the day Mr. Estill's column appeared, only 73 farmers had been helped by this program throughout the country. "Those 73 farmers have received guaranteed loans totaling $10.2 million out of what was intended to be a cornerstone of the 'Debt Adjustment Program' that was trumpeted by Reagan in September after he spent 2 years opposing bills to help farmers restructure their debts," Mr. Estill says in his article.

Mr. Estill goes on to point out that 561 applications were pending as of March 21.

I regret to say, Mr. President, that only two farmers have been helped in my home State of Illinois, a farm State where hundreds of farmers have already, or are on the verge of, going broke. There are statistics available which suggest that farmers throughout the country are going broke at the rate of 238 per day.

It is astounding to me that 7 months after the President announced his program, only 73 farmers have been helped. I understand that as of April 8, that number stands at 99. Even more astounding, Mr. President, is the fact pointed out by Mr. Estill that 2,000 employees have been assigned to process guarantee applications.

Our Government has assigned an additional 2,000 people the task of processing these applications from farmers in distress, and in 8 months, we have approved only 99. Even if the 346 applications presently pending are added to this number, we would end up assisting only 445 farmers out of the thousands who are in trouble. I pose this question to my colleagues: Why is it taking more than 2,000 people to process 99 applications, or even 445 applications if all are approved?

The Department of Agriculture asserts that the small number of approved applications is the fault of the banks. I say, Mr. President, that the low number is the result of a program that itself has been faulty and flawed from the very beginning. It is as if, Mr. President, this administration program was designed to guarantee failure.

For an administration which vigorously promotes efficiency in government, I have to report with reluctance that the administration does indeed have a monstrous failure on its hands in this instance. The tragedy is that our farmers, who are already suffering severe economic hardship, are the victims of what can be described as an administrative nightmare.

For several months, many of my colleagues in both the Senate and House have been working hard to get the administration to provide more help for the farmers, because it was obvious from the outset that the administration plan would not work. At the suggestion of a fine Illinois lawmaker, State Senator Jerry Joyce, who is himself a farmer, I drew up a bill that allows a partial advance of the price support loan the farmer normally receives at harvest time to allow him to buy seed, fuel, and fertilizer for spring planting.

This is a simple idea that would be very effective in helping farmers who don't have funds for their spring crop. Since it would be a loan requiring repayment with interest, the cost to the Government would be virtually nothing. The plan is, in essence, revenue neutral. These are loans that farmers could qualify for in the fall anyway. Unfortunately, this simple, inexpensive measure was stymied at every step by the present administration. Congress passed the legislation, but the President vetoed it.

Since that veto, Congressman ED MADIGAN in the House and I in the Senate—in a bipartisan effort involving other colleagues—reintroduced a new version of the advanced loan payment bill. In this Chamber, S. 776 is now on second reading on our Senate Calendar. We made several modifications in the hope that we could persuade the administration to undergo a change of heart.

My first bill was revenue neutral, not costing the Government any money, because we are providing loans which have to be repaid, with interest. The same is true for S. 776.

This new bill scales down the size of the advance the farmer can obtain, by reducing it from one-half to one-third of the total loan.

We have reduced the cap on the advance loan from $50,000 to $30,000.

We included a provision for crop insurance so that neither the farmer nor the Government will suffer any losses should a disaster destroy the farmer's crop.

We also added a "credit elsewhere" test so that only needy farmers will qualify for these advance loan payments.

It is difficult for any of us from farm States to see how or why the administration can be against this bill. It's revenue neutral; it's simple; it will be effective. We have been unable to obtain any kind of signal that the administration is willing to accept this simple, but very promising plan. There is still time for the administration to change its mind. In southern Illinois, we can plant corn and beans as late as the end of May and obtain decent yields.

What we have here, therefore, is a sharp contrast between a simple idea which will work effectively at practically no cost and another program which has been a dismal failure on the part of the administration which has used 2,000 additional employees to process 99 applications. This entire effort, Mr. President, reminds me of the famous analogy from the Roman poet, Horace, who said, "The mountain hath labored, and brought forth a ridiculous mouse."

Since Mr. Estill's column clearly outlines the extent of the agricultural problem in our Nation and in my State, along with the inadequate response of the administration, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONLY 73 FARMERS AIDED BY FEDERL LOAN PROGRAM

(By Bob Estill)

WASHINGTON.—In the six months since President Reagan announced a $650 million guaranteed loan program to help debt-ridden farmers, only 73 farmers nationwide have received help from the program.

Those 73 farmers have received guaranteed loans totaling $10.2 million out of what was intended to be a cornerstone of the "Debt Adjustment Program" that was trumpeted by Reagan in September after he spent two years opposing bills to help farmers restructure their debts.

There were an additional 561 applications pending as of March 21, according to a spokeswoman for the Farmers Home Administration, the Agriculture Department agency that administers the program and is the "lender of last resort" for farmers.

In Illinois, only two farmers have received guaranteed loans under the program, and a dozen Illinois applications were pending on March 21 when the Farmers Home Administration took its last telephone survey.

In California, no farmers or ranchers had received guaranteed loans under the program, but nine applications were pending.

Sen. Alan Dixon, D-Ill., a Senate Agriculture Committee member with an emergency farm credit plan of his own, said the low participation is evidence that the administration's plan "simply is not working."

Secretary of Agriculture John Block, who said farmers are being helped through other agricultural credit programs, blamed lending institutions for the fact that few farmers have been helped by the new guaranteed loan plan.

But a spokesman for an association representing three-fourths of the nation's private farm banks said the fault lies with the program—specifically, a requirement that lenders write off at least 10 percent of the borrower's debt to qualify for the federal guarantee of the loan.

When Reagan vetoed an emergency farm credit bill on March 6, he said the additional aid was "unnecessary in view of measures" already taken by his administration. Those measures include the loan guarantee program that Reagan embraced less than two months before the election and while Congress was completing action on its own loan guarantee plan.

"The President is disappointed on the progress of the debt restructuring that is the responsibility of the banks," Block told a group of reporters at breakfast this week.

"What we have done has been at the request of the lending institutions, and I think it is time that they went ahead and made it work."

Block said he believed the banks have held back because Congress had held out the promise of a "sweeter deal". The bill Reagan vetoed would have provided $100 million in federal funds to reduce interest rates on private loans guaranteed by the federal government.

But Weldon Barton, agricultural representative for the Independent Bankers Association of America, said the association never supported the write-off provisions and contended it is not the lenders' fault that so few loans have been made. His association represents about 7,800 banks, including about 3,000 of the 4,100 banks that have at least 25 percent of their portfolios in farm loans.

"It is not a question of not wanting to use it," Barton said. "It is a question of if it is structured in such a way and made available through the local (Farmers Home Administration) offices in such a way that it is workable."

Barton said he believed the entire $650 million would have been used by now if the administration had gone with a more traditional program in which the federal government guarantees 90 percent of the loan without the write-off features.

He said the administration did make two changes in February which made the proposal more workable.

He said the changes altered the original requirement that the bank forgive at least 10 percent of the principal and gave the lender the option of forgiving interest equivalent to at least 10 percent of the principal.

The other change was easing the "cash-flow" requirement. Originally, a farmer seeking a guaranteed loan had to demonstrate that his cash flow, with the restructured loan would show 10 percent more income than expenses. It was changed to require that the farmer show that he could break even.

But Barton said the requirements could still mean that a lender would have to write off as much as 40 percent of a loan in order to get the borrower to the break-even point.

Writing off large chunks of the debt could cause bankers to run afoul with federal regulations requiring them to maintain at least 6 percent of their capital, Barton said.

"The bank has to take a look at this and say can we afford to take this and remain solvent ourselves," Barton said.

He said the other problem is the farmer typically has a combination of debts—commercial bank loans, long-term land bank loans and short-term loans with suppliers. If those debts are restructured, Barton said there is the complication of "who takes the hit"—how do lenders share the write off of principal or interest.

The Farmers Home Administration spokeswoman said nearly half of the 73 loans have been made since the administration eased the requirements. She said they also have added about 2,000 people to process the loan guarantee applications.

MICHAEL EVANS—THE PRESIDENT'S PERSONAL PHOTOGRAPHER

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, it has been said that much of what we do in Washington is recorded as a series of images. If that is so, no one is better equipped or more talented to do that recording than Michael Evans.

One of the real pleasures of being in the U.S. Senate has been the opportunity to get to know Michael. During his career with Time magazine, and more recently as President Reagan's personal photographer, he has exhibited a rare talent and established himself as one of a rare group of professional photographers who are universally recognized as true artists. When historians look back on the Reagan years, Michael Evans will be seen as the Matthew Brady of our time, not only for his work at the White House but also for his publication of "People and Power."

My wife, Marcelle, and I consider Michael and Storey Evans very good friends. I want to share with my colleagues a recent article about Michael from the New York Times. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OF PRESIDENTIAL IMAGE AND PRESIDENTIAL FOCUS

(By Irvin Molotsky)

WASHINGTON, March 14.—Michael Evans, who this weekend ends more than four years as personal photographer to the President, tells of the day he was "in hog heaven, shooting away with my little Leica with a 90-millimeter lens."

What was heaven was the sight of President Reagan and Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., arguing heatedly, an unusual occurrence despite the men's political differences.

Mr. Reagan had asked Mr. O'Neill to come to the White House to discuss the budget. Mr. O'Neill had just told Mr. Reagan that the poor would fall through his "safety net" and suffer mightily, and the President, in so many words, suggested forcefully that Mr. O'Neill had his facts wrong.

The result, for Mr. Evans, was several photographs, unpublished until now because the aide in charge of protecting the President's image, Michael K. Deaver, had forbidden it. But Mr. Reagan was less concerned about his image and asked Mr. Evans for some prints. "Geez, I didn't even know you were in the room," Mr. Evans said the President told him after seeing the photos.

THE GREATEST PRAISE

To Mr. Evans, that was the greatest praise and led him to conclude that he had succeeded in his goal: to create, unnoticed, a photographic archive of the Reagan White House.

The National Archives some day will probably discard 70 percent of Mr. Evans's office's output, photos that he calls "grip-and-grins." They are the political part of the job, showing the President doing such things as shaking hands with a county highway commissioner from Iowa, a newspaper editor from New York or a farmer from California.

Mr. Evans's staff, which numbers 40 these days, quickly makes enlargements and sends them to Mr. Reagan for autographing. In a few days they are on the walls of the recipients, mementoes of a once-in-a-lifetime visit to the President of the United States, pretty good cementers of future support.

Mr. Evans and the four photographers on his staff have shot 28,000 rolls of film. That's a lot of shutter snaps, but he says they are worthwhile, asking, "Don't you think it would have been wonderful if we had photos of Lincoln other than stiff poses?"

He defends taking grip-and-grins, for they show a Government and a President that are accessible to the public. "What other country does this?" he asked. To provide an answer, he told about the time Mr. Reagan almost became his fifth photographer.

In London last year, Mr. Evans accompanied the Reagan party to No. 10 Dowing Street. While the President had lunch with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, the others dined with their British counterparts, one of whom told Mr. Evans that since his name was on the lunch list he could have lunch, but since his name was not on the photographers' list he could not take pictures.

Mr. Evans seethed, and when the lunch was over, he went to rejoin the President, who said, "Michael, why aren't you taking pictures?"

Mr. Evans said he explained, then "the President offered to carry an Instamatic into his meeting with Mrs. Thatcher and take pictures of me."

"Then Mrs. Thatcher said, 'What?' and hauled the President and me into her Cabinet room and offered to pose with the President signing the guest book," Mr. Evans said, " 'Of course, madame,' I said."

Mr. Evans, only the fourth person ever to hold the title of personal photographer to the President, will not be replaced although his office will continue to take Mr. Reagan's picture. He plans to resume freelance work and spent the week packing up his Leicas and Nikons for the move to his studio/home near Dupont Circle.

He is 40 years old and his huge mop of hair has turned gray, but Mr. Evans is agile enough to sprint from his office to the President's in 15 seconds. He once taught ice hockey to the President, a sport that reflects Mr. Evan's Canadian heritage.

He is dusting off his memories of working as a photographer for the Cleveland Plain Dealer (where one of his regular assignments was to photograph the Dog of the Week) and the New York Times (where his assignments ranged from East End potato farms to covering Nelson A. Rockefeller and John V. Lindsay).

And he is ending four years in which he has had the vantage of the fly on the wall, observing drama and tragedy, trying to avoid being seen himself. He was standing behind Mr. Reagan when he was shot in 1981, but was so concerned about the well-being of his President and colleagues that he violated a rule of journalism by not getting good pictures.

WE ARE THE WORLD

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, during the 10 years that I have been in the Senate, I have always had world hunger as one of my primary issues. During that time I have been constantly impressed by the number of people outside of government who have given selflessly of themselves for world hunger. One of those people was my close and dear friend, Harry Chaplin, whom I eulogized here shortly after his untimely death.

Harry often spoke of Ken Kragen, who shared his concern for world hunger, and of the admiration he felt for Kenny Rogers, who joined Harry shortly before his death in efforts to eradicate world hunger.

Recently all Americans have heard the song "We Are The World." I would like to share with my colleagues part of an article from a national magazine recently written about the production and recording of this amazing production.

The progenitor of the project was singer Harry Belafonte who, impressed by the British famine effort and stunned by news accounts of the Ethiopian tragedy, had first conceived the American initiative last December.

Several days before Christmas, Belafonte called pal Ken Kragen, a high-octane manager, with fundraising ideas. "He figured, after all, the national song charts are dominated by black artists," says Kragen. "If Jews were starving in Israel, American Jews would have raised millions." Belafonte initially suggested staging a megastar-studded concert. Too difficult to pull off, said Kragen, recalling the money woes of the 1971 performance for Bangladesh. "Why not a record?" asked Kragen, whose interest in world hunger had first been aroused by the late Harry Chapin, an earlier singer client. "After all, the Band-Aid people didn't copyright the idea." Kragen then contacted Kenny Rogers and Lionel Richie, both of whom he also manages. Having taken over Chapin's antihunger crusade in 1981 when the latter died, Rogers readily agreed to participate. So did Richie, who had spent the past several days talking about just such a project with his wife, Brenda.

I also want to take this opportunity to applaud my friends Ken Kragen and Kenny Rogers and all the other artists who joined with them. Theirs is a dedication to an idea that should know no bounds—the desire to feed those unable to feed themselves.

AGENT ORANGE UPDATE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, questions arising from veterans' exposure in Vietnam to the herbicide agent orange and the possible long-term adverse health effects resulting from that exposure have long been of serious concern to me and many of my colleagues. A major focus of my efforts and those of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in both Houses has been research which might eventually lead to a greater understanding of the health-effects of agent orange exposure and how best to address the special needs of those veterans who may have been exposed to this herbicide.

In recent months, the results of two different studies—"Project Ranch Hand II, Mortality Update, 1984," conducted by the U.S. Air Force, and "Mortality Among Vietnam Veterans in Massachusetts, 1972-83," conducted by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health and the Massachusetts Office of Commissioner of Veterans Services, Agent Orange Program—have been published. At my request, the Office of Technology Assessment evaluated the methodologies and analyses used in these two studies and provided suggestions for further followup investigations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the OTA's very interesting responses to my inquiry on these two agent orange studies be printed in the RECORD at this point, and I commend these reports to my colleagues' attention.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT,
Washington, DC, April 8, 1985.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR ALAN: Thank you for your letters of March 20, 1985, asking OTA to review and comment on the Air Force's report "Project Ranch Hand II, Mortality Update, 1984" and the report "Mortality Among Vietnam Veterans in Massachusetts, 1972-1983." We had previously scheduled those two reports for discussion at a meeting of the OTA Agent Orange Advisory Panel meeting on February 28. As a result, OTA's response to your request benefitted from the comments of the advisory panel. The following two paragraphs summarize OTA's reviews.

The Air Force report updates the number of deaths and causes of death among Ranch Hands for the one year period ending December 31, 1983. It also compares numbers and causes of death among Ranch Hands with those in a comparison population of Air Force personnel who were not exposed to Agent Orange and to various defined populations. We agree with the Air Force conclusion that there is no evidence for unusual numbers or causes of death among Ranch Hands. The update, as well as the original report about Ranch Hands' mortality that was released on June 30, 1983, provides ample information for examination of the Air Force methods. In our opinion, those methods are appropriate and adequate.

The Massachusetts mortality study takes on special significance because it reports an excess of deaths from soft tissue sarcomas in Vietnam veterans. Those cancers are the type most frequently associated with exposure to dioxin, although studies done in different populations and parts of the world have produced conflicting results. While it may be tempting to conclude that the excess was caused by exposure to Agent Orange, the authors of the paper point out that they have no measure of exposure, and such conclusions would be entirely inappropriate. Given the conflicting information about the possible association of soft tissue sarcomas with dioxin, we think that the best course at this time is to regard the Massachusetts study as suggestive. The research community views the study in that light and is planning research to follow up on it.

Thank you for your kind words about our help in the past. If you or your staff have any questions about these reviews, please call me or Dr. Michael Gough or Miss Hellen Gelband of the OTA Health Program at 6-2070.

Sincerely,

JOHN H. GIBBONS.

PROJECT RANCH HAND II, MORTALITY UPDATE, 1984 AND MORTALITY AMONG VIETNAM VETERANS IN MASSACHUSETTS, 1972-83

OTA COMMENTS

In 1983, the Air Force released the first results from its study of mortality among officers and enlisted men who served in Operation Ranch Hand. At that time, there had been 50 deaths among Ranch Hands and 250 among the comparisons. The 1984 update reports 4 additional deaths among Ranch Hands and 15 additional deaths among comparisons to bring the total number of deaths to 54 and 265 in the two groups, as shown on the table below.

The most important numbers in the table are in the columns "percentage dead," which show that the overall death rates in the two populations are identical, 4.3 percent. There are some small differences seen in comparing subunits of the two populations. For instance, non-black Ranch Hand pilots, navigators, flight engineers, and black "other enlisted men" have lower mortality rates than their comparison group counterparts. In contrast, non-black Ranch Hand "other officers" and "other enlisted men" fared poorer than the comparisons.

When the data in the table are subjected to statistical analysis, none of the small differences seen between the Ranch Hands and comparisons is statistically significant. For instance, the percentage of dead Ranch Hand pilots is 3.4; that of comparison pilots, 4.3. While the percentages differ, they are based on such small numbers that the differences could be due to chance. For instance, if there were only 3 more deaths among Ranch Hand pilots, bringing the total to 15, the percentage of deaths in the two populations would be identical. Statistical tests are used to estimate the likelihood that observed differences are not due to chance. According to those tests, the difference between 3.4 and 4.3 percent might very well be due to chance, and not to a true difference between death rates in the two groups. The best summation of those data is to say that there is no evidence for any real difference.

The Air Force also compared the death rates of Ranch Hand officers and enlisted men to the rates seen in active duty and retired Air Force personnel, the general male population, and civil servants. Only active duty Air Force personnel have a lower death rate than Ranch Hands, and that difference is readily explained because annual Air Force physical examinations weed out men with health problems. The remaining comparisons argue against excess mortality being associated with Operation Ranch Hand and exposure to Agent Orange.

As shown in the table below, the death rate from all causes in Ranch Hands was the same as the rate in comparisons. However, death rates from specific causes differ in the two populations. Rates calculated on the basis of the small numbers of deaths that have so far occurred are subject to fluctuations because the addition of one or two deaths to the number in either population can change the rate dramatically. Nevertheless, the comparison of rates provides additional information that Ranch Hands are not dying at unexpectedly high rates from specific causes.

Although Agent Orange has been suggested as the cause of many different diseases, it is probably most often associated with cancer. Therefore, one finding of great interest is that the death rate from malignant neoplams (cancers) in Ranch Hands was 68 percent the rate seen in the comparison officers and enlisted men.

People who are convinced that Agent Orange causes cancer will not accept this finding as showing that Agent Orange doesn't cause cancer. Instead, they may suggest 20 to 30 years often pass between exposure to a cancer-causing substance and the appearance of the disease and that 20 years have not passed since heavy spraying of Agent Orange began. Therefore there is a possibility that the years to come may see an increase in cancer mortality related to Agent Orange. It is impossible to rule that out, but the absence of any current cancer excess is reassuring.

There are other differences in causes of death between Ranch Hands and comparisons; in particular the death rate from digestive system diseases was higher in Ranch Hands. When the Air Force published its first report of mortality, the difference was greater: 5 in the Ranch Hands and 11 in the comparisons. If the difference is due to chance, we expect that it will continue to narrow as more deaths occur in the years to come. For the time being, it is important to note that neither the lower cancer death rate nor the higher digestive system death rate is statistically significant. Proportionally more Ranch Hands were murdered, but it is difficult to understand how exposure to Agent Orange could be responsible for homicides; that statistically non-significant excess can be ignored. All in all, examination of cause in specific death rates does not suggest that Agent Orange exposure of Ranch Hands is causing an increase in death rates from particular diseases.

Scientifically, the Ranch Hand results are extremely important, coming from a careful study of a population known to have been exposed to Agent Orange. The comparison of their mortality rates to other Air Force personnel indicates that their exposure has not contributed to unusual causes or numbers of deaths.

COMPARISON OF SPECIFIC CAUSES OF DEATH OBSERVED AMONG RANCH HANDS AND COMPARISON AIR FORCE OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN

[1] Death rates are equivalent to number of deaths divided by the number of men in the population. The comparison of death rates was made by dividing the Ranch Hands' death rate by the comparisons' death rate and multiplying by 100 to express the result as a percentage.

[2] In this table, 100 percent means that the death rates in Ranch Hands and Comparisons were identical. Less than 100 percent means that the death rate from that particular cause was lower in Ranch Hands than in comparisons. Greater than 100 percent means that the death rate from that particular cause was greater in Ranch Hands then in comparisons.

[3] Rates were not calculated for causes in which the number of Ranch Hand deaths was 0 or 1.

Mortality Among Vietnam Veterans in Massachusetts, 1972–83

The Massachusetts Department of Health conducted a study (report dated January 25, 1985) examining deaths that occurred from 1972 through 1983 among Vietnam veterans who were residents of Massachusetts. According to the report: This study was motivated by a concern that Vietnam veterans may be at increased risk of dying from violent, preventable causes, such as motor vehicle accidents, homicide, and suicide.

The investigators, Michael D. Kogan and Richard D. Clapp, did find excesses for deaths from "external causes," which includes all deaths not caused by disease. There were also some unexpected findings: excess deaths from kidney cancer, stroke, and of greatest interest, a large excess of deaths from connective tissue cancers, also called soft tissue sarcomas. The soft tissue sarcoma finding was, statistically, the strongest result of the study, though it was based on only 9 deaths among Vietnam veterans. The study has come to national attention largely because of that finding, providing the first corroborative evidence for a possible link between phenoxyacid herbicides and soft tissue sarcomas that has been shown heretofore only in studies of Swedish lumberjacks published in the late 1970s. Many other studies, including a study of Vietnam veteran deaths in New York State, have failed to find such an excess.

Based on our reading of the study, and on comments from the OTA Agent Orange Advisory Panel, the study appears to be well-designed to take advantage of death certificate information and of a list of Massachusetts veterans discriminates between Vietnam veterans and veterans who did not serve in Vietnam. While the investigators used the information effectively, there are limitations inherent in the data sources that limit the strength of conclusions that can be drawn from this study. The investigators have pointed out the weaknesses and have not overstated their findings. They have plans to pursue the soft tissue sarcoma result using additional data sources. In addition, at least one other state, West Virginia, is conducting a study similar to the Massachusetts study.

The Massachusetts investigators, having no information about exposure, have not claimed any link of soft tissue sarcomas in Vietnam veterans and exposure to Agent Orange or dioxin. It is that possible connection, however, that has spawned intense interest in this study. The interest within the research community is sufficient, we believe, that other groups will be following up with similar veterans' mortality studies. We will, of course, keep abreast of the overall research effort, in the normal course of our Agent Orange and Vietnam Experience monitoring activities.

Kogan and Clapp used a "proportionate mortality ratio" (PMR) approach, which compares the proportions of deaths from specific causes in one group, with the proportions for those same causes of death in a comparison group. This study used two Massachusetts populations groups for comparison: 1) veterans who did not serve in Vietnam; and 2) non-veterans. Since most of the Vietnam veterans in Massachusetts are white males, the comparison groups were restricted to white males.

For all statistically significant findings, the investigators performed an additional analysis, a "standardized mortality odds ratio," which corrects some bias inherent in PMR analysis. The soft tissue sarcoma finding remains strongly significant.

Veterans were identified through a list of individuals who applied for and received a "military service bonus," from a state program similar to programs in other states, consisting of a one-time offer of money. Veterans who served for at least 6 months between July 1, 1958 and April 1, 1973, were eligible. Veterans who served in Vietnam were entitled to $300, those who did not, $200.

Both major data sources—death certificates and the veterans bonus list—are subject to certain biases, which may influence the outcome of the study. The reliability of information on death certificates is known to vary tremendously, often in unpredictable ways. When checked against hospital records, the cause of death is often misspecified, underlying causes often are not recorded, etc. In terms of this study, bias could be introduced if there were some subtle, systematic differences in the way diseases are diagnosed and death certificates filled out for Vietnam veterans compared with other men. For instance, because of the concern that soft tissue sarcomas might be related to dioxin exposure, it could be that a physician might be more inclined toward that diagnosis in ambiguous cases when the patient is a Vietnam veteran than when he is not. We have no way of evaluating the possibility of this type of bias in the Massachusetts study.

The veterans bonus list is also subject to bias. An estimated 95 percent of those meeting the criteria for military service received the bonus, according to the report. These individuals were self-selected, however, since it was necessary to apply for the bonus to receive it. If those applying were not representative of the total Massachusetts veteran population, a bias could be introduced, which could affect the study findings. Because such a large percentage of those eligible applied, we do not necessarily believe this to be a serious concern, though we do not know the details of how the 95 percent estimate was arrived at.

Taking into consideration all the possible limitations of the Massachusetts study, it still appears unlikely that chance or bias can account for the large excess of soft tissue sarcoma deaths. Whether the excess is casually associated with Vietnam service remains an open question, however. We are confident that the results of this study have given a stimulus to other groups to investigate the question of soft tissue sarcomas among Vietnam veterans, adding to an already busy agenda in soft tissue sarcoma research. At present, scientific curiosity coupled with a politically important issue is driving the system appropriately.

LUTHERAN MIDWEST BISHOPS' STATEMENT ON FARM CRISIS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, the Lutheran Midwest Bishops have taken a great deal of interest in the current rural farm situation. The seriousness of the farm situation affects the farmers and others in the community, not only economically, but personally, socially, and spiritually. The Lutheran Midwest Bishops have articulately pointed out the pervasiveness of the farm crisis, and I would like my colleagues to know and become aware of its seriousness.

I ask unanimous consent that this statement of the bishops be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGRI-COMMUNITY CRISIS: STATEMENT/LETTER OF LUTHERAN MIDWEST BISHOPS

(Lutheran Church in America, The American Lutheran Church)

As midwest Lutheran church leaders, we are seeing large numbers of farm families threatened by the strangling economic circumstances of our times. Experts predict that 80,000 farmers nationwide may go out of business in 1985; in midwest states some 10 to 25 percent will lose their farms this year. An estimated drop of $5 to $10 billion in net farm income in 1985, coupled with a projected 5 percent increase in expenses will make it economically infeasible for many to remain on the land in the future.

In the midwest, agriculture remains the foundation of the economy and of social and political institutions. Our rural churches and the communities in which they exist are being profoundly affected by rural economic decay. But the effects of an increased incidence of farm failures are far more pervasive than what is obvious in the countryside. Current economic indicators that meter an upswing for the U.S. economy have not adequately forecast the link between failed farms and the entire food industry, between farmers' decreased purchasing power and its effects on all agriculture related businesses. Such positive indicators do not reveal how farmers' inability to afford their collective existing debt affects rural banks and in turn poses a great danger to the national financial system.

In the midst of this intensifying rural crisis, churches are being called upon to provide assistance to families currently living with the personal residue of economic stress. Our resources are limited and our response is inadequate relative to the need, but our call to pastoral care is clear.

As leaders in the church, we also are obligated to respond to this crisis more wholistically. Recognizing its historical context, we are aware of the role of federal laws, regulations and policy decisions in helping to frame the current economic picture. U.S. management of the domestic food supply, international trade agreements and interest rates has fueled both the debt crisis and the consistently low level of farm prices. Seeing the human costs of such economic and political decisions, we question whether a nation defining itself as generous can permit these burdens to be borne disproportionately by some of us on behalf of all of us.

At a time when federal farm and tax policies affecting agriculture are being debated by the U.S. Congress, we must, as Christian leaders and responsible citizens, address the roots of this crisis in the countryside and advocate for changed policies that would both ease current financial dilemmas and restructure and refocus farm related programs.

We therefore respond with dismay to the Administration proposals for agriculture that would withdraw government support from an industry that is in the midst of a financial crisis paralleling that of the Great Depression. We object to administration proposals that would:

At this time cut farm price and income support programs and base payments on market prices rather than the cost of production. By excessive reliance on a free market philosophy in agriculture, we believe the federal government would be avoiding its responsibility to provide essential direction to balance production of farm commodities with the demand for them.

Pare down the federal commitment to the Farmers Home Administration by withdrawing from credit programs for low income and beginning farmers. This would further restrict the base of land owners and make farming an economic impossibility for those for whom the government is the designated lender of last resort, including many minority farmers.

Reduce federal support to conservation projects. We see this as a short-sighted means of cutting government spending. Preservation of food producing resources for future generations is not only in the farmers' economic self-interest but in the general public interest. We believe the public should share the economic burden.

We call on the Congress to develop instead a national farm and food policy based on principles of economic justice that would protect the rights of farmers and all those who depend on their production skills, including the hungry in the U.S. and abroad. Central to this policy would be goals of:

An adequate supply of safe and wholesome food at affordable prices for those able to pay, subsidized for those without adequate resources;

Development of economic policies that foster strong growth in the export market taking into account third world development;

Fair prices and legal protections for farmers and farmworkers;

Prudent and effective stewardship of land and other natural resources;

Equitable access to and widespread distribution of farmland and other production assets; and

Short term farm debt relief by making adequate funding available and by the lowering of interest rates.

In the longer term, we urge the Congress to renew its commitment to a viable, efficient, resilient, diversified, productive, widely dispersed and primarily owner-operated family farm system of agriculture. To underscore this commitment, Congress should express its intent to eliminate or minimize public policy incentives to farm consolidation, nonfarm investment in agricultural resources, economic concentration and production specialization.

As specific farm programs, economic and tax policies are being debated in light of the serious federal deficit, we ask members of Congress to consider alternative means of government involvement in the farm sector rather than indiscriminate withdrawal. We recognize the high cost of current farm subsidies and support program restructuring that would carefully target benefits to farms that need them most—those currently in the most serious financial trouble, particularly moderate sized family operations. Therefore, we affirm the need for a financial cap. Such targeting of benefits should also be implicit goals of government farm credit, research and extension programs and the U.S. tax code as it relates to agriculture.

In light of our responsibility as Christian leaders to carry out the scriptural impertive toward care of God's creation, we believe that long term stewardship of soil, land, water and energy resources should be an integral part of all farm programs. We support the creation of a national resource conservation policy as part of the 1985 Farm Bill and suggest that specific soil conservation requirements be made part of all acreage reduction programs, that federal farm program benefits be denied operators who plow up highly erodible land, and that a permanent conservation reserve by established to protect highly erodible soil.

Long-standing Lutheran involvement with the systemic injustices at the root of world hunger stands as a cornerstone to our commitment to food security at both the international and domestic levels. We believe that world food security should become a central goal of U.S. food policy as a means of fostering international prosperity, stability and cooperation.

LIBERATION OF THE NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMPS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, the commemoration of the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps causes us to reflect upon the course of our history. It causes me great sorrow to think of the many people who suffered at the hands of Nazi soldiers. It is my sincere hope that we never experience such immoral actions against any group of people in our world again.

When I listen to individuals, such as Elie Wiesel, speak of the memories they have of the Holocaust, it causes me to wonder how anyone could have survived the trauma of those events. I have great respect and admiration for the individuals who suffered at the hands of the Nazi soldiers. I am certain that the pain and suffering they have endured is too great to ever be fully understood by those of us who did not share their experiences. It is right that we take the time to commemorate their liberation from the Nazi concentration camps. The events that took place during this dark period of history, should never, ever, be repeated.

I believe that every survivor of the Holocaust would join me in saying that Jewish persecution still exists and it is occurring today in the Soviet Union. It is not the persecution the Holocaust survivors experienced in the concentration camps, but it is the denial of emigration rights to the Soviet Jews. We can remember the Holocaust and we can pay tribute to those brave people, some who died and some who survived the Holocaust, but we cannot change the course of events. However, there is still time to change the course of events for the Soviet Jews who are waiting for permission to emigrate. Over 350,000 Jews have expressed their desire to emigrate. Only 896 were allowed to do so last year. Obviously, there are many Jews longing to leave who are prohibited by the Soviet Union to do so. I believe it is vitally important that we continue to stand behind these individuals and continue to express our support for their freedom.

It is not my intention to take the attention away from those individuals who have endured the Holocaust—what they have endured cannot even be adequately comprehended—but I believe it is important to mention the plight of the Soviet Jews at every opportunity. We need to remember the past and look to correcting the human rights abuses of the present.

It is my hope that we can all join together in ensuring that human rights for all be advanced.

PRESIDENT VON WEIZSAECKER PRAISES JOHN McCLOY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the history of this century is illuminated by accounts of the public service of John McCloy. During World War II he stood at the right hand of Henry Stimson, one of the genuine statesmen this country has produced.

Later he became U.S. military governor and high commissioner for Germany and was a powerful influence on the emergence of the German people as a stable democratic society in the postwar era. During his stewardship he formed a close association with Konrad Adenauer, the first Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany. Their friendship symbolized the close relationship that has developed between the United States and the Federal Republic.

During the Cuban missile crisis, President Kennedy charged John McCloy with some of the most delicate negotiations with the Soviet Union. His success was a material factor in removing Russian nuclear weapons from the Western Hemisphere.

On March 31, 1985, John McCloy celebrated his 90 birthday. This significant anniversary was recognized by events in both New York and Washington.

On Tuesday, April 2, 1985, a birthday luncheon was held in Mr. McCloy's honor in the Senate Caucus Room. Many of Mr. McCloy's friends and associates in Government in both the United States and the Federal Republic were present to offer their congratulations.

The President of the Federal Republic of Germany, Richard von Weizsaecker, was a special guest at the luncheon. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the text of President von Weizsaecker's remarks be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

McCLOY LUNCHEON

(Remarks of Richard von Weizsaecker, President of the Federal Republic of Germany)

Senator Mathias, Mr. McCloy, ladies and gentlemen, it is a rare privilege for me to be present at this illustrious gathering convened today in order to honor John McCloy on the occasion of his 90th birthday. Compared with 90 years the short span of three years may seem insignificant.

Yet during three years in the early postwar period, some momentous, and I dare say, historic, developments took place. The responsibility for these events largely rests on the shoulders of Mr. McCloy. He became a kind of godfather to the infant republic that emerged from a period of destruction, despair and uncertainty. It was you, Mr. McCloy, who instilled confidence and trust. You showed deep concern and an unshakeable belief in the values of freedom and democracy, and by your sober judgment and dedication, you encouraged the growth of a stable political institution in the Federal Republic of Germany. You firmly and wisely believed that those lofty ideals enshrined in indelible passages of the constitution of your country also had solid roots in my country.

The stability of democratic institutions in the Federal Republic of Germany proved that our belief was well-founded. But it was not only pure political philosphy that helped provide stability, but also hard and quiet daily work done by you and your friends, and others who helped you. To my great joy and satisfaction, some of those personalities are present here, such as Shepherd Stone, a Berlin pioneer, and Eric Warburg, the great benefactor to many of us. I also might mention other people who helped you from the outset who are prevented from being here—people like Alex Moeller, or Kurt Birnbach and others.

Your humane example and your realism made you urge the political leaders in your own country to provide the beaten enemies (as quickly as possible) with food, fuel and transportation. You, more than anyone else, contributed to the conception of assisting and promoting economic recovery and convinced other allies to include the Federal Republic of Germany as a partner in the alliance of the free nations. You realized the importance of the free city of Berlin. You played the decisive role in selecting Lucius Clay for his historic task at the time of the airlift of Berlin. Later you convinced President Kennedy to go to Berlin—a visit never to be forgotten in American-German history. You are among the first to have turned enemies into friends. You have accompanied us all the way as a reliable friend, including being critical at moments when you felt it was necessary. That is to say: You have been a true friend.

At present a new generation is growing up in both our countries. To them the origins of this tradition of friendship may gradually recede into historical distance. Yet I think very much depends on keeping alive this awareness of shared values and common purpose. This is essential if we are to face the challenges of the future in a spirit of solid partnership and loyal friendship, in a spirit of common responsibility in very difficult times. As chairman of the American Council on Germany, you devote much energy and time to this task until this present day.

You have never been a moralist, never an ideologist. You always understood the overwhelming power of your nation to be used—not as a means to dictate or to educate other people—but to understand them, to help them, and to feel and act responsibly for them. The nobility of your mind and your heart, your modesty, and not the least your sense of humor have created profound respect for your personality, and trust and friendship between Americans and Germans.

SENATOR DOLE'S WELCOME TO AMBASSADOR KIRKPATRICK

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like both to thank our Senate majority leader and to welcome one of our party's newest Republicans. It is appropriate to do these two things together because of the welcoming reception our majority leader graciously gave for Ambassador Kirkpatrick.

He sees, and I agree with him, her change of party as the start of a trend, a long-term political equivalent of the San Francisco earthquake, as the majority leader phrased it.

I would like to share his remarks with those of my colleagues who were unable to attend, our Republican colleagues in the House, and with those members of the party across the country who join the majority leader in his eloquent welcome.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Majority Leader DOLE's address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR BOB DOLE—RECEPTION FOR JEANE KIRKPATRICK

Mr. Vice President, distinguished guests, Madame Ambassador, my fellow colleagues: Harold MacMillian once defined a diplomat as someone forever poised between a cliche and an indiscretion. Come to think of it, you could say the same of most politicians. Then too, diplomacy itself has been likened to handling a porcupine without disturbing the quills. And anyone familiar with this year's budget process will agree when I say—I know that sounds like the business of politics. Actually, Madame Ambassador, we just wanted a chance to express our admiration for the magnificent job you've done over the last four years in that diplomatic porcupine den called the United Nations.

AN END TO APOLOGIES

Just when a lot of Americans, including their elected Representatives, were disinclined to take the world body seriously, we elected ourselves a President who took it seriously indeed. A President who was determined to make it possible for a U.S. Ambassador to deal once again from a position of strength. He wanted someone who would stop apologizing for and start re-asserting this country's vital interests.

And in looking for such an unconventional diplomat, he went to one of the few foreign policy think tanks in this town which hadn't sprung a leak in recent years. In the process, he found himself a kindred spirit, a woman whose eloquence and vision matched his own.

After that, the U.N. wasn't quite the same, something most of us consider a singular improvement. As the years went by, representatives from non-aligned nations learned for themselves what we were already beginning to suspect: That the United States had, once and for all, removed the sign it used to wear to gatherings of the General Assembly or Security Council—the sign that read "Kick Me." What's more, people who didn't subscribe to Foreign Affairs Quarterly were discovering for themselves a diplomat whose command of the language was married to a shrewd grasp of the world the way it is. They liked what they saw. Because, for all her experience, she never appeared cynical or world-weary—although who in the world has a greater right to weariness than America's Representative to the U.N. forced to listen to instantaneous denunciations in a dozen different tongues?

A WELCOMED CHANGE

For many of us, it was a new and welcomed change to hear our U.N. Ambassador stand up for America's friends—and stand up to America's foes. It reflected Ronald Reagan's own efforts to banish the drift and confusion of recent years. For the first time in a long time, we stopped lowering our profile in the world. More important, we stopped lowering our flags at embassies throughout that world. And no one supplied more compelling arguments for a country unafraid of its own shadow than the professor-turned diplomat from Georgetown.

Those with long memories thought back to Henry Cabot Lodge, holding up the U.S. Seal used to bug our Embassy in Moscow—or Adlai Stevenson vowing to wait until hell froze over—or the Russian representative answered his question about the placement of offensive missiles in Cuba. Suddenly, diplomacy came to be more than meaningless generalities and finger sandwiches, more than the alcohol, geritol, and protocol Stevenson called it.

A POWERFUL VOICE FOR FREEDOM

Small wonder, then, that Jeane Kirkpatrick became an authentic heroine. Or that news of her impending switch to our party set off the political equivalent of the San Francisco earthquake. Jeane: If you promise to stay, we promise to strive—to continue your work toward a world where freedom finds its voice. There's no alternative, really, for in this day and age, those who love liberty can all agree—we must go on, or we will surely go under. Encouraged by your example, and propelled by your courage, we will go on. The President will see to that. We hope you will too.

And now, to present the newest convert to the Republican camp, I'm delighted to introduce my friend and colleague, Maryland's distinguished Senior Senator and a man who himself knows there's nothing partisan about peace: Ladies and Gentlemen, the Honorable Charles Mathias.

TRIBUTE TO AMERICANS FOR SUBSTANCE ABUSE NATIONAL CONFERENCE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am pleased, as chairman of the Children, Family, Drugs, and Alcoholism Subcommittee to bring to your attention plans for a historic event.

The Americans for Substance Abuse Prevention, who in less than 1 year have grown at a phenomenal rate to over 15,000 members, in planning their National Conference on "Freedom From Substance Abuse in America."

Program plans include a re-creation of the signing of the "Declaration of Independence From Substance Abuse," by various key substance abuse prevention leaders including President and Mrs. Reagan, pollster George Gallup, Senator ORRIN HATCH, Congressman CHARLES RANGEL, former Health, Education and Welfare [HEW] Secretary Joseph Califano, ADAMHA Administrator Dr. Donald Ian Macdonald, Dr. Joseph Pursch, entertainer Pat Boone, myself, and others.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues in the Senate to take note of this historic event, and urge you to participate fully in ASAP's efforts to combat substance abuse in this Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the conference agenda be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the agenda was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Noon–1:30 p.m. Conference Luncheon. Guest Speaker to be announced.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

FUNDS FOR SUPPORTING MILITARY OR PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS IN NICARAGUA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will report Senate Joint Resolution 106.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 106) to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on this joint resolution be equally divided between the majority and minority leaders or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask that the time be equally charged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quroum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPORT FOR THE DEMOCRATIC FORCES IN NICARAGUA

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today we will be debating and voting for additional support for the democratic forces fighting in Nicaragua. I believe that it is important at the outset to clarify what is at stake in Nicaragua. The issue in Nicaragua is whether democratic forces inside Nicaragua will have an opportunity to participate in their countries government or whether the forces of totalitarianism will succeed in consolidating their power and smash the opposition.

Those who oppose continued aid for the Nicaraguan democratic forces say that all this talk of Communists, Marxists, and totalitarianism is just so much paranoia and cold war rhetoric. To that I say do not take my word, take the Sandinista's word.

In the September 30, 1983, issue of Playboy, Nicaraguan Minister of the Interior, Tomás Borge whose responsibilities include internal security and censorship stated explicitly that he was a Communist.

In the December 24, 1984, issue of Newsweek, Borge was quoted as saying, "You can not be a true revolutionary in Latin America without being a Marxist-Leninist."

In November 1977 during an interview with Luis Baez, Ernesto Cardenal, a former Trappist monk and the current Nicaraguan Minister of Culture, said he felt "that not only can a Christian be a Marxist, but in order for him to be authentically Christian, he must be a Marxist, with the emphasis on 'must'."

In a November 7, 1979, letter to Franciso Rivera, Humberto Ortega, Nicaragua's Defense Minister, confided,

It is right that we demand more [regarding] standards and party line, more class consciousness and more Marxist ideological clarity, but let us not do this on an open and mass level, since we run the danger of becoming sectarian and isolating ourselves from the masses.

Later in August 1981, in an address to the Sandinista military, the Defense Minister declared, Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our vanguard to understand the historical process and to create the revolution.

In May 1984, Bayardo Arce, one of the nine Sandinista comandantes, began a speech to the political committee of the Nicaraguan Socialist Party that was secretly tape recorded and later published in the Spanish newspaper, La Vanguardia, with the the greeting, "Good morning, comrades." He goes on to discuss "the focus that we Communists should give to the electoral process." Later in the body of the address Arce goes on to say:

Imperalism and we all know that that is a code-word in the Marxist lexicon that means the United States) asks three things of us: to abandon interventionism, to abandon our strategic ties with the Soviet Union and the socialist community, and to be democratic. We cannot cease to be internationlists unless we cease being revolutionaries. We cannot discontinue strategic relationship unless we cease being revolutionaries. It is impossible to even consider this.

There are more of these quotes, but this should be enough to give even the greatest skeptic reason to reconsider what motivates the Sandinistas. By contract, who are these democratic freedom fighters? Is this just more rhetoric? Aren't the people we're supporting in this war just as bad as the Communists? Again let's look at the facts and then judge for ourselves.

The largest of the Nicaraguan freedom forces is the FDN [Nicaraguan Democratic Forces]. It was founded in 1982, and was composed primarily of former Somoza guardsmen but it quickly attracted a more broad based memberhip. Today former guardsmen comprise less than 2 percent of the FDN as compared to 20 percent being ex-Sandinistas. Even in FDN military leadership where most of the exguardsmen gravitated former Sandinistas still outnumber former guardsmen by a significant margin—43 percent to 32 percent with the remaining composed of campesinos and others.

The FDN leadership is composed of six people—five are civilians and former Sandinistas and one, Enrique Bermudez, is a former Somoza guard. The leaders of the other major armed Nicaraguan opposition group is also filled with former Sandinistas. Two of the best known names are with ARDE [the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance]—Alfonso Robelo an Eden Pastors. Robelo was an original member if the Sandinista junta, but left in July 1981, and Pastora, sometimes known as Comandante Cero, was a Sandinista military leader and after the revolution was made Deputy Minister of Defense. He left the Sandinistas for the armed opposition in December 1981. Another well-known figure from Nicaragua is Arturo Cruz. Cruz is the former director of the Sandinista Central Bank, a member of the junta and former Nicaraguan Ambassador to the United States. Cruz is not with the armed opposition, but he is a chief spokesman of the political opposition to the Sandinista regime.

On March 2, 1985, several of the armed and unarmed opposition groups met in San Jose, Costa Rica to form a coalition known as the Nicaraguan Resistance. At this meeting they issued a document calling for:

First, a national dialog with the Sandinistas under the sponsorship of the Nicaraguan Bishop's Conference.

Second, a guarantee of protection for the participants in the dialog.

Third, a cease-fire in place.

Fourth, lifting the state-of-emergency.

Fifth, amnesty for political prisoners—approximately 3,500; and Sixth, guaranteeing the rights of habeus corpus and asylum.

In addition this newly formed group even offered to recognize Daniel Ortega, the current Sandinista President, as President pending a plebisite. The democratic freedom fighters in Nicaragua are seeking only to participate in truly free and open elections, not an automatic place in the government as the Salvadoran guerrillas have insisted.

When you take a look at the facts—the admissions by the Sandinista leadership of Communist/Marxist affiliations, the association with the Soviet Union and other Communist regimes as compared to the membership and political program of the democratic Nicaraguan freedom fighters—you can see that by supporting the freedom fighters we are supporting the forces of democracy and pluralism in Central America.

I suppose it is possible that the Sandinistas could claim to be Communists or Marxists and still adopt programs that are good for their people and regional neighbors, but what does the record show? The record shows that the Sandinistas have disregarded the rights of their people and have become a threat to the other countries of Central America.

When reviewing the human rights situation in Nicaragua, it is hard to know where to begin. At its constitutional convention in 1983, the AFL-CIO condemned "the betrayal of the Nicaraguan revolution by the Sandinista government." In March 1984 one of the AFL-CIO newspapers reported that from the very beginning of the Sandinista government in July 1979 the FSLN, that is, Sandinista party, pushed for the disbanding of all independent labor unions. When the two largest unions refused to go along with the plan the Sandinistas launched a campaign to force them into line.

But the Sandinistas have not limited themselves to harassing independent labor unions; they have engaged in much more serious practices. From 1981-84 the major independent Nicaraguan human rights organization, the Permanent Human Rights Commission [CPDH], which also reported human rights violations during the Somoza regime, reported receiving 97 complaints of deaths attributed to the Sandinista's civil or military authorities. In each case, the death occurred shortly after the deceased had been detained by Sandinista officials who has fully identified themselves. The CPDH has never received an adequate response to its inquires about these deaths, but sometimes they have received threats when they have asked too many questions.

In 1984 the CPDH documented 60 cases of disappearances in which the Sandinista security forces were implicated. The Organization of American States [OAS] 1984 human rights report supported the CPDH contention by reporting.

Concerning the right to live, human rights organizations have continued to denounce violations, especially in the form of forced disappearances and as a result of the abuse of power by members of the security forces.

We do not know for sure what has happened to those people who have disappeared and whose bodies have yet to show up in some remote field, but we do have some idea of what happens inside the Sandinista jails. On May 30, 1984, Amnesty International reported in a press release that it had "confirmed that some prisoners have been tortured or ill-treated in Nicaragua." Also in 1984 the Sandinistas continued to deny the International Red Cross access to the prisoners detained in the special state security facilities. Sadly, we can only suppose what goes on inside these special jails the Sandinistas fear to open to the view of objective eyes.

The Sandinistas have also shown little tolerance for ethnic groups. Take, for example, the Miskito Indians. Though not widely known the Miskito Indians have historically had little to do with the rest of Nicaragua. During the colonial period, the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua, where the Miskitos live, was under the British sphere of influence. It is not coincidence that the largest port on the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua is called Bluefields—not a very Spanish sounding name. The Miskitos have always lived apart, even Somoza left them alone, but not the Sandinistas.The Sandinistas have tried to force the Miskitos under the control of the central government. In 1982, 10,000 Miskito Indians were forcibly uprooted from their Rico Coco homeland and moved to a place prepared for them by the Sandinistas. They are still prohibited from returning home. In April and May 1984, an estimated 2,000 more Miskitos joined literally thousands of their fellow Indians who had fled to neighboring Honduras—continuing evidence of Sandinista persecution of the Miskitos.

What do we find in Nicaragua under the Sandinistas—murder, disappearances, torture, and forced relocations, all standard tools for a totalitarian society. But no totalitarian government is complete without censorship of press, and what do we find in Nicaragua—sure enough. From January to October 1984, before the November election, the editors of January to October 1984 before the November election, the editors of Nicaragua's only independent newspaper, La Prensa, reported that the government censored 20 percent of their stories on national and international events. The paper did not even appear on at least 14 different occasions during the year because of censorship. The editors say that after the election the government doubled its censorship.

The press are not the only ones censored. So is the Roman Catholic Church. Despite the fact that 80 percent of Nicaraguans practice catholicism, the Sandinistas have banned televised masses by Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo since 1981, and during 1984 they refused to air his Sunday sermons live. From this one might think that the Archbiship had been a supporter of Somoza, but this was not the case. He was an outspoken critic of the Somoza regime. Somoza occasionally referred to the Archbishop as "Commandante Obando," a reference to the fact that Somoza considered the prelate to be in league with the Sandinistas.

Some had hoped that the election held last November would bring peace and sanity to Nicaragua. But this hope was quickly dispelled when it became clear how the Sandinistas intended to conduct them. The man the Sandinistas chose to organize the elections referred to them as a nuisance, and was quoted as saying,

Of course, if we did not have the war situation imposed on us by the United States, the electoral problem would be totally out of place in terms of its usefulness. What a revolution really needs is the power to act.

This was a bad omen for the election.

Only about half of the political parties in Nicaragua actually participated in the election. Of course, the Sandinistas participated. In addition, three of the other parties involved in the election were various explicit Marxist parties. The Independent Liberal Party [PLI] also participated for a while. The PLI was allied with the Sandinistas from 1980 until February 1984 when they withdrew to begin preparations for the election. They withdrew from the election on October 21 declaring that conditions in Nicaragua made a fair election impossible. The Government, however, refused to take them off the ballot.

The story was similar for the Conservative Democratic Party, but they had had an even harder time from the very beginning. They did eventually win the release of some 60 members of their party from jail but claimed that the Sandinistas still held 140. Faced with the harassment of the Sandinistas, the Conservative Democratic Party met to vote on withdrawing from the election, but the meeting was disturbed by Sandinista Front members and a vote never took place.

It is true that some international observers said the actual balloting process was fair, but considering that two-thirds of the polling places had poll watchers only from the Sandinista Front, and that the obstacles and harassment prevented the active participation of all the major opposition parties, it was hardly necessary for the Sandinistas to add insult to injury by actually fixing the ballots. They had taken care of that by rigging the election process.

If it is not bad enough that the Sandinistas are turning Nicaragua into a totalitarian state, they have also become a threat to their neighbors. In February 1981 the Sandinistas announced that they would build a 200,000-man militia to "defend the revolution against counterrevolutionaries." But the same February 20, 1981, New York Times article that reported this announcement point out that there was "surprisingly little counterrevolutionary activity" at the time. This was before the founding of the FDN, and almost a year before the defection of Cruz, Pastora, and Robelo, the men associated with the other political and military Contra forces.

If the counterrevolutionaries were not a serious problem, then why would Nicaragua need a 200,000-man army? The answer must be that they were afraid of the United States, right? Wrong. Between the victory of the Sandinistas in 1979 and 1981, the United States provided this new Nicaraguan Government with $118 million in economic assistance—more than we had provided to the Somoza regime in the preceeding decade. Hardly the actions of a hostile power. By the date of this announcement, the Reagan administration had been in office only 1 month and was focusing almost exclusively on economic issues—getting the high inflation and interests rates down and providing tax cuts to get the economy started again. At this point there were no American advisers in El Salvador, there had been no training exercises with the Honduran Army—all of these were to come later. Even the Marxist guerrillas in El Salvador were doing well, and the right-wing death squads were undermining the credibility of that government. So why did the Sandinistas need a 200,000-man army?

Manpower is not the only thing that has interested the Sandinistas. The number of tanks and armoured personnel carriers is up from 28 under Somoza to 340 under the Sandinistas. The number of helicopters is up from 7 to 30, and the number of artillery/rocket launchers is up from 3 to 70.

This regional arms buildup might not be bad if it were to be used for defensive purposes. But what is the record? From June 1982 to the present, Costa Rica has sent 13 protest notes to Nicaragua over border incidents. Remember, Costa Rica has no army. The Costa Rican Foreign Minister once told me that he had been told by the Nicaraguan Ambassador to the OAS that the United States was not a reliable ally because Nicaraguan tanks could be in San Jose before Costa Rica's note requesting American assistance reached Washington.

Costa Rica is not the only country bordering on Nicaragua with problems. In June 1983, the Government of Honduras issued a public document listing 210 border incidents since July 1979. The pattern of Nicaraguan border incidents has continued. On January 11, 1984, a Nicaraguan Army patrol crossed into Honduras and killed 11 Miskito Indians—including three children.

Considering how well-behaved Nicaragua has been with Costa Rica and Honduras, it is, I am sure, improbable that the Sandinistas have been providing any assistance to the Salvadoran guerrillas. Again, let us see what the Sandinistas themselves have to say about such things:

Bayardo Arce was quoted in a September 12, 1983, New York magazine article saying, "We will never give up supporting our brothers in El Salvador."

In the same article, Nicaraguan Defense Minister Humberto Ortega declared, "Of course we are not ashamed to be helping El Salvador. We would like to help all revolutions."

In the September 1983 Playboy article that has already been cited, Nicaraguan Minister of the Interior was asked to respond to the assertion that since the revolution in Nicaragua triumphed, "it will be exported to El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico? To which Borge responded, "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that is absolutely true."

It is no wonder that Nicaragua's neighbors feel threatened. But they are not the only ones in Nicaragua's sights. On March 3, 1985, the Miami Herald carried several articles on Nicaragua's link with international terrorist groups.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the articles printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I should like to quote from one of the articles the descriptions of who is in Nicaragua:

> Some indeed are fugitives: Italians from the Red Brigades and Unita Combattente Communist; West Germans linked to the Baader-Meinhof Gang; members of Spain's Basque ETA separatist guerrillas; leaders of Honduras' Cinchonero guerrilas; militants from Peru's Shining Path; Montoneros from Argentina; Tupamaros from Uruguay; and a hodgepodge of Salvadorans, Costa Ricans, Colombians, Chileans, Guatemalans, Paraguayans and Bolivians.
> On February 8, the Italian government handed the Sandinistas a list of 22 left-wing Italian extremists believed to be living in Nicaragua, some already sentenced in absentia to 22 years in prison, some wanted on arrest warrants, others describing only as "subversives."

This reads like a Who's Who of international terrorism. The only ones who seem to be missing are the PLO, but, no, they have not been forgotten. In fact, the Sandinistas have allowed the PLO to set up an embassy and diplomatic staff in Managua. The PLO-Sandinista link goes back to at least the 1970's when the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine [PFLP], one of the most extreme of the PLO units, provided training in Lebanon for about 150 Sandinistas.

You might say, "So what?" to the fact that the Sandinistas are leading their people down the road toward totalitarian dictatorship, that they are murdering and torturing their people, that they are a military threat to their neighbors, and that they are associated with various international terrorist groups. What concern is this to the United States?

If this is not enough, let me show you why I think important American national interests are at stake in Central America. For starters, let us review our dependence on the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea. Through these waters transits 45 percent of U.S. foreign trade and 55 percent of our oil imports. Over 90 percent of the U.S. supply of strategic minerals such as cobalt, manganese, titanium and chromium, all vital for industrial or military use, comes either directly from the Caribbean Basin countries or travels to U.S. ports through the Caribbean Sea from other locations. And in the event of a military emergency in Europe, 60 percent of our total resupply/reinforcement material in the first 60 days would sail through these waters. This point is very straightforward—these waters are vitally important to the United States.

You might ask what could Nicaragua or Cuba do in the face of an superpower like the United States. For an answer, let me review what Hitler's U-boats accomplished in this region without the benefit of a friendly port or potential aircover. Within 6 months, the German U-boat fleet sank 260 merchants ships in the Caribbean area. There is no telling what the Soviets might be able to accomplish with the largest submarine force in the world and two friendly bases of operations, Cuba and Nicaragua. This is, of course, to say nothing of the Panama Canal and the complications it would pose for American stategic planners to be denied unhindered access to this vital waterway. This 52-mile-long canal with its numerous locks could easily be put out of action by a terrorist group or hostile air power by knocking out a single lock or sinking a ship in transit; 44 percent of our Alaskan crude oil travels through the Canal, not to mention the flexibility it offers the U.S. Navy by allowing most ships to travel easily from one ocean to another.

For the United States one of the most serious aspects of the Nicaraguan problem comes from its close association with the Soviet Union. From 1981 to 1984 Soviet-bloc military deliveries have increased 200-fold to 18,000 metric tons. In addition, the bloc has provided Nicaragua with at least $70 million for nearly 40 new military facilities. This is not to mention the manpower, training and support that have been supplied by the bloc. There are approximately 100 Soviet military advisers in Nicaragua, around 3,000 military advisers from Cuba and scores of others from Bulgaria, East Germany and other Soviet-bloc countries or their allies. These people are used to train the Nicaraguan armed forces, their internal security forces, that is secret police, intelligence operatives and so forth. There have even been reports of Cuban military advisers with the Sandinista troops battling the democratic freedom fighters. Furthermore, the Saninistas are working on a 10,000-foot runway at Punta Heute which when completed will be the longest in Central America and capable of handling every aircraft in the Soviet inventory. At the very least this could enhance Soviet reconnaissance capabilities along our west coast in the same way that Cuba has provided a huge boast in Soviet reconnaissance along our east coast. At the worst this airfield could someday provide a base for advance Soviet jet fighters or bombers that could provide aircover for Nicaragua's activities against its neighbors, or to support broader Soviet ambitions. It certainly is not encouraging to learn that Nicaraguans are receiving jet fighter training in Bulgaria and elsewhere.

It is true that in the event of a major problem in Western Europe or the Persian Gulf, the United States could secure its flank against Cuban or Nicaraguan activities. But that is not the point. In military actions, the speed and size of the response is often critical to the success of the mission. If the United States had to take the time and devote the resources to ensuring that our vital sea lanes were secure from Cuba or Nicaraguan supported interdiction, then we could lose valuable time and resources in responding to an area of the world where America's national interest is unquestionably at stake.

Finally, there is the issue of Nicaraguan involvement in international narcotics trafficking. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism, I conducted hearings last Friday into the role of the Nicaraguan Government in narcotics trafficking. What was revealed was shocking, but provided incontrovertable proof of the intimate involvement of numerous officials in the Sandinista regime in narcotics trafficking. And this trafficking is aimed directly as the youth of our Nation.

Mothers and fathers in the United States of America need to know that the Nicaraguan people, some in high government positions, are engaging in narcotics trafficking.

Testifying at this hearing were two eyewitnesses to activities in narcotics trafficking: two individuals who participated in meetings that included, at various times, fugitive Robert Vesco; Nicaragua Minister of the Interior Tomas Borge; Frederico Vaughn, another Sandinista government official; and numerous other representatives, who were tested by both the Department of Justice and the Department of Treasury and determined to be telling the truth in their statements, stated unequivocally that there is direct involvement by members of the Nicaraguan Government in the trafficking of narcotics destined for the United States. I do not think that there can be any question of Sandinista complicity in narcotics trafficking.

Clearly, the United States has a stake in what happens in Nicaragua. We are trying to decide what is the best course to follow. Some say let us use Contadora and the diplomatic process. I support Contadora because I believe that we should exhaust all the options we can in order to achieve a peaceful resolution of the problem.

But I also support aid for the democratic forces in Nicaragua because that also holds out an option for a peaceful settlement. I support the democratic freedom fighters in Nicaragua because I support democracy. These brave men and women willing to lay down their arms and talk about a peaceful resolution of the problems of Nicaragua, but they need to know they have the countinued support of the world's greatest democracy.

Since the founding of the Bolshevik regime in 1918, no Communist regime in the world has voluntarily relinquished power. The record is not encouraging, but the democratic forces fighting in Nicaragua are willing to give it a try. If, however, the Sandinistas prove, like Hitler in World War II, to be unwilling to reach a reasonable accommodation through peaceful means, then the forces for freedom and democracy must have the resources to defend themselves and their ideals. That is why I support aid for the Nicaraguan democratic freedom fighters. That is why my colleagues should support aid for the Nicaraguan democratic freedom fighters.

WORLD'S LEFTISTS FIND A HAVEN IN NICARAGUA

(By Juan O. Tamayo)

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.—Scores of left-wing militants from around the world—some of them wanted on terrorism charges in their home countries—have settled in revolutionary Nicaragua since the Sandinista triumph of 1979.

Some are treated by the Nicaraguan government as virtual diplomats, representing their organizations. Others are fugitive militants, granted jobs, identification papers and safe haven.

An overwhelming majority are simple political exiles or leftist sympathizers come to express solidarity with the Sandinista revolution and mingle with ideological brethren in a friendly environment.

Several Sandinista officials acknowledge, however, that a significant minority, mostly Latin Americans, are active guerrillas, plotting the overthrow of home governments. They hold strategy meetings and, sometimes, undergo military training here and in Cuba, the officials say.

The Reagan administration has used the presence of so many people with ties to left-wing groups as proof that Nicaragua has become a nest of international terrorism. U.S. officials say they will focus on these links in asking Congress to resume U.S. assistance to anti-Sandinista rebels. Anti-Sandinista leader Alfonso Robelo calls Nicaragua "the center of terrorism in Latin America today."

But several knowledgeable sources interviewed in Managua, elsewhere in Central America and in the United States argue that Nicaragua is less a terrorists' training ground than a tropical sand-and-surf watering hole for the international revolutionary set.

One leftist intellectual close to both exile circles and the Sandinista leadership called Nicaragua "a winter barracks for over-repressed guerrillas." Training of foreign terrorists, he said, "is not government policy."

Whether they are guerrillas-at-ease or terrorists-in-waiting, it is clear that Nicaragua is attracting them by the droves.

On almost any day, Argentine and Uruguayan guerrillas gather at the Yerba Buena, a beatnik-style coffee shop-bookstore in the heart of Managua. Salvadoran rebels can often be found dining at the Los Gauchos restaurant. Italians and Germans gather for small house parties.

Some are indeed fugitives: Italians from the Red Brigades and Unita Combattente Comunisti; West Germans linked to the Baader-Meinhof Gang; members of Spain's Basque ETA separatist guerrillas; leaders of Honduras' Cinchonero guerrillas; militants from Peru's Shining Path; Montoneros from Argentina; Tupamaros from Uruguay; and a hodgepodge of Salvadorans, Costa Ricans, Colombians, Chileans, Guatemalans, Paraguayans and Bolivians.

On Feb. 8, the Italian government handed the Sandinistas a list of 22 left-wing Italian extremists believed to be living in Nicaragua, some already sentenced in absentia to 22 years in prison, some wanted on arrest warrants, others described only as "subversives."

"CLEAN CONSCIENCE"

The Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry has denied any knowledge of the 22 Italians. Sandinista officials also say their "conscience is clean" regarding the Reagan administration allegations they consider most damaging to their image: Reputed links to Libyan strongman Mu'ammar Qadhafi, Iranian Moslem extremists and Colombian drug traffickers.

However, one ranking Sandinista official acknowledged that "we can't deny everything. . . . It is perfectly possible that on special occasions there would be [training] courses scheduled." The official, like almost every other knowledgeable source contacted, agreed to talk about the sensitive issue on promise of anonymity.

Some Nicaraguan officials, though not many, say they regard the aid to leftists as retaliation for U.S. support for anti-Sandinista guerrillas. And they say the European leftists are fighting NATO, "the symbol of American imperialism in Europe."

Conversations with a variety of sources indicate that the Sandinistas draw a careful distinction between guerrilla movements that have armies in the field and terrorist organizations that specialize in bombings, kidnappings and assassinations. Guerrillas, especially those from El Salvador and other Central American countries, can get training and guns. The others, mostly from Europe, are kept at arm's length.

HELP WAS DENIED

But on occasion the Sandinistas have even denied help to Latin American guerrillas. Leaders of Colombia's April 19 Movement have told friends they were denied permission to use Nicaragua as a staging base for their 1981 incursion into Colombia's Caqueta province. A Peruvian writer known to be close to Shining Path guerrillas was expelled from Nicaragua last year. And Salvadoran rebels said that the Sandinistas almost refused them permission to use the Managua airport as a stopover last month for 10 crippled guerrillas traveling from Costa Rica to Europe for medical treatment.

Despite these occasional rejections, Nicaraguan government officials said, the Sandinistas have built an extensive, intricate and highly discreet system for maintaining and cultivating contacts with the foreign leftists and funneling different kinds of assistance to them.

Many Sandinista officials acknowledge that in a sense they are repaying past favors. The Palestine Liberation Organization trained at least 150 Sandinistas in Lebanon during the 1960s and 1970s, said a former Israeli intelligence agent who used to live in Nicaragua. And Argentina's Montonero guerrillas sent 20 to 30 foot soldiers to fight in the revolution, said Eden Pastora, a one-time Sandinista turned opposition guerrilla leader, in a Miami interview.

CUBA RELATIONSHIP

The Sandinistas' relationship with Cuba dates back to 1961, when Interior Minister and Comandante Tomas Borge underwent guerrilla training there. Hundreds of Sandinista rebels eventually trained in Cuba. And in 1979, Havana sent several planeloads of guns and ammunition for the final offensive against President Anastasio Somoza.

Controlling today's aid system in Nicaragua is the Sandinista Front's Director for International Relations, supervised by Bayardo Arce, like Borge one of the nine comandantes who have ruled Nicaragua since 1979. Arce is regarded as one of the most radical of the nine, which also included Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega.

The directorate, all of the sources agreed, manages the Sandinista party's "fraternal" relations with everybody from official ruling parties, to loyal oppositions, to broad front coalitions, leftist alliance, guerrilla groups and bands of terrorists.

"This includes groups battered by repression because of their active opposition to their governments," said one Nicaraguan official. "Many of these are underground groups."

And many of them are still virtually underground in Nicaragua, under Sandinista orders to stay out of public view. Long-time Sandinista said this is the same wink-and-a-nod arrangement the Cubans imposed on them when they lived in exile in Havana in the 1960s and 1970s.

The sources said at least 30 of the clandestine groups have delegados in Managua who are officially recognized by the directorate. A delegado has three duties: maintain official contacts with the Sandinista Front: organize his group's meetings, publications and other political work; establish links with other foreign groups and potential sponsors.

PLO EMBASSY

The Palestine Liberation Organization has an embassy and diplomatic staff in Managua. Colombia's April 19 Movement has a political office. The Salavdoran guerrillas have three news and propaganda offices, as well as a clandestine radio transmitter.

Once a delegado has established himself, his key job is to find work for down-and-out compatriots living in Nicaragua, Sandinista Officials said. The directorate will not help here, but allows the delegado to exploit his personal contacts within the government.

One Latin American exile living in Managua said that Montoneros in 1980 offered to use some of their savings, amassed in dozens of ransom kidnappings, to build a Managua factory that would employ some of their guerrilla countrymen. There is no indication whether the project was carrried out.

Several of the delegados have taken advantage of the Sandinistas' hospitality to summon followers abroad to strategy-setting sessions in Managua. Peru's Shining Path held a "Spirtual retreat" last year to study Von Clausewitz's book On War and "the theory of betrayal" according to Shakespeare's Macbeth, said one person who attended.

Sandinista officials usually stay away from such revolutionary seminars, sources said, although they almost certainly know about them. "They are notoriously careful about who they let into the country, so it must be with their knowledge," one official said.

A former of official of the Nicaraguan Interior Ministry who now lives in Costa Rica said the directorate also occasionally helps fugitive guerrillas and terrorists by arranging financial aid through labor unions and other Sandinista-run organizations. It also can provide safe houses, false passports, Nicaraguan identification cards and false license plates, he said.

The Interior Ministry's General Directorate for State Security and the Sandinista army, the source added, both have officers specially assigned to help any foreign leftist that gets into trouble—a car accident or a drunken brawl.

For the first four years of the revolution, the sources said, the Sandinistas provided a steady flow of aid and assistance to their leftist friends, especially the Salvadorans.

RIPE FOR REVOLUTION

"The Sandinista triumph brought a certain revolutionary euphoria," said one Sandinista official with close ties to the exiles. "We thought all Latin America was ripe for revolution, so there was a lot of assistance going out. Those people could count on support."

But by mid-1983, the official said, and especially after the U.S. invasion of Grenada in October of that year, the Sandinistas "began to realize that the tide of Latin American history was moving against us."

On Nov. 20, 1983, the Sandinistas gave the Salvadoran guerrillas two days to transfer some of the people out of Nicaragua and close down some safe houses. They moved some of their logistics operations, including a radio station, to more discreet locations on the outskirts of Managua, Salvadoran rebel officials said.

A year later, however, the Sandinistas moved in still another direction after noting that controversial U.S. policies—the Grenada invasion and deployment of U.S. cruise missiles in Europe—had gone forward without effective international opposition.

Seeing themselves as the next target for U.S. aggression, Nicaraguan officials said, the Sandinistas sought closer ties with the radical European left, the failed anti-missile movement, other Latin American leftists and even U.S. liberals.

Visitors from the United States, Europe and Latin America now return home, said one official, "sensitized to the Central America problem, and if they've spent any time at all here they have passionate sentimental links to Nicaragua."

Some of the visitors leave with more than passions. According to several of the sources, there is a second level of Sandinista assistance to Latin American leftist volunteers—one that includes military training.

Cuba's top military representative in Nicaragua, Gen. Arnaldo Ochoa, runs this program through two parallel chains of command, according to the former Interior Ministry official and two present Sandinista government officials.

"CUBAN FORCE"

One, the "Cuban Force," is made up entirely of Cuban officers. The other, the "International Force," has only Latin American exiles, many of them Argentines, Chileans and Uruguayans, who live in Cuba and hold officers' rank in the Cuban military. All foreign military advisers are issued Nicaraguan identification cards, the defector added.

Sources with access to the People's Sandinista Army's payroll records said about 700 Cuban military advisers and 555 International Force officers were in Nicaragua in 1980. The number tripled the following year, they added.

The pick of the Latin American volunteers go to Cuba for instruction in special camps in the western province of Pinar del Rio and an installation near Guanabo, close to Havana, known as "Base 00," the defector said. In 1983, he said, he saw Cuban military officers at the Managua airport escorting 10–12 Costa Rican volunteers aboard a plane for a flight to Havana.

Second-level prospects, the sources said, are trained in Nicaragua, either in groups from the same country or as individuals integrated into regular Sandinista army units. Several Honduran guerrillas captured in 1983 and 1984 described 2½ years of training in Cuba and Nicaragua, followed by several months of fighting with the Nicaraguan army against anti-Sandinista rebels.

Still, most foreign leftists living in Nicaragua did not come to hone military skills or hide out.

The majority are political exiles who fled right-wing governments, or they are militant leftists who moved to Nicaragua because of what one South American intellectual called a "moral imperative" to support the Sandinista revolution.

Many of the exiles, usually professionals and technicians who would have difficulties working in more developed countries, also came to Nicaragua because they can find jobs here, replacing a managerial class rapidly fleeing Sandinista rule.

And Nicaragua is a safe haven, a place where enemies cannot easily watch them, where they can gather in groups and perhaps persuade the government to grant them the kind of international solidarity that the Sandinistas enjoyed during their long struggle against Somoza.

"The Sandinistas received a lot of help when they were guerrillas," said a one-time high-ranking Sandinista security official now living in Costa Rica. "Now the others are collecting the debt."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. SIMON. I thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I say to my colleagues in the Senate that I also wish to discuss this Nicaraguan aid situation briefly.

First of all, I point out to Members of this body who have not read the resolution that it is an open-ended resolution, and I am quoting:

For supporting directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

It means we can send American troops. We could drop a nuclear weapon. I am not suggesting anyone is seriously thinking about doing that.

Mr. President, I think there are a few basic questions, and the most basic of them all is, Should the United States be involved in the violent overthrow of a government of another country?

The administration would say that is an improperly framed question. I think that in fact is the fundamental question because the Contras make no bones about that being their aim, and they are the people we are supporting.

My conclusion is unless we would face the most extreme situation, if we face an Adolph Hitler in some country somewhere, maybe we should be involved in trying to overthrow that government. But that would be a once-in-a-century kind of an occurrence.

In general, we should not be involved in trying to overthrow the government. Violence invites violence. If we use terrorism against other countries, other countries will feel justified in using terrorism against us.

Some of the other questions:

Who are the Contras who are fighting the Sandinistas?

Well, they are a mixture of good and bad. The Democratic Revolutionary Alliance, for example, is a group that I think beyond any question wants to restore a full democracy in Nicaragua. But the largest group, the Nicaraguan Democratic Force, the FDN, is a group that is supported by the CIA, and they have a number of Somosa people with them. Some people say that Somosa people dominate. Others say they do not. It is very difficult to get at the truth. But in any event, the Contras are a mixed bag, some of whom we would like to associate with, some of whom I think we would clearly rather not associate with.

The second question, and the Senator from Florida has alluded to this, Have the Sandinistas given the people of Nicaragua good government? By our standards, they have not, though it is probably better than the government that preceded them. They have permitted some opposition. It has been limited. They have permitted one opposition newspaper, La Prensa, though it is censored. They have conducted an election. It was not a totally free election, but it was not a complete sham, either. It was a better election than is held in many of the dictatorships around the world that we support. They have reduced illiteracy. They have improved public health. But we should not fool ourselves. The Sandinistas are not Boy Scouts. I think it is very clear that there is a Marxist orientation to that leadership.

To add some confusion, they have provided greater freedom of the Roman Catholic Church than has the Government of Poland, for example, or the other Communist nations, with an exception I think we would have to say of Hungary. When the Pope visited Nicaragua he was treated crudely by that Government there.

The Government is not a western style democracy. It is not the Government we would like to see there. But that is true of most governments on the face of the Earth.

Another interesting question: Who is the main trading partner of Nicaragua? I know of no precedent for what we now have. We are the No. 1 trading partner of Nicaragua. We recognize Nicaragua diplomatically and at the same time we are involved in trying to overthrow the Government there. I just do not understand that. And if the Government is so onerous that we have to apply pressure then we should apply diplomatic pressure, trade pressure, other pressure rather than sending down weapons for destroying these people.

Nicaragua purchased 106 million dollars worth of material from us last year, including ironically 10 millon dollars worth of lubricating oil that is essential for their military, and we bought about 116 million dollars worth of products from them.

But it is a strange situation we face there.

Another question: Are the Contras guilty of atrocities? My distinguished colleague from Iowa just a moment or two ago showed me this Newsweek magazine. I have not had a chance to read it. I saw the picture of someone—a Northwestern University student—who was traveling with the Contras took where someone was forced to dig his own grave and then was stabbed in the neck. The pictures are in this week's Newsweek magazine.

I do not say this is typical. I do not know. But the New York Times the other day printed this account of one incident. It says:

> Santos Roger Briones, 16 years old, said he was travelling in a Government-owned dump truck. . . . Nearly a kilometer ahead was a pickup truck carrying armed soldiers who had been supposed to protect the unarmed civilians from an attack by anti-Government guerillas who have been operating in the mountains of northern Nicaragua. . . .
> "Suddenly, Mr. Briones recalled, the dump truck was peppered with rifle, machine gun, grenade, and rocket fire. Many in the truck were wounded instantly. Those who could, jumped down and ran for their lives.
> "I was hit in the foot and was covered with blood, so I lay on the ground, pretending to be dead," said Mr. Briones. He said he remained motionless as men in blue uniforms robbed him of his boots and wallet. "Then the Contras came and cut the throats of the people who stayed on the truck," he said.
> "When they were finished, they set the truck on fire," he added. "From where I was lying, I could hear the groans and screams of those who were being burned alive."
> All told, 21 civilians ranging in age from five to 60 were killed, eight wounded, and one kidnapped in that incident.

I am not at all sure these are the kind of forces we want to be identified with. Yet that is what we are asked to do. Would the Contras establish a government which is any better than the government that is there now? I do not think anyone knows. It would probably be less inclined toward the Soviets, and from that political perspective it might be a little better. But whether they would in fact offer any more freedom to the people there, there is very little evidence to suggest that.

Is what we are doing to aid the Contras a violation of international law? It clearly is a violation of international law. It is interesting in this whole field that we have not been willing to submit to the International Court at The Hague. And I think that is a grave mistake in and of itself.

Do other anti-Communist governments in Central America support our stressing sending military aid to the Contras? They do not. They oppose it. Does the Roman Catholic Church support what we are doing? The bishops have made very clear in their testimony to Congress that they oppose what we are doing. They think we are making a bad mistake. What should we be doing?

I spoke last week to about 20 education leaders from around the world that the State Department invited into the United States. One of them happened to be from Nicaragua. I turned to him, and I said, "What should we be doing in Nicaragua?" And he said, "I don't particularly like the Sandinistas. I don't like the Contras." But he said, "Let us solve our own problems. Don't send down all your weapons and destroy us." And I think his advice is sound.

I would add if we are interested in preventing Marxism from rising in Central America—and we should be—then we ought to respond to the needs of the people in that area. You could visit Nicaragua 20 years ago, 30 years ago, visit El Salvador, visit the other countries of Central America, and you would know there were problems. Let me give you one other example.

Right now the United States provides about 391 full scholarships for all of Central America to come to college in the United States. The Soviets supply about 7,500. I do not suggest that every student that goes to the University of Moscow or the Patrice Lamumba University is going to come back a dedicated Communist, but there unquestionably is going to be an ideological tilt just as the students who come to the United States return to these countries there is a tie to the United States. What I am suggesting is that if we vote this $14 million that is going to be used by the Contras, we will be doing little if anything to resist Marxism. My guess is we are playing into the hands of Marxists. But if we are really interested in doing something long range, instead of sending $14 million down in military equipment, let us provide scholarships, let us attack the poverty of that area, and let us do some constructive things that show the people of that area that we care.

Many years ago before I was a Member of Congress, our family drove down the Pan-American Highway to San Jose, Costa Rica, a trip I would not recommend to anyone today. But when we were in San Jose, we visited with Jose Siguerres, who was then the President of Costa Rica, whom I had known before. In the living room of his home—this is when Richard Nixon had just become President of the United States—was only one autographed picture. It was an autographed picture of Hubert Humphrey. I asked him. I said, "Mr. President, I am curious. Why do you have that autographed picture of Hubert Humphrey there?" He said, "We sense that Hubert Humphrey cares about us." What the United States has to be doing is to care about people of Central America, not view them as pawns in some East-West struggle. We have to care. We have to be concerned. And if we are concerned about the people, then we are going to respond in ways that are infinitely more effective than this $14 million which is a boomerang that we are sending into the air that is going to return and haunt us and hurt us.

I hope my colleagues in the Senate will pay close attention to what we are doing, will not vote for this open-ended resolution, will use some caution and prudence, and send a message to the White House as well as to all of Central America that we are rethinking our policies there.

Mr. HARKIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I rise in strong opposition to the resolution before us and the request by the administration to provide the $14 million in aid to the so-called Nicaraguan Contras.

Mr. President, let us be clear on the issue before the Senate today. It is not about whether the United States will provide $14 million to Nicaraguan Contras. It is not a referendum on the Nicaraguan Government. The issue is simply this: Does the Senate of the United States give its approval to the active, open encouragement, and support of the overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua, support which will indisputably result in an escalation of military conflict, further destabilization in Central America, and in taking the United States closer to war in that region?

Let there be no doubt, Mr. President, the vote today in the Senate is the equivalent of the vote on the Gulf of Tonkin resolution in 1964. Not since that time have the American people been subject to such demagoguery hypocrisy and hubris on the part of the administration. Not since that time has the Senate faced a vote as significant as the one we face today, a vote which provides such a clear choice between peaceful negotiations or increased U.S. military intervention.

The record of this administration in the conduct of Central American policy is frighteningly reminiscent of the Vietnam experience. Just as in Vietnam, we hear an administration engaging in gross deception, distortion and duplicity in its attempt to explain and justify increased military involvement in the internal affairs of a foreign nation.

Just as in Vietnam, we see an administration pursuing a course of action which may well lead to direct military intervention.

Last week, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KERRY, and I released a report issued by the Institute for Policy Studies which gives us good reason to doubt the administration's sincerity in its efforts.

This study is entitled "In Contempt of Congress," and it details the way in which the Reagan administration has consistently misrepresented to the Congress and the American people its intentions and actions in Central America.

From the outset of the administration's covert war, we have been misled as to its true purpose. To quote the President, from a statement before a joint session of this body and the House of Representatives on April 27, 1983, "Let us be clear as to the American attitude toward the Government of Nicaragua,"

He continued, "We do not seek its overthrow. Our purpose in conformity with American and international law is to prevent the flow of arms to El Salvador."

But that was not then, or is it now, our purpose in Nicaragua. Moreover, this policy has flagrantly violated both the laws of this Nation and international laws. Clearly, the intent of funding the Contras has not been to interdict arms. Four years and 150 million tax dollars later, the CIA's Contras have not captured a single major cache of arms.

Intelligence officials have claimed that they can hear a toilet flush in Managua. Yet $150 million and 4 years later, they have not produced one truckload of rifles or ammunition since we authorized this regrettable policy.

Within 6 months of the President's statements to us, within 6 months of the President saying that our goal was not to overthrow the government, the CIA, under the direction of Bill Casey—who, I might add, was President Reagan's campaign director in 1980, so I have to believe that the President knew what was going on—the CIA was drafting a manual on how to conduct guerrilla warfare in which it was stated, "This is the moment in which the overthrow can be achieved and our revolution can become an open one."

Yet, 6 months before, our President said our goal was not to overthrow the government.

This manual further urges the CIA paramilitary army to practice selected violence upon the Nicaraguan people, including assassinating civilians, a patent violation of the President's own executive order against such activities.

Mr. President, as my colleague from Illinois just stated, it was with a feeling of sickness, of total revulsion, that I opened this week's issue of Newsweek and looked at the pictures of the so-called democratic army at work. The pictures show graphically the same kind of things we saw in Vietnam, summary executions.

Here is an individual in this picture digging his own grave and then one of these—did I hear earlier?—brave democratic fighters bound the hands of this person and systematically shoved a knife through his throat, putting him in the grave he himself had dug.

These are the brave, democratic fighters we are supporting? Echoes and pictures of Vietnam come back on us again.

These are the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers? Binding the hands of an unarmed person not even in uniform, making him dig his own grave, and systematically slitting his throat?

Is this what the CIA has been up to in urging selected violence and assassinating civilians?

We trusted the administration to abide by the conditions we set on aiding the Contras and they abused that trust and they treated Congress with contempt.

Time and again, U.S. officials have come before the Congress to testify that their activities in Central America are benign and in conformity with the law. Well, that is just not so.

Let me cite just a few examples of how we have been misled.

When Congress expressed its concern that U.S. military construction in Honduras was designed to aid CIA operations against the Sandinistas, we were told by Nestor Sanchez of the Pentagon that there would be no coordination, no contact, no communication of any kind between U.S. military operations and the CIA Contra program. Yet, investigators from the Government Accounting Office were told by military officials in Honduras that the supposedly temporary base constructed by the U.S. Army "will be left behind for use by the CIA personnel."

We have been told by one administration official after another that the Nicaraguan arms buildup is offensive in nature and threatens its neighbors. Yet, an intelligence report cited in the Wall Street Journal earlier this month states:

> The overall buildup is primarily defense oriented, and much of the recent effort has been devoted to improving contra insurgency capabilities.

We were told by Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger that the United States had not mined the harbors of Nicaragua when, in truth, the CIA, with the authorization of the President, had done just that. I remember well the words of the senior Senator from Arizona, Senator GOLDWATER, who said, "This is an act of war."

Given this record of deception, it is difficult now to believe the President when he portrays the $14 million provided by Senate Joint Resolution 106 as a "peace plan" that will provide humanitarian aid through the CIA to the contras. Imagine that. A peace plan that will provide humanitarian aid through the CIA to the Contras.

Does the President really expect us to believe that the same CIA that wrote the murder manual encouraging the Contras to assassinate civilians, this same CIA that bombed Nicaragua's main oil storage facilities, the same CIA that mined Nicaraguan harbors, is now going to set up soup kitchens in the mountains of Honduras?

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SIMON. I think the Senator is pinpointing what is extremely important. I know negotiations are going on now to limit that $14 million to strictly humanitarian aid. The Senator from Iowa and I have fought for humanitarian aid for people all over this world. We will continue to. But, frankly, at this point I feel as the Senator from Iowa would suggest, I just do not trust this administration to see that that really is humanitarian aid going to people who need it, but somehow it is going to be used in the wrong way.

I gather the Senator from Iowa feels exactly the same way.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator. There is no way that this $14 million through any U.S. agency is going to go for humanitarian aid. It will go to help Contras. They say food, clothing, medicine, and things like that for the contras. Well, the Contras need that to continue their war. Whatever other money they have, they will go out and buy arms with and continue in their attempt to overthrow the Government of Nicragua, with our help.

That is why I agree with the Senator from Illinois. If the administration truly wants humanitarian aid to help the refugees, I will be the first to vote for it, and I know the Senator from Illinois will vote for it, too, if that aid is provided through the United Nations Commission on Refugees or the International Red Cross. But not through the CIA of the United States.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. HARKIN. What the President honestly calls a "proposal to help restore peace and democracy in Nicaragua" is really the ultimate deception. This is not a plan for peace. It is a plan for war, as the administration acknowledged in its report to Congress, and this was quoted in the New York Times: "Direct application of U.S. military force * * * must realistically be recognized as an eventual option."

There you have it. The President is saying that we must recognize that he might eventually use military force if, in fact, the Contras are not successful.

Mr. President, what we are being asked to do today is to give a green light to the administration's plan to escalate the war against Nicaragua. Until now, the main weapon of this undeclared war has been the Contras.

The President would have us believe that the Contras are "freedom fighters." He would have us believe that they are the "moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers." This is a perversion of our history and of the fundamental values upon which our country is founded. This is but another attempt to mislead the American people about the true nature of the struggle in Central America. And it is shameful beyond belief.

Again, I ask him to look at these pictures, these pictures in Newsweek magazine, and tell me that an individual who has the arms, who makes an unarmed individual dig his own grave with his bare hands, binds his hands and systematically slits his throat, is the moral equivalent of George Washington and those who fought our revolution.

The founders of this Nation did not engage in killing innocent men and women. They did not engage in systematic torture and atrocities. Yet that is what is being conducted by the Contras. This Nicaraguan force, the FDN, closely associated with the CIA, is misnamed when they call it the Nicaraguan Democratic Force. While it is true that the FDN has a civilian directorate made up of some opponents of the Somoza government, it is equally true that the CIA organized these civilians as a facade to cover up the fact that the FDN was founded by officials of Somoza's National Guard and that the same national guard officials dominate the military command of this organization today. Those who call the shots, those who control the guns, were members of Somoza's hated praetorian army, the Nicaraguan National Guard; 9 out of 10 of the top men are Somocistas. The head of the FDN, Enrique Bermudez, is a member of the national guard who founded the Contra group. One of his closest associates, Ricardo Lau, has been linked by the Honduran military to death squad activity in Honduras. And according to the former head of military intelligence in El Salvador, who escaped, got out with his life intact and came to this country, Mr. Lau, one of the leaders of the Contra group, second in command to Enrique Bermudez, participated in the assassination of Archbishop Oscar Romero in El Salvador. Let us never forget the unforgivable execution of this peaceful man, dedicated to God, who was gunned down while leading his parishioners in a Sunday morning mass.

No, the Contras are not freedom fighters who reflect the ideals and values of the American people. They are terrorists whose atrocities have been documented by respected human rights organizations. In a recent report, the independent human rights organization, Americas Watch, stated that the Contras "have attacked civilians indiscriminately. They have tortured and mutilated prisoners." Look at the Newsweek pictures again:

> They have murdered those placed hors de combat by their wounds; they have taken hostages; they have committed outrages against personal dignity.

Last weekend, I had the opportunity to meet with the victims of such atrocities in Managua. Senator KERRY and I visited with Mrs. Zoila Rosa Dominguez, whose 22-year-old daughter, Estrella, who had just graduated from school and was going to be a teacher in the mountains, was killed by Contras in an ambush on January 3 of this year. Estrella loved children and chose to teach them. Her mother showed us her college graduation picture and she gave us a message which I want to share with my colleagues:

> I would thank you for anything you could do to make this war stop.

Killing unarmed school teachers is not the act of democratic peace-loving people. Torching rural health clinics, raping peasant women, slitting the throats of noncombatants, are all acts we were told about by American missionaries working in the areas of Contra activity, actions which do not reflect the values of the American people.

Yet these were atrocities which this administration has underwritten in the past through the help of the CIA and what we are being asked to underwrite in the future with this $14 million.

There is no doubt that if the Contras ever took power, they would exact revenge on the majority of the Nicaraguans who supported the Sandinistas.

"Come the counterrevolution, there will be a massacre in Nicaragua," one member of the FDN stated in 1982.

"There will be bodies from the (Honduran) border to Managua."

And as we weigh the President's request, we should recall the words of Arturo Cruz, who has now joined the FDN as one of its civilian leaders—who lives in the United States, I might add. In 1983, he wrote in Foreign Affairs Quarterly—quoting from Arturo Cruz:

> Those who aid insurrection in my country * * * should be aware of the risk they take of bearing a historical responsibility for contributing * * * to a possible mass execution of the flower of our youth.

The possible mass execution of the flower of our youth. That is what these Contras are up to.

I asked Arturo Cruz about that, after he wrote it, and he said yes, because the young people are the ones who supported the Sandinistas.

Look at who is in power. The president is 38, the speaker of the assembly is age 31. These are all young people who supported the Sandinistas, and Arturo Cruz said at that time that if the Contras take over, there will be mass executions of our young people. These are the democratic forces that we are asked to support.

If the President has misrepresented the true nature of the Contras, he has been equally misleading about the Government of Nicaragua. Just as Arturo Cruz said that the Contras would possibly execute the youth of Nicaragua en masse, just as some of the Contras themselves have said there would be a blood bath from the Honduran border to Managua, on the other hand, look at what the Sandinistas said when they took over. They overthrew Somoza, brutal as he was, oppressive as he was, who emptied every bomb, every artillery shell on the people of Nicaragua.

When the Sandinistas took over, what was one of the first things they did? They enacted a provision outlawing the death penalty in Nicaragua, a provision which still stands today. There is no death penalty in Nicaragua, even for the hated members of the former national guard.

Oh, yes, they are in prison. But they did away with the death penalty so as not to enact any kind of vengeful activities against those who worked for Somoza.

Yet let there be no doubt, if the Contras take over, the blood will flow because that is the type of individual who really represents the main body of the Contra forces.

Mr. Reagan asserts that the Nicaraguan Government is a totalitarian dungeon and that they have instituted a reign of terror. I do not want to suggest that the Nicaraguan Government has ever been a model of Western-style democracy, either under Somoza or the Sandinistas. Nor will they ever be, given our current policies. Civil liberties have been limited under a state of emergency declared after a major Contra attack in March 1982. Nevertheless, we must look at the facts: A country that elects a national assembly, one-third of whose members are vocally anti-Sandinista, whose economy is 60 percent privately owned, that allows freedom of assembly so that when we went down there last week we met with groups of individuals who spoke openly against the Sandinista government—they met openly. They were not afraid to voice their opposition.

A country that prescribes no legal sacntions on political dissent or in the fields of literature, in the arts, a government, as I have said, that has abolished the death penalty I do not believe is exactly the model Marxist-Leninist regime that Mr. Reagan would have the American people believe. By any objective standard, Nicaragua's civil and human rights situation compares favorably to other countries in Central and Latin America which we currently support. In El Salvador, the security forces and death squads have killed over 39,000 noncombatants over the last 5 years. Two opposition papers were shut down—one destroyed by Government tanks and the other closed after several members were killed by the death squads. At least a dozen priests have been murdered including Archbishop Romero. In Guatemala we do not know how many thousands of civilians have been killed because we cannot even get in there to check it.

In Chile, under the state of seige reimposed by General Pinochet, press censorship, religious persecution, and violations of human rights go on while the administration chooses to look the other way. In Chile, the press is forbidden to report on anything of a political nature.

And yet last week when we were in Nicaragua, I picked up a copy of the opposition newspaper, La Prensa. This is the newspaper they say is always being censored. I looked at the front page—and I had all of these things interpreted for me—and here is the top article. It says, "Dominicans Support Reagan's Plan," a story about how the Dominican Republic has supported Reagan's plan to fund the Contras. Here is a photograph on the front page of President Reagan with some ultraconservative European individuals and he has in his hand a document that says: "An Urgent Message From Europeans to Congress: Support Nicaraguan Resistance"—right on the front page of the paper. There is another article that says, "13 Product Prices Go Up." It is a story on raging inflation. Here is another article that says, "Russians Construct a Communications Center," and here is another one at the bottom that says, "United States Threatens to Break Relations"—all on the front page of a newspaper in a country that we are told has no press freedom and yet they are printing stories and pictures of President Reagan, saying that they are supporting the contras' overthrow of the Sandinista government. Well, I tell you, if this is an example of the Sandinista's press censorship, then they are woefully ineffective at best, I would suggest.

Sure, there have been restrictions on the press of a military nature, but Senator Kerry and I were both told that if the Contra activity were to stop, if there were to be a cease fire, that they would lift that and have total press freedom within Nicaragua. What we saw there is even more than what they have in Chile today, and yet the administration turns its head when it comes to Chile.

Under the state of siege in Chile, the right to assembly has been suspended and yet you can assemble, you can do whatever you want to do in Nicaragua if you want to protest the government's activities. Even before the reimposition of the state of siege in Chile, the Human Rights Commission reported more than 150 killings occurred in the last 4 years. As recently as 3 weeks ago two political activists were murdered by death squads in Chile. Recently, Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs Langhorne Motley said in an exclusive interview with the government-controlled El Mercurio in Chile that he is aware that "the transition"—that is, the transition to democracy—"is especially difficult when there are violent antidemocratic terrorist attacks."

When asked to comment on the freedom of the press in Chile, Motley refused to discuss the issue because "every situation is different." The transition to democracy in Chile is "difficult when there are violent antidemocratic terrorist attacks," but evidently in Nicaragua it is supposed to be overnight when the Contras are conducting their activities. And so when President Reagan denounces the level of civil and human rights being enjoyed by the citizens of Nicaragua, I really question his sincerity. When Jeane Kirkpatrick talks about dictators and double standards, I question to whose dictators and whose double standards she is really referring. If the administration has such concerns about the situation in Nicaragua, it ought to be concerned and committed to doing something about other countries where human rights are systematically violated. I can only conclude from this administration's attitude toward Nicaragua, yet turning its head from places like the Philippines, Chile, and other countries, that it has an ideological phobia about Nicaragua. What it points to is an administration both confused and misguided in developing consistent standards for determining whether or not a nation is a friend or foe. It should make no difference whether the nation in question is Chile or Nicaragua, the Philippines or Cambodia, South Africa or the Soviet Union. Our concern for civil and human rights must be fundamental, consistent, and unwavering.

So, Mr. President, far from enhancing our real national interests in Central America and the world, this administration's policy is destabilizing the region and damaging our international credibility. The administration's attempts to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua have been roundly criticized by many, including some of our closest Western allies. When the administration mined the harbors of Nicaragua, France led an initiative at the United Nations to condemn the United States, and even Prime Minister Thatcher excoriated this flagrant violation of international law. European representatives at the World Court have joined their colleagues in ruling that the covert war violates the norms of international behavior. And our European allies have been resentful of U.S. pressure of them to isolate Nicaragua economically.

Finally, the prestigious Council on Foreign Relations has released a report which details the concern and controversy within the NATO alliance as a result of our policies and actions in Nicaragua. It concludes that the U.S. trend toward military intervention threatens to undermine NATO, the pillar of U.S. national security.

Mr. President, the Reagan administration's policy toward Nicaragua is a senseless one. If we truly believe in the rule of international law, then let us abide by international law. If we flagrantly violate it, how can we stand then up to the Soviet Union and others who violate international law? Our policy toward Nicaragua is immoral. It ties us to the acts of the terrorists. It is illegal. It flagrantly violates the Charter of the United Nations and the OAS and it is counterproductive. Far from eliminating Soviet influence, U.S. pressure has forced the Sandinistas to turn increasingly toward the Soviet Union for military and economic aid. Far from promoting stability, it has promoted destabilization. And far from encouraging negotiations, it has increased aggression and brought us to the precipice of war in Central America.

We now face a choice—pursuing a policy of peace or escalating a senseless war in Central America. I believe we now have a window of opportunity, a chance for a dialog, and the possibility for peaceful coexistence with Nicaragua. Last week with my colleague from Massachusetts, Senator KERRY, I went to Nicaragua. We had extensive talks with Foreign Minister Miguel D'Escoto and President Daniel Ortega. I returned convinced that there is a sincere desire for a normal and a positive working relationship with the United States.

I do not want to be overoptimistic. I do not want to say that next week they want to embrace and love the United States. What I did detect was a sincere desire to begin taking the first steps for having normal and friendly relations with this country.

I want to emphasize that we did not travel to Nicaragua to negotiate, and the administration's insinuation that we are meddling and causing problems stands in marked contrast to the April 16 letter from the Secretary of State to Speaker O'NEILL. Secretary Shultz stated in that letter:

> I strongly encourage Members of Congress to visit not only Nicaragua but all the countries of the region.

Well, that is what he said in his letter. Yet, when we go down and come back with different impressions, when we come back with a memorandum that indicates that the Government of Nicaragua is indeed willing to take those initial steps toward dialog, toward a cease-fire, toward having fundamental freedoms secured in their country, toward deescalating the conflict, when we return with a memorandum which indicates that the Sandinistas reaffirm their policy of not having any missiles and not having Soviet or Cuban bases, we are told that we are meddling. I resent that, Mr. President.

My colleague from Massachusetts, Senator KERRY, and I have an obligation, not only to the constituents who elected us but also to the people of this country, to make certain that we have enlightened debate on this issue and that we are not blindly led down the path by this administration's deceptions and duplicity with regard to our conduct in Central America. We went to Nicaragua to express to them the legitimate security concerns of the American people and to seek clarification of their posture on those issues.

Those concerns we underscored included, first, the potential establishment of Soviet or Cuban bases in Nicaragua; second, support for subversion beyond the borders of any one country; third, the continued militarization of the region, including the presence of foreign military advisers and the arms buildup.

The Nicaraguans do acknowledge that the United States has legitimate security interests in the region. In frank and lengthy discussions, they enunciated their position on the Contadora act as an avenue for peace and cooperation in Central America. This contains provisions for removing all foreign military advisers, prohibiting foreign bases, and limiting the arms buildup. In addition, they reiterated their commitment to a strong verification procedure which would prevent violations of these clauses once the treaty was signed.

What more could we ask than we do this, to protect our own security interests in the region? Their security interests, we were told, lie in establishing peaceful bilateral relations with the United States. If the United States were to end the covert war and return to the negotiating table at Manzanillo, leaders of the Government of Nicaragua stated that they would call for a cease-fire with the Contras, ask for help from the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees for relocating Contras who laid down their arms, and would immediately lift censorship of the press and guarantee fundamental freedoms.

I want to state again that they are not asking for the Contras to give the guns to them. They are willing to have the Contras turn their guns over to the Government of Honduras or to the Government of Costa Rica, and they were not saying that all the Contras would be happy to be brought back to Nicaragua. If they want to live in Honduras, if they want to come to the United States, as many Vietnamese did, or if they want to live in Costa Rico, if those governments would allow it, that would be fine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the opposition has expired in morning session.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I thought the morning session was to expire at noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the opponents has expired.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to continue speaking until a speaker from the proponents' side arrives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARKIN. So, Mr. President, here is an opportunity for us again to protect the interests of Honduras and Costa Rica, both of whom were legitimately concerned at Manzanillo, and that is why the talks broke up. Manzanillo was concerned that there would be a 1,200-man army in Honduras with all the guns.

Here is an opportunity for us to answer the legitimate concern of Honduras.

Again I point out that this was not a formal proposal they offered. It was part of our exchange of thoughts and mutual concerns. Nevertheless, I believe it provides us with the potential for taking a new path toward peace and improved relations in Central America.

Mr. President, with U.S. policy toward Nicaragua at a crossroad, it is imperative that we take the road not taken up until now. The real security, the real national interests, and the real values of our country are at stake. For 4 years our foreign policy has relied on the example of force; now we have the opportunity to provide the force of example of our great country.

Mr. President, while the Contra force that we are supporting, as the distinguished Senator from Illinois has stated, is made up of disaffected Sandinistas, others who have left the country, and others who may have individual reasons for joining the Contra force, nonetheless, the Contra force was started by, is directed by, and is controlled by former members of the Somoza national guard who keep an iron grip on the arms and the tactics of this Contra force.

We cannot deal with those people and we cannot in good conscience commit ourselves to a policy of continuing to fund and support the kind of activities we see graphically illustrated in these pictures in Newsweek.

I recall that it was 15 years ago this summer that I traveled to South Vietnam as a congressional aide. Through a series of circumstances, I was able to get in and photograph the now infamous tiger cages that were set up on a remote island by the South Vietnamese Government—pits in which 10, 15, 20 people would be crammed, young people. I visited in these tiger cages with young people, aged 15 and 18, and old people who had been suspected of aiding the enemy. POW's in violation of the Geneva Convention, were kept in these tiger cages.

While it outraged me that the South Vietnamese Government was doing that, what really outraged me was that it was done with our complicity; that it was done under our observation and direction; that the shackles and the handcuffs used in the tiger cages came from the United States; that the direction in those prisons came under the Agency for International Development. That is what really outraged me.

Those of us my age or older may remember the photographs I took of those tiger cages, with Representative HAWKINS of California, and Representative Anderson of Tennessee. It was a graphic illustration of the type of individuals we were dealing with in South Vietnam and what our policy was.

Again, these pictures that have come out of the jungles of Nicaragua show us the type of people we are dealing with in the Contras. Democratic forces do not tie your hands and slit your throat.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMON. I have been advised by a staff member that it may be proposed as a compromise, so-called, that the United States impose a trade embargo on Nicaragua, rather than sending in the weapons. I have to say that, faced with a choice, I would prefer the embargo.

My colleague from Iowa and I have talked about trade embargoes for other countries in the past. An embargo is counterproductive. We shoot ourselves in the foot with an embargo.

We hurt American farmers who want to sell grain and people who want to sell other American products, and we force Nicaragua to go elsewhere, including to the Soviet bloc nations, for their trade instead of coming to us.

So, my own personal vote, if there is a motion to suspend the rule to substitute an embargo for this present resolution, is that I am going to vote against suspending the rule and I am also going to vote against the resolution.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator for bringing this up. I have two observations.

A trade embargo—well, now, let us take a look at that. We did that against Cuba in 1962. We had the areawide economic boycott, which was done in conformance with the law. It was done under the auspices of the Organization of American States, which voted to impose an economic boycott against Cuba. It did not work. Where did Cuba go? It went to the Soviet Union and other Eastern bloc countries to get more and more aid. We just drove them more and more into those countries' grip.

At that time about 52 percent of Cuba's economic trade was done with us. At this time only about 14 percent of Nicaragua's trade is done with us.

So, if it did not work against Cuba when they had 40 percent of the trade with us, how in the world is it going to work when Nicaragua only has 14 percent of their trade with us? That is one observation. A trade embargo will not work.

Second, I have been opposed to trade embargoes from the beginning. I was opposed to the Carter grain embargo, as I know my colleague was. I was opposed to the soybean embargo that President Richard Nixon put on. I was opposed to the embargo on wheat to Egypt by President Ford. I was opposed to President Reagan's embargo on parts going to build the pipeline in Europe.

I have also been opposed to trade embargoes because they are counterproductive. An embargo against Nicaragua would hurt us or other countries in the region, such as Mexico, Costa Rica, Panama, all the other Latin American countries we want to help, as much as it would hurt Nicaragua.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I could not agree with my colleague more. We have a perfect illustration on the pipeline. When the Soviets wanted to build a gas pipeline, President Reagan said no, we are not going to sell them any pipes; we are not going to sell them any earth-moving machinery.

So instead they went to France and Japan and elsewhere, and they completed the pipeline ahead of time.

Whom did we hurt? All we did was hurt American people who wanted jobs, American producers. The only time that an embargo can be effective is if you have a monopoly on the product, and obviously we do not have a monopoly on any of the things we trade with Nicaragua. All it can do is aggravate the situation.

We will not be joined, my guess is, by any of the other states in the region in any such trade embargo.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator for adding that in his colloquy. I welcome his observations because they are very astute and very learned, and my dear friend from Illinois knows full well from which he speaks on the effects of these embargoes.

Let me just propound one other concept, one other idea.

This call for economic sanctions and boycotts is misleading since Nicaragua's trade with us amounts to only 14 percent of all their trade, we really cannot hurt them that much. If it were 80 percent or 90 percent, that would be a different story, or 50 percent, it might be a different story. But 14 percent—there is no way our imposing an economic boycott or trade embargo is going to hurt them.

Here is what it might do: Obviously, the Nicaragua Government's first responsibility is the preservation of its state as any government is, of course, and they are going to continue to operate their state.

Let us say that the Government of the United States is successful in cutting off, let us say, Mexican oil going to Nicaragua. Where then will the Nicaraguans get their oil? They are going to get it somewhere. If they cannot get it from the Soviet Union, I suspect they may go to some place like Iran, and then we will stand up here in the United States and point our finger at Nicaragua and say, "Look, they are close to the Ayatollah Khomeini because they are getting oil from Iran." Yet it will be our act of a trade embargo and economic sanctions that has driven them to that point in time.

No, trade embargoes are counterproductive, whether it hurts the United States or our allies in that region, and I suspect beyond that a misleading nature in an effort to try to get these economic sanctions.

Our concern, as we have stated before, was to strengthen the Contadora process and then by strengthening the Contadora process we bring all of the Latin American nations involved into it and then Nicaragua is not just answerable to us. They are answerable to all of Latin America and not just us.

If Nicaragua, represents a security threat, there are legal and international procedures to go through. For example, we could go to the Organization of American States under the Rio Treaty and implement an area-wide economic boycott as we did against Cuba.

We went to the OAS. They voted and they voted to have an economic boycott against Cuba. If this administration is talking about economic boycott I respond to my colleague from Illinois that it should be done under the auspices of the Rio Treaty and go to the OAS and ask the OAS if they would vote for one. I rather doubt they would.

In addition, if Nicaragua really represents a drastic threat, the OAS could vote military actions.

So there is a proper, legal way for us to go. But what we are trying to do now is to address our legitimate security concerns to support the Contadora process, to get the bilateral talks going between the United States and Nicaragua, to normalize relations, and to cut off any direct aid to the Contras.

In no way will I support any direct aid to the Contras. Humanitarian—they can call it humanitarian or whatever they want to, but I will support no direct aid. If they want to go to the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commission on Refugees for humanitarian aid to refugees, I believe the American people would support that, and I would vote for it; but no direct aid for the Contras, and beyond that I would support a resolution that would insist that the administration return to Manzanillo, take up the bilateral talks once again as a path toward normalizing our relations and leading to friendly relations with Nicaragua, to insist that we follow through with a cease-fire whereby the U.N. High Commission on Refugees would be in charge of relocating and resettling the Contras wherever they might want to go, in Nicaragua or any other land.

This I believe, Mr. President, is the path to peace. It is the path away from the precipice of war on which we find ourselves in Central America.

This vote today is our 1985 Gulf of Tonkin vote. We should turn away from war, and toward the path of peace.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 12 noon having arrived, in accordance with the previous order, the Senate now stands in recess until 2 p.m.

Thereupon, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. KASTEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order.

The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the discussion is still going on with regard to the caucuses on both sides of the aisle. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum and request that the time during which the quorum will run be charged equally to the two sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TUNNEL WITHOUT A LIGHT

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, we are faced today with a vote far more significant than approval or disapproval of what President Reagan has termed "a mere $14 million" in aid to the revolutionary forces in Nicaragua. Our action today will be seen as either a reaffirmation of two centuries of "gunboat diplomacy" or as a signal that the United States is at long last willing to recognize the emergency of Latin America as partners in our hemispheric concerns and to put our efforts behind a political settlement in the war-torn isthmus.

To understand the history of our country's role in Latin America is, to some large measure, to understand the dilemma we face in articulating any Latin American policy today. That history encompasses a series of American doctrines beginning in the 19th century in which we set ourselves up as the domineering and interventionist guardian of the entire hemisphere.

From the Monroe Doctrine, putting Europe on notice that we would allow no further colonization in the hemisphere, through our self-proclaimed "manifest destiny," to Theodore Roosevelt's "big stick," those doctrines translated into more than 60 military interventions in Central America, Mexico, and the Caribbean since the mid-19th century. Ostensibly, our mission was generally to restore stability; in fact, more often than not, our real interest was protecting the economic interests of American business located in Central America, and if that required propping up a reactionary oligarchy, well so be it.

Talk of partnership with Latin America has been around from the time of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. President Kennedy's Alliance for Progress was heralded as a long-needed change in our relations with our southern neighbors.

Most recently, President Reagan's endorsement of the Bipartisan Commission on Central America's report was thought to be a new beginning for inter-American relations. But in each instance, an American-perceived crisis has driven us back to a show of military force; partnership has atrophied.

Why all the fuss about a handful of impoverished little countries? For no less a reason than Latin America, including particularly Central America, is of utmost strategic importance to the United States.

The expansion of Soviet influence, whether by way of Havana or directly from Moscow, is a direct threat to our security. Not only would our attention and our resources be siphoned off to protect our southern borders, our capacity to defend other areas of strategic concern in Europe, the Middle East, and East Asia would be seriously threatened. Some 50 percent of the shipping tonnage that would be required to reinforce the European front and about 40 percent of that required by a major East Asian conflict, would have to pass from the Gulf of Mexico through the Caribbean-Central American zone.

These same shipping lanes also carry nearly half of all other foreign cargo, including oil, shipped to this country. In short, Central America has the capacity to cripple our Nation, both militarily and economically.

Against the backdrop of our military intervention and the lack of much else in the way of policy, the tiny wealthy class and the military, forging an alliance of mutual need, flourished amid endemic poverty. According to World Bank statistics, 3 percent of the farmers in Guatemala control two-thirds of the arable lands, while the majority Indian population has a per capita income of less than $100 per year. In El Salvador, the poorest 20 percent of the population share a mere 2 percent of the wealth. In Honduras, the per capita income is $640 a year and falling. The U.S. Ambassador to Nicaragua, Mr. Bergold, estimates that per capita income in Nicaragua was about $800 at the time of the 1979 revolution, but has fallen to $500 today.

More than half of the 24 million population of Central America cannot read or write. Among children who go to school, less than half complete the sixth grade. The life expectancy of a man in Honduras, the country with the highest per capita income of the region, is 55. It is small wonder only that the seeds of revolution took so long to flourish.

In more recent times, the trend toward democracy in Central America has been, if not dramatic, unmistakable. Costa Rica remains the showcase democracy. The fledgling Honduran democracy is growing stronger. In El Salvador, President Duarte's democracy has gained unexpected strength by the stunning victory of his Christian Democrats in last month's election. In Guatemala, last year's constituent assembly elections marked, and the pledge of a Presidential election in October of this year gives cautious hope that the country is inching toward a democratic form of government.

So what went wrong in Nicaragua? Really nothing. The Sandinistas came to power under the guise of democratic revolution. It was only after they had consolidated their power that they gave up the goals of the revolution, and stole the country from democracy. There can no longer be any question that the Sandinistas are direct descendents of Fidel Castro's brand of communism. Our intelligence estimates 2,500 to 3,500 Cuban military advisers in Nicaragua, and another 4,500 to 5,500 Cuban nonmilitary advisers. Training bases for guerrillas from El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and the Dominican Republic are located in Nicaragua, and Cuban instructors are involved at these bases to an unknown extent. Command and control for all five elements of the leftist Salvadoran guerrilla groups is in Nicaragua. Soviet aid to Nicaragua has provided roughly $250 million in arms in the last year alone.

There is no doubt in my mind that without the kind of external support the Sandinistas are getting from the Soviets and Soviet bloc countries, their repressive regime would be toppled from within.

If we are agreed, and I think we are, that we as a nation cannot tolerate an aggressive and destabilizing force in Central America, what policy options are open to us? In answering this question, we cannot ignore the history which has made us our own worst enemy. Distrust and suspicion as to our motives abound. We no longer dominate the economy of the hemisphere. And although democracy in the region has made progress today, debt and recession could turn back the political clock in rapid order.

As I see it, the central flaw in our current Nicaragua policy—if indeed one can call it a policy—is that we don't seem to have any clear picture of how to get to where we want to be. Originally, President Reagan advocated a policy of containment, setting several conditions on the Sandinistas which had to be met to stop U.S. financing of the rebels. First, they must stop being a surrogate for the Soviet Union and Cuba. Sceond, they must reduce their armed forces to a level comparable to those of their neighbors. Third, they must stop support for the insurgents in nearby countries, and fourth, they must live up to their OAS commitment to democratic pluralism. More recently, President Reagan has all but advocated the military overthrow of the Marxist Sandinista regime.

The fact is we have no policy to achieve either objective; $14 million of military aid to the contras won't win any war. Gen. Paul Gorman, former U.S. Commander of the Southern Region, recently testified before the Armed Services Committee that he saw "[no] immediate prospect that these guys in blue suits in the hills are going to march into Managua. It seems to me that the whole resistance movement has got another year or more of slogging to go before that were ever in prospect, and a lot of violence associated with it."

The administration tells us that to continue support of the Contras is the only way to maintain pressure on the Sandinistas to change, but one cannot help but wonder what change the Sandinistas could make short of signing their own death warrants which will satisfy the administration.

Even if the Contras were the noble "freedom fighters" portrayed by President Reagan, which their heavy Somocista flavor belies, our $14 million would do no more than keep the revolutionary pot boiling and leave the door open for stepped up military intervention at a time when the political climate at home may be more favorable.

If we are serious about our efforts to prevent the consolidation and expansion of a Marxist regime in our own backyard, why are we so ambivalent about the economic pressures we could bring to bear on the Sandinistas? True, we suspended all direct U.S. aid in 1981, but that is about all we have done. Why have we not taken the same kinds of actions against the Sandinistas as we have against Cuba, Libya, and Iran? It is bizarre in the extreme that we maintain our status as the largest trading partner with a country against whom we manage a dirty little war. Why, if we want to overthrow the Sandinistas, has it taken us 4 years to begin to exert economic pressure on Nicaragua through the Inter-American Development Bank?

And what of the Contadora process? The Reagan administration gives it mere lip service. They say all the right and dutiful things with respect to the Contadora effort, but never give it the political and diplomatic push it deserves and needs. Sure there may be some difficulties with implementation and verification of ultimate Contadora treaty guarantees. Nevertheless, the process is worth our maximum effort, not our benign indifference.

What is our policy? The CIA conceived, planned, and initiated a covert war. To President Reagan, it is that or nothing. As he sees it, we sink or swim in Central America with the Contras. Others see the Contadora process as the sine qua non.

I submit that neither the Contra war nor Contadora can be a policy for the United States. As I said earlier, the United States has vital security interests in the region. Contadora as a regional peace effort should be pursued in every possible way. But if it does not succeed, there must be a U.S. policy beyond Contadora. There are legitimate diplomatic, economic, and military pressures which we can bring to bear with our security interests. If Nicaragua were to introduce advanced combat aircraft, such as the Mig-21, which would seriously destabilize Central America, it could not be tolerated. If the Sandinistas were to launch a military attack on any neighboring country, I think there is little question that the United States would respond. Indeed, under the Rio Treaty of 1947, the United States is committed to come to the aid of that country.

In sum, Mr. President, in my judgment, we cannot justify continued support of the Contras. It is a blind alley. It is a tunnel without a light. It will lead to no good. It is an operation that should never have been started; having been started, it should be ended before it leads to even greater dangers and risks.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will withhold, the quorum call is to be equally divided. Is that correct?

Mr. EAGLETON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I want to make a few remarks about the subject that we have been debating because it has very grave constitutional aspects to me that I think this body should pay attention to.

Mr. President, the one main job of the President of the United States is to formulate foreign policy. You almost can say it is his only job. Yet what are we witnessing as we are debating this resolution on the floor? We are witnessing attempts to reach a compromise on the President's decision. All of us will recall that we have the right to advise and consent the President on his formulation of foreign policy. And this applies mostly to treaties. We can say we do not think the treaty is wise or we can say we think the treaty is wise in which case it is adopted. But here is a case of the President of the United States—and I would say this if he were a Democrat or a Republican—having made a decision relative to a country in Central America, namely, Nicaragua. He has asked that we authorize the expenditure of $14 million. It is a lot of money. But in this body, it is something that you probably can find hidden under the carpet some place. We are debating whether we are going to let him have this, and where has the opposition come from? It has come mostly from Members of this body who have traveled to Nicaragua and then undertook on their own against the legislation which prohibits anyone from engaging in foreign policy but the President to negotiate with the President of Nicaragua. They have come back. They have not reported first to the Secretary of State but they made their report before the American people on television, and are even now trying to force the President into making a visit to some community in Mexico to negotiate with the President of Nicaragua, period.

Whether it is right or wrong, I am not here to judge. I am merely reminding my colleagues that we are usurping a provision of the Constitution that provides for the President to make up his own mind on foreign policy, and then we do what we feel is right about it. Negotiating is against the law unless you are a representative of the President. I honestly feel that two Members of our body have violated the code when they undertook to negotiate.

So really what we are debating here today is a very, very fundamental thing. It is not about Nicaragua. It is whether or not this Congress, 535 of us, are going to allow the President to continue in his constitutional role or whether we are going to become 535 experts on foreign policy. When you get down to it, Mr. President, none of us really know a lot about it. And we are elected for 6 years. We are elected in the House for 2 years. So we have no way of adding perpetualness to the decisions that we make.

I just wanted to say those few words, Mr. President, because it has troubled me very, very deeply. I listened to comments on this floor this morning in which the President was insulted, in which he was accused of everything but treason. And you can disagree with the President but you do not have to be that disagreeable about it. I think the time has come when we had better realize in this body that to transgress upon the intentions of the Constitution without the American people giving approval to so transgress or change the Constitution is wrong, wrong, wrong. I hope, Mr. President, that the day will come soon when we can begin to clean up our act. I would like to see the War Powers Resolution withdrawn. It is unconstitutional, and probably the worst thing we ever did for the future of our country was to pass that act. That has given impetus and encouragement to those people who either rightly or wrongly, wittingly or unwittingly have taken it unto themselves to pursue the subject of foreign policy.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I would ask the Senator from Arizona on which side will the time be charged?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not care; any side you want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be assigned equally then by the Chair.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I believe it is in order for me to yield myself such time as I may require from the Republican time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. I do so, Mr. President.

NICARAGUA—THE CHANCE TO DECIDE

Mr. President, today Congress will decide whether the United States wants to support freedom and human rights, or whether one more nation will fall by default to Marxism-Leninism. There is a contrived and totally false myth going around that the Nicaragua regime is a reformist government, which the United States has unfairly penalized. Some even pretend that it is a democracy, offering opportunity to its citizens, and freedom for the development of its people.

But, Mr. President, anybody who believes that I want to see after this debate is over. I have a little bridge over in Brooklyn I want to sell.

The fact is that nothing could be further from the truth. The Government of Nicaragua has, from the start, attempted to manipulate and control its people. It has successively repressed its political opposition, attacked religious freedom, confiscated the property of farmers and businessmen, and imposed strict censorship on all forms of the news media. No one can say that the United States drove the Sandinistas to such measures. On the contrary, Congress voted $150 million in assistance, more than we have given to any other country. I was strongly opposed to this aid, because I believed even then—that was during the Carter administration—that the money would be used to extinguish freedom, and to set up a Soviet-Cuban satellite.

There are always those who apologize for Communist tyranny. They try to deny the events which are taking place under their own eyes. And after the Marxists are in firm control, and the people reduced to slavery, the apologists for Communists simply put the misery they have allowed to happen out of their minds.

There is no such excuse concerning Nicaragua. The reports are overwhelming and well documented. On March 27, our distinguished Ambassador to the Organization of American States, J. William Middendorf II, gave a comprehensive summary of the situation in Nicaragua to the OAS Permanent Council meeting here in Washington. In this speech he described the living conditions in Nicaragua, and the character of the Nicaraguan regime. He cited chapter and verse on the broken promises of the Sandinistas—promises for an independent judiciary and for free elections, made to the OAS itself in 1979.

Mr. President, I commend our distinguished Ambassador for his forthright speech, presented with his usual flair and accuracy. I urge all of my colleagues to read this speech before voting on the aid to the Contras.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Ambassador Middendorf's speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NICARAGUA—THE STOLEN REVOLUTION

The U.S. delegation wishes to note that on July 18, 1984, we last raised the matter of Nicaragua's failure to live up to its solemn promises of July 12, 1979, to the Secretary General of this body. They promised to hold early free elections, to establish an independent judiciary, and to uphold human rights.

It is my delegation's sad duty to report that, since that date, nothing has happened to change the situation.

When Sandinista troops entered Managua on July 19, 1979, they were met by joyous throngs of Nicaraguan citizens who believed that, at long last, freedom and economic well-being were at hand. We all know now that the Sandinista revolution was stolen—stolen by a small, hard-core group of Marxist-Leninists who did not represent majority opinion within the Sandinista movement, but who had long conspired to take the movement over, and who were armed to make it possible to carry out their plan.

Let us look first at the impact almost six years of Sandinismo have had on the ordinary Nicaraguan people. We are not talking now about political figures, or business leaders, but about the Nicaraguan "man-in-the-street." The ordinary Nicaraguan whose only ambition is to make a decent enough living to support his family.

What is happening to this ordinary Nicaraguan today?

His children don't have enough to eat. Robert Leiken, who initially strongly supported the revolution, wrote in the New Republic on October 8, 1984, that children were supposed to be the "spoiled ones" of the revolution. Instead, he noted, on his visit last year, he noticed far more naked children with signs of malnutrition than he had ever seen before in Nicaragua. Most foodstuffs are rationed, with the local committees for the defense of Sandinismo handing out ration cards—or withholding them—for citizens who show "insufficient revolutionary fervor."

His older children, from age 11 on up, face the possibility of being drafted into the Sandinista armed forces. Strong-arm recruiters snatch them off the streets or from their school rooms to fill the ranks of the Sandinista military, which now outnumbers all of the other military forces of Central America combined.

His freedom of speech is sorely limited. The committees for the defense of Sandinismo keep their eye on him. If he complains to a neighbor about something the government has done, he may find himself hauled before a neighborhood court, with no appeal of any sentence that court hands down allowed.

His freedom to be informed about national and international events is restricted. Radio and television news are under government control, and they broadcast only what the Sandinista party wants them to. There is only one opposition newspaper, La Prensa, and it is so heavily censored by government censors that it frequently suspends publication because after the censors are through, there is not enough news left to print. And sometimes the government orders it to suspend publication anyway.

His livelihood is threatened. If he works in the private sector, the gradual elimination of private enterprise by the Sandinista government may leave him without a job. If he is a farmer, under the laws establishing state agencies which are the only entities to which he is allowed to sell his produce, at a non-negotiable price fixed by the government, he may not even hold back seed for next season's planting. He may not receive enough income to make ends meet.

The average Nicaraguan has always been religious. He has usually been a devout Catholic, or in the case of the Miskito Indians, a devout Moravian. Now, he finds his church leaders, including the Pope, harassed by Sandinista youth mobs, the "Turbas Divinas." He finds his priest or pastor accused of being "a counter-revolutionary" when he refuses to praise the Sandinista government in his sermons. He can no longer hear the archbishop's homily on radio or television, because the Sandinistas do not allow it to be broadcast without their prior censorship, something to which the archbishop has understandably refused to submit.

Compare his situation with that of ordinary citizens in neighboring Costa Rica and Honduras, and you will see the contrast. While those countries have problems, they are working democracies where people can say what they please, don't have to worry about their children being drafted, and where farmers can sell their produce in the market themselves or choose among several competing middlemen, who will buy the produce for resale.

Yet, the Sandinista leaders say that countries such as Honduras and Costa Rica must undergo their own revolutions. Interior Minister Tomas Borge, in his interview in Playboy Magazine of September 1983, was asked to respond to the Reagan administration contention that, following its triumph in Nicaragua, the revolution will be exported to El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico. Borge replied, "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that is absolutely true."

On the second anniversary of the Sandinista revolution, Borge gave a speech in Managua, in which he said: "This revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist . . ."

In our special session on February 29, 1984, my esteemed colleague from Nicaragua told this body: "If we had wanted to attack Costa Rica with a specific end in mind, we would have done so, and they wouldn't even have had enough time to ask that a special session be called, because by then they would have been occupied . . ." While supposedly denying an intention of invading Costa Rica, this statement shows how confident the Sandinistas are in their ability to invade their southern neighbor successfully, if they ever feel the desire to do so.

I think it is worth asking, taking into account these statements I have just mentioned, as well as many others, what makes anyone believe that the Sandinista government is willing to live in peace with its neighbors? Just because they have stated their peaceful intentions?

You will recall that promises made to this body on July 12, 1979, have not been kept. How, then, can we assume that promises not to attack their neighbors will be kept by the Sandinistas? When almost daily we observe shots fired by the Sandinistas across the Honduran and Costa Rican borders, and guerrillas trained by the Sandinistas carry on their activities in El Salvador and Guatemala, and Managua has been the command center for guerrilla activities throughout Central America. Can we believe their avowal of peaceful intentions?

Let us review the record again. In 1979 the Sandinista Junta promised the Secretary General that it would respect human rights, set up an independent judiciary, and hold "the first free elections in this country".

As I have already pointed out, human rights have been violated on a massive scale. The mistreatment of the Miskito and other Indian tribes was especially noteworthy. Shortly after the revolution, the Miskito Indians' traditional homelands were flooded with Cuban and Nicaraguan personnel who said they were there to "rescue" them. The attempt was made to force them to give up their traditional way of life and adopt the Marxism-Leninism of the revolution. As Freedom House said at the time, the program "is to deprive them of their socio-cultural identity". Their traditional, freely-elected leaders were replaced with Sandinista-appointed authorities—some of them Cubans.

Massive relocation of the Miskitos, as well as other tribes, as the Sumo and the Rama, were undertaken. In some instances where they resisted, Miskitos were killed. Men, women and children were forced to walk long distances on foot. Their farm animals were often appropriated by the state. Ominously, we hear reports today of a similar involuntary forced relocation of people from a wide area in rural northern Nicaragua, and of Sandinista army personnel putting the torch to the fields left behind. So much for respect for human rights!

In 1979, the Sandinista Junta promised this body that an independent judiciary would be established. Yet justice has become the servant of Sandinista totalitarianism. The neighborhood courts, where people are judged for such "crimes" as failing to attend Sandinista Party rallies, hand down sentences which are not subject to judicial review. The nominally independent Supreme Court of Justice has limited power to review decisions handed down by lower courts. The right of habeas corpus has been practically eliminated.

The recent Urbina Lara case illustrates the lack of respect Sandinista justice has for the traditional Latin American doctrine of asylum. Mr. Urbina Lara, who had taken refuge in the Costa Rican Embassy, was forcibly removed from the embassy building, wounded and imprisoned, by Sandinista authorities at a moment when the Costa Rican diplomats had briefly left the embassy building unoccupied except for Mr. Urbina Lara. Mr. Urbina Lara was allowed to leave Nicaragua only after the incident threatened to disrupt the Contadora peace process. We understand that President Ortega has told high-level visitors to Managua that Urbina Lara left the embassy of his own accord. On his arrival in Colombia however, Mr. Urbina Lara confirmed the details of this breach of the principle of diplomatic asylum. Meanwhile, his defense lawyer was detained for several days in a Managua jail without charges. So much for Sandinista justice!

Finally, in 1979 the Sandinista Junta promised early, free elections. Late last year, "elections" were held. But they were nothing but a sham, as the Sandinista government refused to create the conditions whereby the largest opposition coalition, the Coordinadora Democratica, could have any chance to compete. That group's candidate, Arturo Cruz, who had at one time been the Sandinista government's own Ambassador to Washington, had his rallies disrupted by Sandinista youth mobs—the so-called "Turbas Divinas"—on repeated occasions during the pre-electoral period. His pronouncements were censored from the opposition newspaper "La Prensa", and were not carried by the government print and broadcast media. Indeed, Sandinista censors have assured that criticism of the government is all but absent from the media.

Faced with the situation in which the Sandinista government would not allow Cruz to conduct a full and free campaign, after many attempts to negotiate campaign guarantees, the Coordinadora refused to participate in the election campaign.

Two other parties intended to pull out also. In one case, mobs broke up a meeting of the Partido Conservador Democrata at which a vote to pull out of the elections was about to be taken, with a clear majority in favor. In the other case, Partido Liberal Independiente candidate Virigilio Godoy announced on October 21 that he was withdrawing his candidacy, but the government press continued to run his campaign advertisements, and La Prensa was censored when it attempted to report the withdrawal.

No matter how honest the vote-counting itself, an election is nothing more than a sham if parties who wish to run are not given the chance to mount a full and fair campaign.

I think it would be interesting to see what Sandinista leaders themselves have said about elections.

In May 1984, Comandante Bayardo Arce, one of the nine members of the Sandinista Directorate gave a speech to the Nicaraguan Socialist Party. He did not realize that the speech was being tape-recorded. A text of it appeared in the Barcelona newspaper, La Vanguardia, on July 31, 1984, and I note that the Sandinista government has never denied the authenticity of the text.

Comandante Arce said, ". . . of course, if we did not have the war situation imposed on us by the United States, the electoral problem would be totally out of place in terms of its usefulness . . .".

If we analyze this statement, we are led to believe that if the Freedom Fighters had not waged their valiant fight to force the Sandinistas to live up to their promises, the junta never would have held elections.

Comandante Arce also said ". . . We think the electoral process . . . was and continues being an offensive tool from the standpoint of confronting U.S. policy . . . It is well to be able to call elections and take away from American policy one of its justifications for aggression against Nicaragua . . . bourgeois democracy has an element which we can manage and even derive advantages from for the construction of socialism in Nicaragua . . . we are using an instrument claimed by the bourgeoisie, which disarms the international bourgeoisie, in order to move ahead to matters that are for us strategic . . . we believe that the elections should be used in order to vote for Sandinismo, which is being challenged and stigmatized by imperialism, in order to demonstrate that, in any event, the Nicaraguan people are for that totalitarianism, the Nicaraguan people are for Marxism-Leninism . . . we see the elections as one more weapon of the revolution . . .".

There you have the affirmation, in Comandante Arce's own words, that the elections were held not because of the Sandinistas' love for democracy, but for purely tactical reasons. Is it any wonder, then, that they established conditions under which only the Sandinista Party had any chance of victory? Had they given the Coordinadora Democratica a fair chance to campaign on an equal footing, the Sandinistas would have been in danger of being swept out of office, something they could not risk. Thus, on November 4, 1984, the election which was held had to be the sham that it was. So much for the Sandinista promises to the OAS Secretary General in 1979.

In this connection, Mr. President, I would like to note that Congressman Claude Pepper, who honors us with his presence today, has written my country's President, Ronald Reagan, to call attention to the recommendation of the U.S. Congress, embodied in Public Law 98-215 of December 9, 1983. This recommendation proposes that the President seek the prompt reconvening of the Seventeenth Meeting of Consultation of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs for the purpose of evaluating the compliance of the Sandinista government with respect to the promises to the OAS and also to consider whether that Government is living up to the terms of the OAS Charter.

I would also note that I have received the text of House Congressional Resolution 81 of March 7, 1985, sponsored by 56 members of the U.S. Congress, which calls on the President to grant explicit recognition to the democratic Nicaraguan resistance, and urges the President and all members of the OAS to support the Nicaraguan resistance—the so-called "contras"—in their quest for peace, human rights, free elections and national reconciliation. Yesterday, Sen. Durenberger spoke to the National Press Club about the Nicaraguan situation.

My government's efforts to get the Sandinistas to live up to their promises has often been branded by them as a lonely effort by President Reagan which does not have the support of the American people or their elected representatives in the Congress. I would submit that the existence of these Congressional initiatives by Congressmen from both the Democratic and Republican parties shows the deep concern of the American people about the danger to the peace and security of the hemisphere posed by the actions of the Sandinista dictatorship.

I would also like to take note of the recent document on national dialogue of the Nicaraguan resistance, proclaimed in San Jose, Costa Rica, on March 2, 1985, by the Coordinadora Democratica, which has named as its representatives Arturo Cruz, Alfonso Robelo and Adolfo Calero.

In it, they request that the Sandinista government engage in a National Dialogue, leading to democratization of Nicaragua, a political system which guarantees real separation of power, development and reconstruction, recognition of civilian primacy over the state, full respect for human rights, de-militarization of the society, a foreign policy which emphasizes good relations with neighboring states, an economic system which gives importance to the development of the private sector, institution of a multi-party system which guarantees alternation in power and respect for minorities, freedom to organize labor unions, agrarian reform, municipal autonomy, respect for the culture and traditions of the Atlantic Coast, a general political amnesty, and expulsion from the country of advisors from Cuba and other Communist countries.

In this connection, the Coordinadora is not asking that Daniel Ortega be ousted as president, but only that he live up to the 1979 promises to the OAS.

Mr. President, it is a pity that the Sandinista government did not take advantage of this opportunity to resolve Nicaragua's problems by peaceful means.

Up to now, the Sandinistas have refused calls for dialogue with the opposition. Yet in El Salvador and Colombia, we have recently seen the occurrence of dialogue with the armed opposition, so why should Nicaragua be a special case where dialogue is inadmissible?

We are told constantly by the Sandinistas that the armed resistance in Nicaragua is nothing more than a movement of former Somocistas who are battling to return to power. This lie has been repeated so often that even some of my own country's press seems to have accepted it as true.

I note also that the Contadora group will meet next month in the hopes of establishing a final solution to the Central American problem. It is my hope that this process will finally resolve the crisis not only in Nicaragua but in all of Central America. I would like to say at this point, however, that any agreement is only so many pieces of paper until it is put into practice. Once again, foolproof measures of vertification must be included in any such agreement if it is to be effective. I note the words of Lenin, as quoted by C.L. Sulzberger in the New York Times of June 13, 1956. Lenin said, "We must be ready to employ trickery, deceit, law breaking, withholding and concealing truth". The Sandinista leaders have proclaimed many times that they are Marxist-Leninists. Are they in accord with this statement by Lenin?

Mr. President, my government only asks that the Sandinista government live up to its commitments to the OAS. I would note that no government provided more aid to the Sandinistas during its first 18 months in power than the United States, which gave $118 million in aid. The Sandinista government began its inordinate military buildup immediately upon taking office, when the resistance had not yet formed. Texts used in literacy programs and elementary education from the beginning of the revolution used perjorative terms against my country. Radio Sandino, from the beginning of the revolution, attacked my country in the most vicious terms. On 15 different occasions over a period of four years, President Ortega falsely and irresponsibly accused my government of organizing an imminent invasion of his country, a tactic similar to that used by Castro 20 years ago in Cuba to consolidate power. The record shows that militarism and hostility to the United States were hallmarks of this Cuba-Soviet style revolution from the very beginning.

It is my hope that peace will return to Nicaragua through one or another of the processes that I have mentioned here, but, if no process is successful, I would remind this body of its responsibilities. In the final instance, the Organization of American States has a responsibility to assure peace in Nicaragua, since in 1979, it took the unprecedented step of withdrawing support from a sitting member government in Nicaragua and replacing it with the Sandinista Junta. My government does not intend to allow this Organization to ignore its responsibilities in this regard, and reserves the right at some future date to introduce a resolution leading toward the satisfactory resolution of the Nicaraguan problem, if the processes which I have already detailed do not bear fruit.

Thank you!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois seek recognition?

Mr. SIMON. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. President, sometime earlier, a question was raised about the desirability or legality of two Members of this body meeting with officials in another country, and then transmitting a message to the President of the United States.

I have a letter dated April 16 of this year sent to the Speaker of the House by the Secretary of State, George Shultz.

Let me just read one paragraph from this letter.

Mr. Shultz states:

Mr. Ortega's direct invitation to the Congress to conduct an official inspection of the Nicaraguan military buildup presents obvious difficulties. At the same time, Congressional travel to Nicaragua and Central America has contributed to a better understanding within the Legislative Branch of the complex sources of conflict in the region. I recognize the value of such foreign travel in assisting the Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities in the formulation of U.S. policy. Therefore, I strongly encourage members of Congress, of both parties and regardless of their views on Central America, to visit not only Nicaragua but all the countries of the region.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 16, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Thank you for your letter of February 28 requesting the Administration's views on a letter to you of the same date from Nicaraguan President Ortega.

In addressing a detailed statement of Nicaraguan policy and objectives to the Congress, together with specific proposals for action, Mr. Ortega is obviously attempting to circumvent normal government-to-government channels. Although unorthodox and inappropriate under our constitutional system, such tactics have become routine practice by the Sandinistas in their efforts to obtain diplomatic and public relations advantage and to influence directly the Congress of the United States. I was pleased, therefore, to note in your letter to Mr. Ortega the emphasis on the constitutional responsibility of the President for the conduct of our foreign relations.

In this same vein, I believe the most appropriate procedural response would be a formal diplomatic note from the American Ambassador in Managua, on behalf of the United States Government, to the Government of Nicaragua. This response would note the referral of Ortega's letter by the Congress to the Executive Branch and would attempt to discourage the Nicaraguans from the belief that they can conduct foreign relations with the United States Congress as distinguished from relations with our government.

Mr. Ortega's direct invitation to the Congress to conduct an official inspection of the Nicaraguan military buildup presents obvious difficulties. At the same time, Congressional travel to Nicaragua and Central America has contributed to a better understanding within the Legislative Branch of the complex sources of conflict in the region. I recognize the value of such foreign travel in assisting the Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities in the formulation of U.S. policy. Therefore, I strongly encourage members of Congress, of both parties and regardless of their views on Central America, to visit not only Nicaragua but all the countries of the region. I would urge them to spend as much time there as their schedules will permit, to travel outside the capitals, and to talk with citizens in and out of government and of all political persuasions in order to better understand the difficult issues we must all resolve in forging a bipartisan policy on Central America. The Department of State will be pleased to assist Members of Congress with their travel in any way possible.

With respect to the substantive points raised by Mr. Ortega in his letter to you, I have enclosed an analysis that I hope will be useful. We plan to respond to these points in our note to the Government of Nicaragua referred to above.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish the time of the quorum call to be divided equally between both sides?

Mr. SIMON. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, are we under a time limitation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, we are under a time limitation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

Mr. President, before making my comments on this particular issue which we shall be addressing later in the afternoon and perhaps this evening, I want once again to call to the attention of my associates in the Senate the recent trip of my colleagues, Senator KERRY of Massachusetts and Senator HARKIN of Iowa, to Nicaragua these past days and, I think, the very important efforts they have made to bring due information and intelligence to this particular discussion and debate.

I think their ideas and their work in this area have been enormously valuable. From their conversations with me and I know their contributions in our own caucus, I am sure their discussions on the floor will certainly add substantially to the information on this particular issue. I do think that their ideas and their recommendations are worthy of consideration by our colleagues and certainly, by the American people as we address this very important particular foreign policy issue.

Today the Senate must decide whether to resume military aid to the Contras. The administration originally claimed that the purpose of this funding was to halt the flow of arms to El Salvador. At the beginning, many Senators supported this program with that understanding in mind. It is now clear, however, that the architects of this policy had more ambitious plans. While the administration claimed to be trying to prevent Nicaragua from interfering in the internal affairs of other nations, the administration was plotting to overthrow the government of a nation with whom we have formal diplomatic relations.

As we debate the administration's proposal to provide $14 million in additional military assistance to the Contras, we must remember that being a critic of the Contras is not the same as being a cheerleader for the Sandinistas. This is not a resolution of commendation for the comandantes, nor is the Senate being asked to cast a vote of approbation or approval for Sandinista policies.

If there is any consensus to be found in the Senate today, it is that the Sandinistas have fallen short of their pledge to build an open, tolerant, pluralistic, democratic society in Nicaragua. They have violated the human rights of thousands of Indians inside Nicaragua. They have aligned themselves with the enemies of freedom throughout the world. They have made their country a host to sponsors of international terrorism—the Libyans, the Bulgarians, the PLO. They have established mechanisms of social control and political oppression, and they have supported the guerrillas in El Salvador. We are in agreement that the Sandinistas have taken a dangerous turn toward the totalitarians, and we are in agreement that U.S. policies should work to reverse that course.

But the real question before us today is whether the Reagan administration's policy of military support for the Contras is wise, whether it has any hope for success, and whether it is consistent with our fundamental values.

Six weeks after President Reagan took the oath of office, he endorsed the CIA's plan to organize and to fund paramilitary activities against the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Our policy toward Nicaragua has been hostage to that decision ever since. Mr. Reagan turned first to the secret use of military force as the way to deal with the Sandinistas, and we have had to live with that decision now for over 4 years.

Today let us take a step back from the passions that this policy has generated among the American people and among their Representatives in Congress, and let us examine what this policy has achieved.

We have had 4 years of blood and battle, and what is there to show for it?

Rather than reducing the influence of the Cubans and the Soviets inside Nicaragua, that influence has grown over the past 4 years. There are thousands of Cuban advisers inside Nicaragua, and, according to the President, there are Soviet advisers also to be found among the Nicaraguans. We know too that the Nicaraguans have summoned the assistance of other enemies of freedom in their struggle to resist the attacks of the Contras. In Nicaragua today, there are Bulgarians and Libyans and representatives of the PLO. This is hardly the mark of a successful policy.

Rather than forcing greater democracy inside Nicaragua, the "secret war" has given the Sandinistas a pretext to resort to repression—under the guise of a "state of emergency"—as a means of controlling internal opposition and dissent. Press censorship has continued, and the activities of opposition political groups have been carefully controlled and sharply circumscribed. This is hardly the mark of a successful policy.

Rather than reducing the military threat from Nicaragua to the region, the "secret war" has prompted the Nicaraguan Army to grow in numbers and to improve in skill. The "secret war" has given the Sandinistas an excuse to build their military into a power unprecedented in Nicaraguan history. The Nicaraguan Army is large, it is well equipped, it is well armed, and it has been tested in combat. This is hardly the mark of a successful policy.

Rather than isolating the Sandinistas among the nations of the world, the "secret war" has made them heroes. They now play the role of David to the American Goliath. They are the underdogs, valiant defenders of their homeland against overwhelming odds, and the United States is seen to be a bully. How else can one explain the tumultuous welcome that Daniel Ortega received from the people of Uruguay when he visited that country recently? This is hardly the mark of a successful policy.

Rather than enhancing the reputation of the United States among the nations of the world as a moral leader, the United States is now widely perceived to be an international outlaw that breaks the rules when the rules do not favor us. We may soon join the company of Iran and South Africa as violators of international law in the eyes of the World Court. This is hardly the mark of a successful policy.

After 4 years of failure, let us now concede that the policy is bankrupt. Let us now be candid with ourselves and with our friends that President Reagan's jump to military confrontation with the Sandinistas was unwise, and that it has been unsuccessful.

There are many reasons why this policy should be reversed.

First, the policy is illegal. It is not, as President Reagan has so often stated, "Totally consistent with the OAS and U.N. charters." U.S. military support for the Contras is in blatant violation of international law. Article 2(4) of the Charter of the United Nations prohibits the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, and article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States says that, "No state * * * has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other state." The United States is a party to these agreements and a decent respect for international law requires us to honor them. We have even breached our treaty obligations of the International Court of Justice. Rather than defend his policies in the World Court, last April President Reagan withdrew the United States from the Court's jurisdiction.

Second, while we deplore the policies of the Sandinistas, their abuses do not justify the activities of the Contras. Numerous reports, increasingly well documented, from respected human rights groups, have detailed atrocities committed by the Contras against defenseless men, women, and children. It is now beyond dispute that the Contras have murdered civilians, attacked schools and health facilities, and have tortured and mutilated prisoners. Yet the Reagan administration has apparently chosen to remain in "intentional ignorance" of this violence. The President has the audacity to call the Contras "the moral equal of our Founding Fathers." It dishonors the Founding Fathers to compare the Contra commandantes with George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. The Contras are not "our brothers" and our continued support of the Contra's activities makes any peaceful resolution to the conflict more and more distant.

Third, the U.S. support of the covert war in Nicaragua has been counterproductive. It has helped the Sandinistas to consolidate support among the Nicaraguan people by identifying their revolution with Nicaraguan nationalism. It has inspired a wave of anti-Americanism in that country and throughout the hemisphere.

Fourth, the administration's policy has not worked, and there is no evidence to suggest that it can ever succeed. Even the commander of the U.S. forces in Central America, Gen. Paul Gorman, admits that the Nicaraguan rebels are incapable of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government "in the foreseeable future," and that it will take years before Contra pressure can produce any significant change in the Nicaraguan Government. The only way that this policy can succeed is with U.S. troops, and I don't think that the American people want to be drawn into the quagmire of Central America.

It is time to cast a vote for peace in Central America. But as we do so, let us send a clear message to the Sandinistas.

Do not embrace the enemies of freedom any longer. Do not, in your anger at your North American neighbors, become beguiled by those who would use your country for their own ideological purposes. Send them away.

Do not fear freedom for your people. Let there be freedom of speech and freedom of press and freedom of association and freedom of religion in your land. Let the voices of dissent and disapproval be read, so that the dreams of your revolution for self-expression and self-improvement can become a reality. Let your people speak freely, and let them be heard.

Do not let your people become prisoners of war by locking them into a garrison state or be chaining them into a siege mentality. Let the soldiers come home to be with their families. Let your people turn their attention to the task of building a better country for all the citizens of Nicaragua. Get rid of the weapons of war and return once again to the battle against poverty, disease, and despair among your own people.

And, in response to this vote for peace by the American Congress, do not be arrogant or self-righteous or recriminatory. Now is the time to bring your people together. Now is the time to heal wounds and to mend the fabric of your society which has been so terribly torn. Give your political prisoners their freedom, and let your adversaries return to their homeland without fear of retribution.

And finally, never forget that the United States of America does have legitimate security interests in Central America, and that Americans of all parties and of all parts of the political spectrum are in agreement that the United States will not hesitate to take whatever action is necessary to protect and defend those interests. We will not permit the Soviet Union or Cuba to establish military bases in Central America. We will not look the other way if offensive weapons are imported into the region. And we will oppose the efforts of any country in the region directly or indirectly, to overthrow or destablize other governments.

This has been one of the most painful debates in our recent history. And it never seems to end. The rhetoric has been escalated, and the stakes have been exaggerated. It would be a tragedy for the country and for the Congress for this debate to go on and on and on—as it has nonstop over the past 14 months. There is more important business for this Congress, for this country, for this continent, indeed for this hemisphere. We are neglecting far more serious problems—here at home, and throughout our hemisphere. Let us now, once and for all, pass judgment on this policy. Let us turn our backs on the idea of overthrowing a government, and let us move on to a new approach. Let us finally follow the leadership of our friends and neighbors—the Contadora countries—and let them be our guide on the path toward peace and stability in Central America.

Before closing, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a series of statements by a number of distinguished individuals and organizations about the policy of providing military assistance to the Contras of Nicaragua.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSING MILITARY ASSISTANCE—MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1985

We urge you to vote against release of the $14 million for the contras in Nicaragua. Provision of this aid will serve neither our interests nor our ideals.

A MORAL APPEAL TO CONGRESS TO REJECT THE ADMINISTRATION'S REQUEST FOR RENEWED FUNDING FOR THE CONTRAS

FROM

Bishop John Hurst Adams, African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Dr. James E. Andrews, Stated Clerk, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

Dr. Robert C. Campbell, General Secretary, American Baptist Churches in the U.S.

Dr. Will L. Herzfeld, President, Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches.

Dr. C. J. Malloy, Jr., General Secretary, Progressive National Baptist Convention, Inc.

Dr. Robert W. Neff, General Secretary, Church of the Brethren.

Dr. Eugene Pickett, President, Unitarian Universalist Association of Churches in North America.

Dr. Avery D. Post, President, United Church of Christ.

Vern Preheim, General Secretary, General Conference Mennonite Church.

Dr. Kenneth L. Teegarden, President, Christian Churches (Disciples of Christ).

As leaders and representatives of ten national churches, we appeal to Congress on moral grounds to reject the Administration's request for more funds for the Nicaraguan contras, as it rejected a similar request late last year. It was morally wrong for our government through the CIA to recruit, organize, train, equip and finance the contras in the first place; it would be morally wrong for our government to resume such activity now.

Supporting or seeking support for the contras is but one aspect of U.S. policy that disturbs us. In addition to supporting the contras in their terrorism and economic sabotage the United States has also engaged in military exercises near Nicaraguan borders and naval maneuvers off Nicaraguan shores; mined Nicaraguan harbors; damaged the Nicaraguan economy through reducing the quota for Nicaragua's sale of sugar to the United States; blocked loans for Nicaragua by international financial institutions; insisted, in negotiations, on radical changes in Nicaraguan domestic and foreign policies without offering comparable changes in U.S. policies; broken off bi-lateral talks; effectively blocked the consummation of the Contadora negotiations process; and announced that it will not accept the jurisdiction of the World Court in Nicaraguan's legal charges against the United States. It seems increasingly clear that the Administration will be content with nothing less than the demise of the Sandinista government. Its very existence seems to affront.

We are concerned with all these dimensions of our government's policy toward Nicaragua, and are particularly disturbed by the lack of evidence of good-faith efforts on the part of our government to negotiate its differences with Nicaragua. We believe that a negotiated settlement is both morally imperative and politically feasible. However, in this statement we address only the moral issue of resuming United States funding for the contras.

We believe it would be morally wrong for the Congress to resume supporting the contras for these reasons:

1. To support the contras would be to seek a morally objectionable goal: to impose Washington's will on the people of Nicaragua. "The real issue in Central America," as political scientist William M. LeoGrande has observed, "(is) whether the United States is prepared to live with revolutions on its periphery, or whether it will continue to insist, as in the past, that Washington holds veto power over the right of Central Americans to govern themselves as they see fit." The Administration's position is clear: It is determined to exercise veto power. But this determination to impose Washington's will on Managua is wrong because no nation, no matter how powerful, has the moral right to impose its will by force on another nation except under the most extreme and limited circumstances (eg., Hitler's genocide against the Jews) that are not present here. We do not agree with everything the Nicaraguan government has done. But one does not have to defend every Nicaraguan policy to insist that the United States has no moral right to seek through military means to force Nicaragua to change its policy. We Americans would certainly not grant to any other nation the moral right to impose its will by military force on us. We cannot claim for ourselves a moral right we deny to others.

2. To support the contras would be to use Nicaragua in a morally outrageous way for an ulterior motive: to demonstrate to the Soviets and others that we are tough. All the Administration's talk about U.S. credibility makes it clear that this is its primary motive behind its policy toward Nicaragua. But it is morally outrageous for the United States to provide arms so that some Nicaraguans can kill other Nicaraguans in order to show Russians half way around the world that we North Americans have resolve.

3. To support the contras would be to comply with their morally repugnant means: kidnapping, terrorism, atrocities. Stories in The New York Times, The Washington Post and other papers have made clear that the contras have killed, tortured, raped, mutilated and abducted hundreds of civilians they suspect of sympathizing with the Sandinistas. Here is a report from the May 1984 national newsletter of Witness for Peace, a group of North American Christians and others, now numbering over 1,000 who have traveled to the war zones of Nicaragua to stand with the people of Nicaragua under attack by the contras, to pray for peace, and to present an obstacle to what was, until Congress' decisive action last year, a U.S. government-sponsored war: "Contras kidnap to impress Nicaraguans into the mercenary army. They also kidnap to terrorize villages. A number of Witness for Peace teams have talked with families of kidnapped men, women or children. Some of these loved ones have been found by the families: dead, sometimes burned, sometimes dismembered so that they cannot be given a decent burial. . . . A contra saying is, 'We cannot win, but we can kill.' Again and again Witnesses for Peace have talked, prayed, and mourned with families whose members have been taken away, tortured in unspeakable ways, or shot before their very eyes. A frequent act of the contras is beheading."

4. To support the contras would be to share responsibility for the morally evil consequences of their activity: the killing of thousands of Nicaraguans. The government of Nicaragua announced in November 1984 that since 1981 the contras have assassinated 910 state officials, and that the war has caused a total of eight thousand civilian deaths. Private sources, including the Latin America Studies Association, report similar figures.

5. To support the contras would be to accept the Administration's morally outrageous assumptions: that propinquity in location somehow gives us proprietory rights: that Central America is ours to win or lose; that might makes right. We find these assumptions abhorrent when the Soviet Union acts on them: its location and power does not give it the right to oppress the people of Poland or to invade Afghanistan. But if it is wrong for the Soviets to act on the basis of these assumptions, how can it be right for the United States to act on them? Might does not make right when exercised by either superpower—or anyone else. The prophet Nathan made that clear centuries ago in his encounter with ancient Israel's great King David. Our nation needs to remember the word of the prophet to the king. We need also to remember the One for whom the prophet spoke.

6. Finally, to support the contras would be to violate our nation's own moral integrity. An editorial in Commonweal put it well: "The fundamental question facing the United States in Central America concerns not what the region should be, but what kind of country the United States should be." Because of our love of our nation and its moral integrity we do not want our nation once again to seek to impose its will on Nicaragua in order to impress the Soviets by supporting a mercenary army of terrorists who have already killed or caused the death of thousands of Nicaraguans.

Our churches are in close contact with sister churches in Nicaragua. The constant plea that we hear from these churches is: Stop U.S. assistance for the killings! We cannot in conscience ignore their appeal.

Thus, in solidarity with the people and churches of Nicaragua and in concern for the moral integrity of our own nation, we appeal to Congress:

Do not provide new funding for the Nicaraguan contras. Do not involve our nation further in their morally evil ways. Do not make us as American citizens unwilling accomplices to the death and destruction they sow. Stop the killing and terrorism. For the sake of life, decency, and peace with justice, support the negotiations of the Contradora nations, not the aggression of the Nicaraguan contras.

AMERICAN RHODES SCHOLARS OPPOSE FURTHER AID, TO CONTRA FORCES

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: We, the undersigned American Rhodes Scholars currently studying in Oxford, England, wish to register our strong opposition to any renewal of United States aid—covert or otherwise—to the contra forces fighting the Nicaraguan government.

An objective of the Rhodes Scholarship is to foster peace and understanding among nations. In this spirit, we feel the Administration's current policy toward Nicaragua is dangerous and counter-productive. Of course, we each have our own views of the present Nicaraguan government. But we are of one mind in believing that President Reagan's policies damage the prospects for democracy in Nicaragua. And we are of one voice when we say that the President's policies damage the prospects for peace in Central America.

As United States citizens, we urge you, in the strongest possible terms, to oppose any renewal of aid to the contra forces. We urge you to work toward a more constructive foreign policy in Central America.

We do not speak for all Rhodes Scholars who are citizens of the United States. Nor do we speak for the Rhodes Trust as an institution. We speak as 46 individual Americans who are profoundly concerned that our nation's support for the contra war is harmful to US national interests as well as to the interests of Central Americans.

CALL TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS BY NOBEL LAUREATES ON THE QUESTION OF U.S. COVERT AID FOR USE AGAINST NICARAGUA

We, the undersigned Nobel Laureates, are opposed to any military action, overt or covert, by the United States government against the Republic of Nicaragua. Aggression against Nicaragua constitutes a violation of that country's territorial integrity and national sovereignty, a violation of treaties already approved by the U.S. Congress and sanctioned by international law, as well as a violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

We call upon the Congress to refuse its consent to any request by the Reagan Administration for funds, troops, training or materiel to be used either by the armed forces of the United States directly or by the "contras" or other forces in attacks upon the people and government of Nicaragua; and we call upon the Congress to urge negotiations with Nicaragua in order to improve the relations between the two countries.

We further call upon the Congress to stop the increasing militarization of Central America by the Reagan Administration.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE U.S. CONGRESS

(By Catholic and Protestant Religions in Nicaragua; Managua, Nicaragua; February 11, 1985) [1]

We are priests and pastors and men and women religious, both Catholic and Protestant. Some of us are Nicaraguans; others come from other Latin American countries and from Europe and the United States. We are united in a common bond: we all live and work in the war zones of Nicaragua. We all know well, from close contact, the death, destruction and grief that the war is producing in this country.

We are writing to you because we know that in a way the continuation of this war depends on you. We are asking you to help stop it.

Nicaragua is a small sparsely populated country with a history closely linked to that of the United States during this century. This impoverished country has been occupied on several occasions by U.S. Army troops. Many U.S. visitors know us and we have had the opportunity to share experiences and perhaps a cup of Nicaraguan coffee with them.

With the hope that our message will help you better to understand the meaning of the four-year-old war that drenches this soil with blood and takes the lives of four people a day, on the average, through combat or assassination, we relate what we are seeing here.

We know thousands of Nicaraguan campesinos who with the triumph of the Revolution have begun to live a new life. They own land; they have learned to read and write; they have electricity in their homes for the first time. Many of them have begun to work together in cooperatives, or have made their first visit to a medical doctor. They have come to understand that they are persons with dignity and rights; and they rejoice that their dreams of a better future for their children are coming true.

We also know that due to the country's limitations there are other campesinos who did not receive so many good things, campesinos who were afraid of the changes or did not understand them, campesinos who were relatives of members of the National Guard with which Somoza defended his interests.

President Reagan, since the beginning of his mandate, has sought to obstruct Nicaragua's revolutionary process. Beginning in 1981 the decision was made to covertly finance the training, the military equipment and the organization of the Somoza Guardsmen who had fled to Honduras in 1979. Mercenaries joined them, as did some compesinos like those we just described. Some were kidnapped and carried off to the counterrevolutionary bases in Honduras. Some who joined the counterrevolution did so because of family connections or because of the great confusion that prevailed. This latter case was especially true among the Miskito population of the Caribbean Coast. The Miskitos were little known by most Nicaraguans until these years of revolutionary changes.

The counterrevolutionaries, whom President Reagan calls "Freedom Fighters," have been organized, supplied and backed by the U.S. Government, openly, publicly and continuously, and they have been active in Nicaragua territory since 1983.

We have endured a war which in different forms has been waged since 1981. Its intensity and cruelty steadily increase. Even though there are Nicaraguans on both sides, this is not a civil war. It is a premeditated publicized war where one side is supplied with arms and communication materiel by the United States and makes use of bases in Honduras and Costa Rica.

This war does not have its roots in an internal conflict, although it takes advantage of problems—big and little—such as exist in any society. The errors in the Nicaraguan Revolution should be corrected by Nicaraguans; they do not justify foreign intervention. This is not a war to free a part of the Nicaraguan people, as if a tyrannical totalitarian Government were installed here. The best proof of the participation and pluralism of political options existing here is the electoral campaign which culminated in the elections of November 1984. Observers from around the world were present and reported on the elections.

This war originated in the political will of the Republican Administration of the U.S. which is determined, at any cost, to destroy the Nicaraguan Revolutionary model, a model that is adequate for this country and which has achieved notable successes on the road to development.

The contras bring a scenario that disturbs us. We remember what happened in Chile in 1973 and Guatemala in 1954. Fearful of changes in those countries U.S. Adminstrations helped to overthrow those governments. The alleged liberators, however, brought indiscriminate repression, not democracy.

Because the contras are not gaining any military victories they are terrorizing the civilian population. They focus their aggression on killing people and destroying everything we have painstakingly built to improve this country.

During four years of war, 2,767 civilians have been killed, including 132 children under twelve years of age. During 1984 the "Freedom Fighters" murdered 98 campesino teachers. In the four years we have had to close 359 schools and 41 health posts in areas which are under constant attack. Campesino cooperatives are being destroyed by rockets and mortars. Within hours enterprises have disappeared that cost great effort to build. In these four years the counterrevolutionaries have attacked 97 campesino villages, leaving many people dead and wounded. They have also abducted a number of people. Nearly 150,000 Nicaraguan campesinos have had to leave land and home and relocate elsewhere because of the war; and 6,236 children have been orphaned.

These may seem to be very small numbers, but in proportion to Nicaragua's meager population they are enormous. It is the same as if the U.S. had suffered 232,000 deaths in the Vietnam war instead of 58,000.

We sometimes hear that the Reagan Administration and the U.S. Congress have chosen to maintain pressure on Nicaragua through a low-intensity war, instead of by direct intervention of troops. For us who see all this from the standpoint of Nicaragua, with its limited human and material resources, this is a very high-intensity war. How long will it take Nicaragua to train new technologists, teachers and nurses to replace those who were killed? Who will erase from the memory of these thousands of orphans the grief of the loss of father or mother? How do we construct houses and schools from the rubble. And how do we care for the mutilated victims—those without arms or legs?

Members of the Congress, we write to you as men and women religious. We believe in God and we cannot fail to see this situation through the eyes of our Christian faith. Because of this faith and because we accompany the campesino people of Nicaragua who want peace, we must tell you that this U.S.—financed war is unjust and immoral. This war is a sin. It is not the fault of the Revolution, a Revolution which though still immature is full of possibilities.

The United States is using its force and enormous power, as well as money and propaganda, to impose its will on us and is making people suffer unspeakably, a people which only wants to live in peace and construct a dignified nation.

In the name of the God in whom we believe and of the people with whom we work and for whom we are willing to live and give our lives, we ask you to stop helping, by any means or in any way, the counterrevolutionary groups. Put your laws at the service of justice and treat this nation with respect.

Hear the cry of the people: "We want peace!" Peace here depends on you.

Signed by: 42 priests, religious and pastoral agents working in the war zones; and by 46 in other parts of the country.

DON'T FUND THE "CONTRAS"

(By Adolfo Pérez Esquivel)

It must be clear to everyone that the confrontation between the Reagan Administration and the Sandinista Government has neared a breaking point. Both the Sandinistas and American policy makers seem unwavering in their determination to survive each other. Only Congress can defuse this time bomb.

Soon Congress is to decide whether to support the Administration's war against Nicaragua by voting an expected $14 million Administration request for covert aid to the "contras," or to seek a peaceful solution to the region's problems. Latin Americans hope common sense and a healthy awareness of self-interest will move the lawmakers to end the war against the tiny Central American republic.

The Reagan Administration has done its best to create an atmosphere conducive to deepening the conflict. It has waged an undeclared war through the contras, who, if given sufficient support, hope to topple the Sandinista regime. For Nicaragua, one of the world's poorest nations, this unrelenting aggression has resulted in postponement of economic development.

Material damages, inflicted with United States taxpayers' money, are estimated at more than $400 million. The fighting has killed more than 2,300 people, among them many women, children, students and workers. The Administration's rationale for its policy has been the Nicaraguan Government's alleged totalitarianism, its denial of basic freedoms and the menace it poses to its regional neighbors and, ultimately, to United States security interests.

During several trips to Nicaragua and the United States, I have grown convinced that these arguments are, at best, overstatements designed to justify an essentially unjustifiable policy of aggression. The debate on Capitol Hill will, I hope, reveal the distortion and manipulation of fact by high Administration officials.

Yes, the Sandinistas have made mistakes—but they have also registered remarkable achievements that far outweigh their shortcomings. Certainly, their mistakes do not justify the terrible punishment Washington is meting out. My conversations with Nicaraguan leaders in virtually all sectors of society made it clear that the Sandinistas recognize that a better understanding should be developed with the Roman Catholic Church, the opposition party, the press and the Miskito Indians.

But common sense dictates that we all take into account the dramatic social changes that Managua has implemented. The revolutionary Government has outlawed capital punishment and demonstrated extraordinary restraint in dealing with defeated adversaries, the deposed forces of Anastasio Somoza Debayle.

While the Sandinistas must divert a large portion of their financial and physical resources to defense, they have carried out policies that have resulted in a sharp decline in infant mortality rates and have greatly increased medical care for the population. Their health program caused the World Health Organization to select Nicaragua as one of five model countries for primary health care. These successes are mirrored by advances in education, with marked declines in the national illiteracy rate following one of the most effective literacy campaigns in Latin America. The Administration ignores these accomplishments in its need to escalate the conflict. Through its support for the contras and direct intervention by the Central Intelligence Agency, it has bombed and mined Corinto, the main port, in violation of international law. It has disregarded the International Court of Justice while advocating terrorism against a sovereign state. It unilaterally withdrew from talks with the Sandinistas in Manzanillo, Mexico, and undermined the peace initiative of the Contadora countries—Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela—when it failed to manipulate the initiative toward its own desired ends.

These acts of hostility and terrorism, far from breaking the Sandinistas' spirit, have only galvanized them in their resolve and rallied much of Latin America to their support. Even high Pentagon officials acknowledge that further assistance to the contras will not bring about military defeat of the Sandinistas.

Existing evidence, a feeling for history and common sense should enable Congress to reject the Administration's counterproductive policies.

At this critical moment, it seems the Sandinistas are ready to support a policy of nonintervention in the region by an external power and an end to arms shipments and use of military advisers in Central America.

The Congress should make clear its respect for self-determination of all peoples and reject the Administration's proposal for continued aid to the contras. At the same time, it must implement measures that would make it virtually impossible to circumvent that decision.

The Reagan Administration should resume talks with the Sandinistas, and seriously support the Contadora peace initiative. The choice is clear: the Administration either continues its policy of destruction and death or chooses one of cooperation and life.

A BETTER WAY TO PEACE IN NICARAGUA

(By Sol M. Linowitz)

The president's new peace proposal for Nicaragua may mark a significant turning point in the administration's attitude toward the struggle in that country. In recent weeks, the administration has been indicating that its objective is the capitulation of the Sandinistas. But in his current proposal, the president emphasizes negotiation as the course to be followed in trying to deal with the problems, and implies willingness to support a negotiated solution that might be worked out between the parties. If it does nothing else, the proposal puts emphasis on a negotiated rather than a military solution to the fighting in Nicaragua. To that extent, it is a welcome move.

As to the specifics of the president's new plan, however, the fact is that it really isn't new, and it isn't really his. The plan was previously put forward by the contras and rejected by the Sandinistas several weeks ago. The only truly new part of the plan has to do with the use of the $14 million in aid to be made available by the United States to the contras.

Here the problem is that the proposal would offer much to the contras and little to the Sandinistas. Indeed, the contras can't lose. The Sandinistas are called upon to negotiate based on the offer made by the contras a month ago. If the Sandinistas persist in their refusal to do so, then, under the plan, the United States would be able to resume military aid to the contras. If the Sandinistas do undertake to negotiate but don't reach agreement with the contras within 60 days, then the contras can refuse to prolong the negotiations, and the United States will be free to resume military aid to them.

It is not too difficult to see why the Sandinistas would hesitate to enter into negotiations that promise legitimization of military aid to the contras if, within a designated time, the Sandinistas have not come to agreement with them.

Second, the president is asking Congress to approve indirectly what it has indicated it would not approve directly. It is obvious that while the president's proposal would make $14 million available to the contras for humanitarian purposes, this would free up other contra funds for the acquisition of military equipment and supplies.

It is also worth noting that in El Salvador, the United States has strenuously objected to "power sharing" between the government and the opposition group. But in the current proposal, the plan is for the government of Nicaragua to engage in negotiations with the contras that would seem to call for precisely the kind of "power sharing" previously denounced by the United States.

Is there another way to approach the situation that might have a greater prospect for success and also advance the administration's announced objectives?

The Contadora nations—Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela—have been trying to find a basis for peaceful settlement of the fighting in Nicaragua and elsewhere in Central America. It is regrettable that the United States did not consult with the Contadora group prior to the announcement of the new approach in Nicaragua. It is not too late, however, for the United States now to join with the Contadora group in calling for a dialogue in Nicaragua between the Sandinistas and the contras, under the aegis of Contadora and with the mediation of the Catholic Church.

There would be no preconditions for such a dialogue, and both sides would be given a full opportunity to state their positions in order to advance the prospect for national reconciliation and a fair and free election under international supervision. At the end of a designated period, the United States could reexamine the situation and determine whether humanitarian or other aid to the contras would be appropriate and necessary to the light of the facts as they have evolved.

The difference between this approach and the one set forth in the president's proposal is that the discussions between parties in Nicaragua would take place under the auspices of the Contadora nations, which have won the respect of both sides, and the United States will not hold the threat of military support for the contras over the negotiations. The Sandinistas would know, however, that if they refuse to participate in such a dialogue, they will have strengthened the case for aid to the contras in a way that the administration itself has not been able to do.

APRIL 16, 1985.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: In the coming days, Congress will consider a request from President Reagan to renew funding for a covert aid program against the Government of Nicaragua.

Attempts to destabilize the elected government of Nicaragua and support of the bombings, burning of villages and crops, murder of civilians, mining of harbors and assassination of officials offends American priniciples and is contrary to American desires.

We, the undersigned, are firmly opposed to any renewal of covert aid funding and want you to vote against any request to appropriate funds for the covert aid program against Nicaragua. This would include any request that would make available funds to the Central Intellience Agency, the Department of Defense or any other agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities which would have the effect of supporting directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group or individual.

We want you to oppose any compromise to the current provision prohibiting United States funding of the covert aid program.

We want you to oppose and vote against all efforts to any so-called economic options, humanitarian aid or any open and overt support funds to the "contras", as such aid only serves to support military operations against the government and people of Nicaragua.

Further, we urge an investigation of private sector funds for same activities, as these funds only serve to support military operations against the Government of Nicaragua.

INTER-AMERICAN DIALOGUE URGES POLICY CHANGES TO END NICARAGUAN CRISIS

Members of the Inter-American Dialogue, a private, non-partisan group of prominent leaders from Latin America and the Caribbean, the United States, and Canada, today called on the U.S. government to "renounce plans—overt or covert, direct or indirect—to renew support for the military and paramilitary activities of the Nicaraguan insurgents" (the contras). In a statement released by Dialogue co-chairmen Sol M. Linowitz and Galo Plaza, the group also called on the Nicaraguan government to renounce support for the insurgents in El Salvador. "There will be no peace in Central America as long as the norm of non-intervention is flouted by any country."

Declaring that the tensions between the United States and Nicaragua threaten the Hemisphere's security "more than any situation in 20 years," the Dialogue statement proposed five steps to achieve peace in Nicaragua. It urged the United States to "recognize, as did the Kissinger Commission, that an indigenous revolution in the Americas can be compatible with U.S. national security, and to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of Nicaragua."

The statement on Central America (full statement attached) was issued by members of the Dialogue's newly-formed Executive Committee after an all-day meeting in Washington. Members present were: Sol M. Linowitz, former U.S. Ambassador to the Organization of American States and principal U.S. negotiator of the Panama Canal Treaties; Galo Plaza, former President of Ecuador and Secretary-General of the Organization of American States; Peter Bell, former President of the Inter-American Foundation; Rodrigo Botero, former Finance Minister of Colombia; McGeorge Bundy, former U.S. National Security Advisor; Jose Maria Dagnino Pastore, former Finance Minister of Argentina; Ivan Head, President of the Canadian International Development Research Centre; Daniel Oduber, former President of Costa Rica; and Elliot Richardson, former Secretary of Defense and Attorney General. Other Committee members are Fernando Henrique Cardoso, the Senatae leader of Brazil's governing party, and Ralph Pfeiffer, chairman of IBM World Trade Americas/Far East Corporation.

Chairmen Linowitz and Plaza also announced the Committee's decision to launch a five-year program of activities for the Inter-American Dialogue. The Dialogue will meet again in plenary in November and expects to issue its third report on U.S.-Latin American relations early in 1986. The Dialogue has a membership of approximately 50 persons, drawn equally from North America and Latin America. Participants include former presidents and cabinet secretaries; bankers, industrialists, and labor leaders; scholars, media executives, and foundation heads; and religious, political, and military leaders.

[Statement]

CURRENT U.S. LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

(Executive Committee, Inter-American Dialogue, April 4, 1985)

The crisis of economic growth, debt, and trade remains the most important problem in Latin America today. Recent progress toward restructuring the external debt of several major countries is significant, but it should not obscure the fact that the region's fundamental economic problems are unresolved; indeed, they may be worsening.

The next session of the Inter-American Dialogue will consider proposals to deal with regional economic problems. It will examine the proper role of international financial institutions, of foreign investment, and of national policies—both of the Latin American countries and of the industrial countries, including the United States. The Dialogue will also take up other major issues, including narcotics, immigration and refugees, and arms control. We will continue our strong focus on how to strengthen democracy and help assure the protection of human rights throughout the Hemisphere.

We are compelled today to address the most urgent issue in the Americas: the dangerous tension between Nicaragua and the United States that threatens the region's security more than any situation in 20 years.

Only a few months ago, the diplomatic initiative of the four Contadora nations to fashion a settlement in Central America seemed promising. We welcomed the start of direct U.S.-Nicaraguan talks at Manzanillo, Nicaragua's positive response to the second Contadora draft treaties, and the Nicaraguan commitment to hold national elections in 1984.

Our hopes have dimmed in recent months. The Contadora process has run into serious obstacles. Nicaragua's regime and leading opposition parties could not agree on procedures to make the 1984 elections broadly representative. The United States has suspended the talks at Manzanillo and has stepped up pressures against Nicaragua. Recent public statements suggest that the U.S. government may be seeking capitulation by the Sandinistas. The possibility of a much more intense war in Nicaragua, involving the United States indirectly—and perhaps even directly—is real.

Even if such a war is avoided, the Nicaraguan crisis may poison U.S.-Latin American relations and undermine efforts to resolve other serious hemispheric problems. It has already weakened the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Development Bank, and prompted a challenge to the authority of the World Court. It has polarized the domestic politics of Costa Rica and Honduras. It has distracted attention, especially in the United States, from the fundamental Latin American economic crisis. Most important, in human terms, the fighting in Nicaragua has killed and wounded thousands, displaced tens of thousands from their homes, and set back the country's economy by a decade or more.

It is imperative that the leaders of the United States, Nicaragua, the other Central American countries, Cuba, and the Contadora nations work to forge peaceful solutions to the struggles in Central America.

Last Sunday's election in El Salvador shows the popular support for President Jose Napoleon Duarte's dramatic initiative to open a dialogue with the insurgent left at La Palma. Now President Duarte, strengthened by these elections, should move vigorously toward negotiation. In this effort, he requires the strong support of the United States and the other nations of the Hemisphere. These negotiations must be more than a tactic, for they are the only path to lasting peace in El Salvador.

With regard to Nicaragua, we believe that every effort must be made to achieve peace before a wider war becomes inevitable.

1. We call upon the governments of Nicaragua and the United States to resume their bilateral discussions.

2. We ask the government of Nicaragua to open the way toward national reconciliation by pursuing a dialogue with all significant parties who seek an end to the civil war and by providing the conditions necessary to hold free and fair elections under international supervision.

3. We ask the government of the United States to recognize, as did the Kissinger Commission, that an indigenous revolution in this Hemisphere can be compatible with U.S. national security and with hemispheric security, and to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of Nicaragua. The United States and the other countries of the Hemisphere share a concern to prevent the expansion of a Soviet or Cuban military presence in the Americas.

4. We call upon the Contadora nations, meeting again next week, to persist in the difficult task of negotiation, and to recommit their best efforts toward designing inspection and verification provisions that can be monitored and enforced, taking into proper account the concerns of all parties. We call upon the governments of the United States and Nicaragua to commit themselves, in deed and not just in word, to active support for the Contadora process of mediation and for a negotiated regional settlement.

5. Finally, it is imperative that the governments of Nicaragua and the United States pledge themselves not only to the principle but to the practice of non-intervention. The government of the United States should clearly renounce plans—overt or covert, direct or indirect—to renew support for the military and paramilitary activities of the Nicaraguan insurgents. The Nicaraguan government should clearly renounce all support for the military and paramilitary activities of the insurgents in El Salvador and elsewhere. There will be no peace in Central America so long as the hemisphere norm of non-intervention is flouted by any country.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, a minor miracle happened over the weekend and continued through yesterday in the form of a unified Democratic approach to the problem of Nicaragua, to the problem of aid to the Contras. I say it is a minor miracle because on the most contentious, the most divisive issue perhaps in America today, with the possible exception of the budget—and I doubt if even that surpasses Nicaragua as an area of contention—Democrats from left to right, supporters of the Contras, opponents of the Contras, got together on one joint compromise which yesterday was submitted to the President and to the administration.

Mr. President, the way this came about was that the leader of the Democrats, Mr. BYRD, called together a negotiating session at which I believe some 20 Democrats appeared. We went through in great detail and with great debate all of the elements about the war in Nicaragua, about the merits or demerits of the Contras, about America's obligations, about all of those diverse factors that have been discussed here today.

Mr. President, I think it is safe to say that, diverse as the feeling was, there was a general feeling among Democrats—and I would guess among virtually all U.S. Senators—that this situation is not marked by tones of black and white but is a very difficult situation involving great stakes for the United States, in which we should, if we can, speak with a unified voice. I think it will not speak well for the U.S. Senate today if we speak by 52 to 48 or that order of magnitude, as I fear we will speak. I think it does not bode well for American policy when there can be neither consistency nor a broad base of support for that policy.

It was in that spirit that we Democrats sought to put together something that we could all support.

I have made no secret of the fact that I strongly believe—I will mention a little more about that later—that we should not abandon the Contras, that our interests are such that we should continue to support them. Nevertheless, it was in the spirit of compromise that we put together a proposal submitted to the President yesterday that involved some 8 hours of negotiation.

The elements of that compromise were very simple, very direct, and, in my judgment, they were a proposition that the administration could not refuse. Yet, the administration did refuse it; at least, it was not accepted as first proffered. I believe that was a serious mistake.

I do not mean to say that the administration or any group or party must accept without change or without discussion the first offer in any compromise proposal. But I do mean to say that our proposal, coming as it was from such a diverse group, and, in my judgment, affirmatively and efficiently dealing with all the matters of concern to the administration, simply should have been accepted.

Mr. President, what we proposed was that humanitarian aid—defined as food, clothing, medicine, and other forms of humanitarian aid—could be delivered to the Contras in an amount up to $14 million a year, provided that it could be monitored independently as to the nature and amount of that aid.

There were two important stipulations that would trigger the ability to lift what we call the fence or the President's prohibition on that aid.

The first stipulation was that both parties agree to a cease-fire. Those of our group who were strongly opposed to aid to the Contras in any form felt, I believe, that the cease-fire made up for or compensated for or was worthy of compromise for the fact that we were sending humanitarian aid. So that while we were clearly giving aid, we were also clearly giving it under a condition of cease-fire.

A further corollary was this: Should the Sandinistas refuse the cease-fire, then the Contras would not be bound by a cease-fire, and the fence would be lifted. Contrariwise, should the contras not agree to the cease-fire, the fence or the prohibition would have been in place.

A further stipulation was this: Should either side violate the cease-fire, then, in the case of the Contras, the prohibition would be reimposed; in the case of the Sandinistas, the obligation on the part of the Contras to obey a cease-fire would be lifted.

The second condition was that the United States and Nicaragua return to bilateral talks. Mr. President, it was this administration which went to Manzanillo initially in talks. To be sure, they were not satisfied with the progress of those talks. Nevertheless, a return to talks in the midst of a cease-fire might just have given the chance, the new shaft of light, the new attitude that would set the scene for getting this very diverse and very difficult conflict off dead center. Indeed, it seems to be on dead center at the present time, in terms of resolution of that conflict.

So essentially, what we had was $14 million of humanitarian aid to the Contras, provided it could be monitored independently as to nature and amount, but conditioned upon a cease-fire and conditioned upon talks.

There were other matters in our compromise, and the minority leader will put the entire text into the RECORD.

One of the important conditions was that it not be delivered through the CIA or through another intelligence agency. There were a whole host of other agencies through which it could be delivered. Some of our group thought it should be the United Nations; others, the Red Cross. But the proposition submitted to the administration provided for any agency other than the CIA or another intelligence agency.

In effect, Mr. President, the proposals we put on the administration were not onerous, were not designed to prevent the aid from being delivered, but, rather, were designed to prevent the black eye that has been given to the CIA owing to the mining of the harbors and, in turn, the involvement of the United States, which has been greatly criticized, through the CIA. We sought to avoid that by providing for any agency other than the CIA.

Mr. President, we also provided for assistance to the Contadora countries, and we also provided that we should support and encourage the Contadora process; because we believe that through the Contadora countries—the Hispanic brothers, so to speak, of those in Central America—there is an excellent chance of some breakthough in terms of negotiation, and that that should be encouraged.

We further provided for a fast track consideration by Congress, should the President wish to submit economic sanctions or further requests for aid. There were triggers on the question of economic sanctions to the effect that the President could seek the fast track if the Contras were not negotiating in good faith. In the case of further aid to the Contras, there was a trigger that either the Sandinistas violated the cease-fire or that they failed to come to bilateral talks. In effect, those provisions sought to maximize the pressure upon the Sandinistas.

Mr. President, as I say, it was a minor miracle that this could have been put together. I see some of my other colleagues on the floor for whom I have great respect and whose participation in this compromise was very, very affirmative. Those who were in our group, Mr. President, as has been I think previously stated on this floor but if it has not were, of course, our minority leader, Senator DODD, Senator KERRY, Senator BOREN, Senator INOUYE, and Senator LEAHY, representing I think a rather broad and diverse spectrum of philosophical views on this question and different approaches.

It is, I think, a shame, Mr. President, as I have said before, that was turned down. It was put together in the fading moments, as it were, of this matter since it is brought up under a time constraint under a necessity for a vote today, and it is remarkable, as I say, that it was brought up and considered at that time.

I do not say it is impossible to put together a compromise. Clearly our lines are open. Clearly those of us on this side are more than willing to consider anything. But in the practical real world, Mr. President, I think the possibility of hammering together a compromise, considering the diversity of the groups, considering the difficulty of the meaning of fashioning the precise words and the precise concept on all of these things like the proper agency of delivery, the definition of the kind of goods that can be delivered, where they can be delivered, the conditions under which you are able to trigger that delivery, all of those things are vastly complicated concepts which simply take time to put together.

Having said that, Mr. President, and expressed my regret that it cannot be put together, I will very reluctantly and with reservation vote for the President's proposal.

I understand and indeed I have seen a first draft of a letter from the President to the minority leader in which he will track at least a number of the proposals in the Democratic proposal. In that sense I feel that our efforts have clearly been affirmative and constructive. More than that, Mr. President, it has shown that this party is not seeking to be obstructionist, is not seeking to say that this matter in Nicaragua is something about which we are not willing to join together at the water's edge with a united policy. Democrats are. We have shown that, and as the leader puts into the RECORD the written evidence of our proposal, I think it is for all the world to see that we were willing to join in a joint unified compromise where all the country could have come together.

Mr. President, there was on public television last Sunday a show—I say it was on public television, I do not guess it was—I forget what station it was on, Mr. President. But in any event, it was an hour long program recounting the history of the Cuban revolution, and it brought to mind to me a lot of things that I have known that I had forgotten and it brought to light those things in vivid Technicolor and in all the excitement of the events. It showed Fidel Castro back when he was in college before he had a beard when he was a little round-faced, cherubic-looking individual. It showed him up in the mountains and it detailed about the New York Times reporter who went up there. I remember as a young lieutenant in the Army reading those stories with such avid interest, describing this agrarian reformer, as he was called, who sought to restore justice, democracy, economic equity to the country of Cuba, who was going to stamp out the excesses of that terrible dictator, and I say that advisedly, Batista, and I remember the excitement that I felt at the time, and the program detailed that excitement and then it went through the establishment of the revolution and each step along the way since, and it brought to mind that there was indeed a time when the United States could have done something about that.

We tried, of course, at the Bay of Pigs in the most bungled, mishandled, fiasco that I guess this country maybe has ever been involved in with the possible exception of the Vietnam war. The Vietnam war was greater tragedy and certainly with greater loss of life. But in terms of a bungled, misconceived adventure that was probably the worst.

Nevertheless, I think, Mr. President, there were things that we could have done at one time, perhaps even peacefully through negotiations, but we missed our chance.

I was intrigued, Mr. President, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] stated that the United States will not permit Soviet bases in Nicaragua because I think, Mr. President, and that program brought to mind there comes a point when there is not much we can do about it or at least that we are willing to do about it. We know at the present time there is a Soviet brigade in Cuba. We know that there is a huge Soviet presence there. We know that there is about $7 billion in aid per year. And whether it is a Soviet base or not there are bases with Soviet-trained pilots and Soviet airplanes and a whole host of Soviet weapons and there are Soviet client states that export tens of thousands of troops from this hemisphere to Africa, to all over the world. Wherever the Soviets want their bidding done, they will dispatch a few tens of thousands of troops.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the time is now, our only chance, whatever that is, to avoid another Cuba in Nicaragua.

The efforts that we put together in our compromise were calculated to be that proper effort. Those having failed, I personally am not willing to abandon the Contras, to walk away and say that they are not appropriate objects of our beneficence and that we must abandon them and count on the good faith of the Sandinistas.

It seems to me that that good faith has been amply demonstrated in its absence.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I will vote for this resolution with misgivings, with reservations, with regret that we could not have put together a proper compromise.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require. I beg the indulgence of Senators who have been waiting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] and other Senators.

Mr. President, on last Thursday I met with a group of Senators in my office, Democrats from all parts of the ideological spectrum, and we discussed the possibility of developing a package which might be used as a compromise so that all Senators, Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives, middle of the roaders, those who would be against the $14 million as well as those for unfencing the $14 million, could possibly come to an accommodation that would allow us to present a unified front here in the Senate, and, at the encouragement and request of those Senators, I called Mr. Reagan and offered on the part of Senate Democrats to meet with Republican Senators and the President if the President would be present or would have someone to speak for him and explore this possibility.

I suggested that there be a half dozen Senate Democrats, that the distinguished majority leader probably would want an equal number of Republican Senators, and that we could meet and at any time the President might wish.

The President's reaction was positive and he indicated that he would get back to me before the day was over.

Later that day, the White House informed me that the President would like to pursue this matter and that a time would be proposed by the White House, I believe, on the next day. On Friday, the same group of Senators met with me, and it was indicated at that point that the time for such White House meeting would be at 5 p.m. on Sunday. It was agreed among us Democrats meeting in my office, that we would meet in my office at 3 p.m. on Sunday so as to further prepare a packaged proposal to present at the meeting at the White House.

Then on Saturday, I received a telephone call from the White House indicating that it would be necessary to postpone the scheduled 5 o'clock Sunday meeting at the White House until sometime on Monday.

In any event, I called my Democratic colleagues and told them about the change in schedule insofar as the White House meeting was concerned, but suggested that we Democrats proceed, nevertheless, to meet as we had planned at 3 o'clock in my office on Sunday afternoon. There was excellent attendance of those Democratic Senators in my office at 3 o'clock on Sunday afternoon. Mr. DODD, who was in Connecticut, was at the airport and was ready to come to Washington. But he indicated that he, of necessity, would have to go back to Connecticut for the evening, because of the death of a friend. And I told Mr. DODD that I very much wanted him to come on to Washington, in any event. He did so, and I compliment him on his high sense of duty.

So we met, and, I think, developed a very good compromise proposal. Mr. INOUYE, who is chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance, was present at the meetings, as were Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BOREN, Mr. DODD, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. KERRY, and myself.

There were other Senators who were also present. But in view of the fact that the number had to be cut to 6, whereas there were at least 12 or 13 who had indicated that they very much wanted to go to the White House, that number was accordingly reduced.

During our discussions, Mr. JOHNSTON, I thought, made the finest presentation for a comprehensive package that anyone had made or that could be made within the strictures that faced us. Time was short, votes were coming on Capitol Hill today, and the meeting at the White House was being put off until the next day, and so on. But Senator JOHNSTON made this proposal. And he and several other Senators, Mr. KERRY, Mr. HARKIN, and others, sat well into the late afternoon and early evening attempting to hammer out an agreement. I thought it was a remarkable thing. I think he has expressed his feeling that it was a near miracle. And I believe in miracles. But in any event, Mr. JOHNSTON showed remarkable talent and innovativeness.

We had a good cross-section of Senators, as I have already indicated, who came together. Everybody gave up a little something. This was a true compromise. A compromise occurs when each of various participants, in an effort to reach a concensus on a controversial matter, gives up something. So the package was not to the entire liking of anybody. So it was commendable that Senators from the left, the right, and in the middle would come to an agreement on this complex, difficult, and controversial matter.

On Thursday evening, Mr. DOLE informed me that he would have six Senators from his side and he was very pleased at the opportunity to, hopefully, work out a compromise. At all times, I have to say, Mr. DOLE has been extremely considerate, understanding, and cooperative and he, like I, was optimistic that we might be able to work out an accommodation.

At the White House the President first sat in on the meeting. Obviously, he could not sit there for 7½ hours. The Vice President was there. Mr. DOLE and his Republican colleagues were there an hour before we Democrats arrived. The discussions were excellent. Everyone sought hard to find a middle ground.

I provided Mr. DOLE with a copy of the Democratic compromise only at 8:15 yesterday morning. Senator DOLE did not have a lot of time in which to study it. But he was able to provide it to the White House so that the President and his people would be in a position to react to it.

During the course of the afternoon it seemed to all of us, I think, that there probably was some movement toward each other's position in several respects. Finally, however, it became pretty clear that we would not be able to wrap up an agreement that day. So we on our side presented Mr. McFarlane, who seemed to be heading up the White House group, and Mr. DOLE and the other Republican Senators with a second proposal. They also presented us with a second proposal and we discussed the proposals for half an hour or a little more before we recessed for the day. Where did that leave us?

It left us each with the other's proposal. This morning, Mr. DOLE and I said to each other, "The lines are open, our minds are open, we are still available if there is any opportunity that we can get together and make progress."

So, a compromise is an agreement or an accommodation of viewpoints by persons with disparate positions, different opinions. Each gives up a little something in the interest of the whole. Mr. CRANSTON was one of the Senators who in the very beginning, I think, should be credited with the idea that we should sit down and talk about compromise with the White House in an effort to reach an accommodation. So each Senator gave up something. That is compromise.

As I see it, the White House did not make any compromise. We are going to vote at some point a little later today on the resolution that has been introduced as the President's package, which was required under the law.

The White House took our proposals and argued very persuasively that we ought to do this or that in connection with this or that proposal.

I could not see the White House's positions as being any compromise at all. There were a lot of "whereases," and there was a sense-of-the-Congress provision. In the first instance, the obligatory and operative part of the White House proposal occupied only a little over half of a page, in a four-page memorandum.

Let me close by saying that we Democrats offered a comprehensible compromise. I have no doubt that those who participated in the discussions on all sides did so in good faith. But we simply were not able to bring the White House people to the point where they would say, "OK, we will take this, that. And how about changing this a wee bit? We are giving up something. You have given up something. We will have a compromise." That did not happen. It could still happen. My mind is always open. As former majority leader, I suppose I know as much as anybody, more than many people, as to how tenacious one has to be, how patient one has to be, and how willing one has to be to give a little here and a little there in order to get a consensus. So I am still available. I will be glad to go anywhere, wade any ocean, climb any mountain, and go as far as anyone else, even now to hammer out a workable, feasible package. Of course, the hours are swiftly passing and it may not be possible.

I compliment all who participated in this effort, and especially do I want to compliment the Republican leader who sat at the White House all day long trying in good faith with his Republican colleagues to reach an agreement.

Especially do I want to compliment those on my side who demonstrated a willingness to go the extra mile, and compromise their views a little here or there in order to reach a package that would be in the best interest of our country.

I do not think anything further needs to be said on that part.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the elements of the joint resolution proposed by Democratic Senators be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Democrats' Last Proposal at White House Meeting]

ELEMENTS OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Following a preamble, the Joint Resolution will contain the following elements:

HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE

1. During Fiscal Year 1985, the President may make available on a pro-rata monthly basis up to $14 million for the provision of food, clothing, medical, and other humanitarian assistance, and the costs of delivery thereof, to the contras in a manner such that the nature and extent of such assistance is capable of being independently monitored, provided that:

a. Bilateral conversations between Nicaragua and the United States are resumed. In such conversations the relations between the two countries would be discussed so as to normalize bilateral relations and in this way contribute effectively to the Contadora process; and

b. The contras and the Nicaraguan government each agree to institute a mutual, monitored cease-fire.

2. If the Nicaraguan government is unwilling to enter into such a mutual cease-fire, the humanitarian assistance described above may still be provided.

3. If the contras seriously or substantially violate the mutual cease-fire, all humanitarian assistance shall be terminated.

4. If the Nicaraguan government seriously or substantially violates the mutual cease-fire, the contras are relieved of their obligation to continue it.

5. The delivery agency may be a United States Government agency but not the CIA or an intelligence agency.

6. No United States Government funds may be paid directly or indirectly to the Contras, and no United States Government funds may be used to assist the Contras, except as provided in this resolution.

ASSISTANCE TO CONTRADORA COUNTRIES

1. The United States should encourage and support the Contadora process.

2. The President may make available from the $14 million, or from any other funds previously appropriated, such sums as are necessary and appropriate for expenses arising from implementation of an agreement based on the Contradora Document of objectives of September 9, 1983, including peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

ECONOMIC SANCTIONS

1. Discussions are encouraged by the United States and its allies concerning possible economic sanctions which may be taken with respect to the Nicaraguan government, provided in paragraph 2 below.

2. In the event the Nicaraguan government is not negotiating in good faith in bilateral negotiations, the President may request the Congress to authorize economic sanctions. Such a request must be accompanied by a report on the status of the negotiations. The report shall also contain the President's certification that the Nicaraguan government is not negotiating in good faith and a description of the facts and circumstances upon which that conclusion is based.

3. A request submitted to the Congress under paragraph 2 will be handled by the Congress under expedited procedures.

OTHER SANCTIONS

1. The President may submit a request to the Congress for authorization for additional aid to the Contras, in such amount and of such a nature as he deems appropriate, and for autorization for any other measures he deems appropriate, including economic sanctions with respect to the Nicaraguan government, if:

a. Notwithstanding the resumption of bilateral talks, the Nicaraguan government refuses to participate; or

b. Notwithstanding the resumption of bilateral talks, the Nicaraguan government refuses to enter into a mutual cease-fire.

2. Such a request will be handled by the Congress under expedited procedures.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. President, first, something has been said about the letter that has been sent to the distinguished majority leader. May I say, I have no reason to believe I should have a copy. I have no reason to think that the White House should send me a letter. But, for the record, I have not seen any letter.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will yield—

Mr. BYRD. I was asked to yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield to me briefly at this time?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I referred to a draft of a letter which was described to me as not being a final letter but which would eventually be put into the RECORD here on behalf of the President. I speak not for him but simply as one who has seen a first draft and was told by the Secretary of State that that letter would be forthcoming.

I know the first draft of the letter did track a number of the elements of our compromise, though not completely, and certainly not in the way we would have accepted it, had that been the only compromise. But since that was shown to me, I thought I ought to share that with my colleagues here in the Senate. I understand that will be later in the afternoon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I apologize to the distinguished Senator if I inferred from his statement wrongly in what I just said. Perhaps there is no such letter.

Now I yield to my friend from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank our leader.

First of all, Mr. President, I want to applaud the minority leader for the effort he has given on behalf of this issue in bringing the Democrats together and working with the Republicans. I thank him also for noting that I was perhaps the first instigator of this effort that led to a claim by the Democrats that we were eager for a bipartisan approach to this problem, eager not to just say no to the President of the United States on paramilitary or military operations in Nicaragua, but that we had positive alternatives that we believed could lead to a peaceful solution or greatly heighten the prospects of a peaceful solution to the problems in Nicaragua.

I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, is it his plan, not before the vote that is now arranged on the military money, to offer that as an alternative that we can act upon later, sooner or later, after the vote tonight on the President's request?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I doubt that I will offer it. We have made the compromise offer. I do not consider that the White House has made any compromise. Our Senators gave up, as I said, a good bit. We made the compromise offer and it is still there. I am still here. We all are still here. I have heard nothing further from the White House today. As I say, Mr. DOLE and I have talked but I have heard nothing further. The compromise is still at the White House and I am willing to talk about it. But time is running.

Mr. CRANSTON. I was not really asking about a compromise to be brought to fruition before the vote which is now scheduled to occur on a measure that calls for the approval of using money for military or paramilitary purposes in Nicaragua. It seems to me, however, that it might be useful for us to provide some leadership after we have rejected that course in terms of offering for active consideration a plan that we believe more likely to lead to a peaceful resolution of the situation in Nicaragua.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished assistant Democratic leader has made an excellent point. I shall, accordingly, at some point before we go home today, offer these elements as a joint resolution to be referred to the appropriate committee and if, indeed, the resolution which we shall vote on is rejected here or in the other body, my resolution will be in the Foreign Relations Committee, of which the distinguished senior Senator from California is a member. I hope that it will provide the subject piece for further discussions there and possible action.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator. I think that is a very positive step to take, and I shall assure my leader that I shall do everything I can to see that the Foreign Relations Committee takes that up at an early time, considers its text, considers amendments that people may feel are appropriate, reports it out, and then brings it back to the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank my friend. Let me close with one sentence. That is to say that it is with extremely great pride that I have viewed the efforts on the part of Senators, all of whom participated in our discussions, who came from opposite viewpoints and so on, who were so willing to give up something in order to come out with a package that would be beneficial, hopefully, in resolving the questions that we all have as to the regions to the south of the United States.

I say one other thing. Particularly, was I impressed by Mr. HARKIN and by Mr. KERRY. They have just recently returned from Nicaragua and I said to the two of them, "Only one of you can go to the White House. You decide."

They gave me a coin to flip. I flipped it, and Mr. KERRY won the toss.

I thought that was a tremendous display of cooperation and understanding and, again, willingness to sacrifice for the goal that we all sought.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator from California. I beg the indulgence of the great senior Senator from Montana, who is my friend, for his patience and understanding. I am sorry that I have imposed upon him.

I yield to him such time as he may need.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time remains, may I inquire?

Mr. BYRD. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority has 2 hours and 55 minutes remaining. The minority has 1 hour and 41 minutes remaining.

The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

MEAT FROM MANAGUA

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, there is something pretty smelly in either Managua or Washington or both. What in the blazes can be going on with United States-Nicaraguan relationships?

On the one hand, here in Washington, we are debating $14 million worth of support for Contra mercenaries fighting to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, and on the other hand we are importing Nicaraguan beef tendered for sale by their Government in Managua. It is an outrageous inconsistency to promote a policy to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government while paying out in dollars the money Managua needs to continue to function. To add insult to injury, the amount is twice as much as last year and we do not need the meat. In this country, per capita consumption of red meat exceeds 100 pounds per year, contrasted with Nicaraguan peasants who average as many pounds of beef per year as you can count on one hand. This utter lack of consistency, which economically figures into another addition to the pitiful U.S. red ink in balance of trade, also figures into a pitiful foreign policy pattern of rewarding a foreign government whose actions we decry as a thorn to peaceful resolutions for peace in Central America. Both economically and diplomatically, it is a pattern of plain dumbness.

Is this the U.S. image this Government wants to project? It is not fitting in the John Wayne image; it is more fitting to a Peter Sellers spoof. Hollywood central casting could not do worse than our Government's actions: On the right hand "we'll plow them under" with the Contras; on the left hand "we'll do business as usual" with Managua.

I went to Miami yesterday to see for myself the tons of beef from Nicaragua routinely imported into the U.S. food chain; 60-pound boxes of frozen boned-out beef stacked high in a Miami warehouse awaited U.S. Government health and sanitation inspection. The cardboard boxes were attractively designed to advertise Nicaragua.

No further proof need be offered to bear witness to the adage that everything is fair in love and war. Nicaragua cannot be said to be fair to its protein-starved people when it exports meat to the United States. If the aim of the U.S. Government is to force the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government by assisting the Contra guerrillas' war, it cannot be fair to those Contras in this war when it assists Managua with Yankee dollars for the Nicaraguan beef that Americans do not need and do not know they are eating.

Some Americans respond to the impassioned, if not inspired, rhetoric of President Reagan's description of the Contra guerrilla skirmishes by voluntarily donating to the mercenaries. The President asks for 14 million tax dollars to meet their payroll, even as U.S. Department of Agriculture meat inspectors routinely check the frozen Nicaraguan beef in Miami cold storage warehouses prior to its distribution to fast food establishments or supermarkets for a broader but unlabeled American cooperation with the people of Nicaragua.

Yesterday, in Miami, I witnessed this strange arrangement:

While the White House seeks overthrow of Managua here, at the highest levels of government, the U.S. Department of Agriculture provides official clearance of Nicaragua's highest-priced meat so it can be stamped U.S. inspected, OK'ing its distribution nationwide.

Nicaraguan officials argue that they are a people's government, but since their people only get 6 pounds or less of beef per year, it is gross to export half of their total production of beef to the United States, where we each average eating 100 pounds per year.

If, under these circumstances, moral logic is weighed, the weight of the premise that a country whose people have so little protein should eat their own limited amounts of beef would prevail as the Nicaraguan Government's policy. But instead the logic of the dollar dominates. I might add it dominates both sides.

If it were circumstances where the good of the U.S. economy were dominating our Government's decisions, the logic would prevail to limit imports of beef while our farmers and ranchers who produce for us are suffering staggering losses, causing bankruptcy or liquidation for 10 to 15 percent of them.

If there were a mood of military logic to guide United States-Nicaraguan policy, then, surely, economic consideration to limit the foes' effectiveness would come into the deliberations.

But this policy of President Reagan's administration has neither logic nor substance. Nor have I faith that there is a reasoned sensible position in Managua, for I still ponder the collective wisdom of a government that deliberately insults the Pope on a peace mission and translates a people's fight for freedom of Samoza tyranny into a mandate for Marxist bungling of a poor economy becoming more destitute. The peasants surely thought winning the revolution progress toward the promised "new day" would put a little meat on the table—beef by preference. They can only be surprised, when they shout "Where's the beef?", that the answer is "Gone north to Miami to feed the Yankee gringos." Yankee imperialistic ties with Samoza was part of the reason Nicaraguan peasants joined the Sandinistas' revolution.

Tiny Nicaragua and its 3 million people have importance in this hemisphere and in the world, but let us not exaggerate that position. Our actions need not be ridiculous.

Before continuing with further foolish action, I choose first to argue on the moral side—that no good can be accomplished by killing Sandinistas through the paid attacks of the Contras just as little good can be accomplished by importing into the United States one-half of Nicaragua's beef production.

I would argue that the economic situation in the United States requires limiting imports and that the beef producers here are most desperate for a reversal of their losses.

I would also argue that the military logic that helping Managua with dollars defies all common sanity when we are urged to push dollars into Contra killing. I argue that historic basic military logic deems economic pressure as an ally in arms against the enemy.

If they are a meaningful enemy, I suggest multilateral discussions to be broadened with the close neighbors of Nicaragua to bring about, if not a certainty, at least a tone of progress to stability in Central America. No, I do not believe an imminent threat of a broad war exists there, but if it comes we would be better prepared to move with meaning and force if there were some force of meaning to what we are doing and saying now.

Meat from Managua—playing it both ways is not an effective policy for America. The only way it fits is in this never-never land of Nicaraguan policy paradox.

Mr. DODD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I will not take a great deal of time. I really wanted to comment on the discussions which transpired immediately prior to the comments of the distinguished Senator from Montana. I speak of the colloquy between the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from West Virginia, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] regarding the meetings that occurred yesterday at the White House. I join with my other colleagues who spoke earlier commending the distinguished minority leader for his efforts to bring together what has been described as a rather disparate group of Democrats in order to try to resolve differences among ourselves in regard to what our policy in Central America, more specifically Nicaragua, ought to be. As the minority leader has pointed out, this was not an easy thing to accomplish. In fact, we spent several days trying to resolve the differences among ourselves. But as a result of a very propitious visit to Nicaragua by two of our distinguished colleagues, Senator KERRY of Massachusetts and Senator HARKIN of Iowa, I believe we brought to the discussion a new element that indicated there was a strong and a very real possibility of achieving a cease-fire between the Contras and the Nicaraguan Government; that as a result of that new information Senators who had in the past fundamentally disagreed with the direction we ought to pursue in our foreign policy took a different approach and as a result of the initiative of BENNETT JOHNSTON of Louisiana, with the work of some 12 or 13 other Democratic Senators on this side of the aisle, we were able to fashion at least a rough draft of some basic principles we could live with provided the administration would accept and support them.

With that rough draft, as has been pointed out, a group of us went to the White House and spent a rather lengthy day yesterday with, for a very brief time, the President, and then with the Vice President and staff within the administration, and the State Department, to see if we could not come to some accommodation. I will not go back over what the Democrats proposed during an 8-hour vigil yesterday at the White House. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana and the distinguished minority leader I think have covered those points rather thoroughly.

What I should like to point out to my colleagues this afternoon is where the differences are. I think it is important to add to this debate what culminated at around 6 p.m. last evening in the two final best offers, if you will, of the Democrats there and how the administration responded.

There are four or five fundamental differences that existed between the two positions and, if I could, Mr. President, I will highlight those differences in order to shed a bit more light on this debate.

The first difference was in the definition of humanitarian aid. The Democratic proposition called for humanitarian aid that would be limited to food, clothing, medicine, shelter, and the ability to deliver those products to the Contras. The administration insisted even at their last proposal that humanitarian aid also include transportation/communications. That transforms purely humanitarian aid, in the minds of many of us, into nonlethal aid, by broadening humanitarian assistance to include also the ability to expand, if you will, the possibility of additional military conflict, transportation/communications falling into the nonlethal category but falling out of what one would traditionally speak of as humanitarian aid.

The second point had to do with the cease-fire. Democrats proposed that the $14 million could be unfenced, if you will, provided both sides agreed to a cease-fire. And if either side refused to do so, particularly if the Nicaraguans did, then the aid could go forward. The difference there was this: We felt very strongly that a cease-fire ought to be monitored by some outside third party, working on the assumption that the Contras and the Nicaraguans would both be accusing the other of substantial violations of human rights; that if the cease-fire were going to work, then we should have some credible third party monitoring the cease-fire to judge whether or not there were any violations. The administration was reluctant to have an independent third party monitor that cease-fire.

Third, we asked the administration to support a proposition that would condition the unfencing of the $14 million to a willingness by this country and the Nicaraguans to sit down and resume the bilateral talks which had fallen off only a few short weeks ago. The administration felt that this should not be a precondition on the $14 million and, furthermore, we ought to be satisfied with the President's commitment that he would be willing to go back to those talks. We on this side felt very strongly that the resumption of these talks would probably be the best thing that could occur if there is to be any hope at all of dealing with the larger questions in Central America—not just the issue of the Contras but also of the violence which has contaminated that entire region. The administration also felt that the bilateral talks, if they were to exist, really ought to be primarily focused on trying to resolve the differences between the Contras and the Nicaraguans. We on this side did not disagree that that is something which ought to occur, but we felt, if that were insisted upon in this resolution, the likelihood of bilateral talks would be diminished significantly; that the Nicaraguans, even though we disagree with them, have stated too often recently that they would not at this juncture sit down and have discussions regarding the Contras.

I regret that.

But I think initiating the bilateral talks is far more important, because there are larger issues in this region than just the conditions of the Contras. We should not insist upon this provision, and that if we do, we would write into this resolution a self-fulfilling prophecy which would in fact kill the bilateral talks and hence unfence the $14 million without any preconditions.

The fourth point where there are some significant difference was on the delivery of this humanitarian aid.

The Democrats proposed that the humanitarian aid could be delivered to the Contras by any nonintelligence agency of the Government. We said that not because we wished in any way to discredit the CIA or any of the other intelligence agencies of our Government but because over the last 6 months or so there have been a number of reports, which I will not go into now, which unfortunately have cast an ill light on the CIA and other agencies. I think it is regrettable. In fact, I know firsthand that many professional people within our intelligence-gathering agencies are deeply upset over several things that have occurred which they oppose. However, we have to deal with realities, and we felt that if we did not exclude those agencies, many people would object to this entire proposition on the ground that the CIA and other intelligence-gathering agencies could not be trusted to deliver this humanitarian aid in the manner spelled out in the resolution. I regret that. I do not think it is entirely right. But we have to deal in the real world. Unfortunately, the administration, at least on their last offer, insisted that the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Council be included in delivering and monitoring the humanitarian aid.

These were the major differences that existed between us. They may seem insignificant to some or rather small. I think they are more fundamental than that.

I, too, deeply regret that what was offered yesterday, a compromise that was reached among people on our side who have fundamentally differed on this issue, was not more enthusiastically embraced by the administration. It has been suggested that today there may still be time for compromise, to work something out. I am not sure that can occur; in fact, I doubt that it can. What was written into the proposition we submitted was not only the specifics of the various provisions, some of which I have outlined here this afternoon, but also what would be inherent in any such agreement or discussion, a willingness of the parties to sit down and negotiate and accept the good faith of each other; that if we accepted this specific language, we also embraced the intent and spirit of what was being offered.

Much of what we, as Democrats, were proposing to the administration would ultimately depend upon the willingness of the administration to do everything in its power to see that the provisions included could be carried out. I would be uneasy today and less than candid with my colleagues if I said otherwise. If we found at this 11th hour, after months when we had the opportunity to work these things out, that there was an offer that would embrace some of this language, I would be uneasy as to whether or not the good faith and intent to follow those provisions was the purpose or rather, if the purpose was to unfence the $14 million, no matter what you have to do to get that money out.

So, while others may still find some sense of optimism and hope, with something approaching less than 2 hours before a final vote on this measure, I hope we will reject the proposal the administration has offered us, for the reasons that have been stated by my colleagues. I hope we will submit the Democratic proposal to the committees of this body; that we will conduct hearings over the next several weeks, and come back with a proposition that I think has the great potential of building a strong bipartisan support in this body, and then move forward.

This will not be the last time we debate Managua, the Contras, and Central America. I wish it were so. But it will not be. There is an opportunity, I think, for us to do some intelligent things here, to look a bit differently, to understand that what is at stake here is not just the future of Central America; but what is at stake here is the security of our country, the United States; to understand that what is occurring in this part of the world jeopardizes the interests of this Nation and the interests of our allies. The Contras are important. Nicaragua is important. El Salvador is important. Guatemala and Costa Rica are important. But they are not as important as the United States and its national security interests.

I hope that at some point in the non-too-distant future that would become the primary interest of the administration and this body, that we would put this Nation's security ahead of the issues of the Contras. Important as that issue may be, it is not as important as what happens to the United States and this part of the world in the coming weeks.

Unfortunately, we are taking a back seat while Central America is blowing up in our midst. The real loser, if we do not begin to deal with this issue soon, will not be the Contras or the Nicaraguans. It will be the United States of America. We have allowed this issue to become so emotional and fanatical in some places that we cannot even think clearly about what we should be doing.

In January 1981 there were Soviets, Cubans, Eastern Europeans, and military hardware in the Sandinistas' Nicaragua. In April 1985 there are a lot more Cubans, a lot more Soviets, a lot more Eastern Europeans, and a lot more Soviet hardware in Nicaragua. We have spent $80 to $100 million of the American taxpayers' money to support an operation which is not lessening the threat. During that same period of time when we spent this money the threat has increased.

Is it not time to think anew, to try something different, to understand that if that situation persists, it is not the Contras who will be in jeopardy, not Costa Rica, not El Salvador, but the United States?

What we proposed yesterday was a major step for many of us. If you do not take risks, if you are not willing to take a chance, nothing ever happens, whether it be in foreign policy or domestic policy. Many of us took a giant step yesterday to try to reach accommodation. Many suggested that we should not do so, that we should let the President suffer a political loss, that we could score some points by having him lose. I must say that there was a certain amount of appeal in that argument, having seen what has gone on in the last several years with other issues; but many of us felt that this issue was far too important to let that occur.

Unfortunately, an offer that was made in good faith, with a lot of risk, a lot of chances being taken by some of us who would have preferred a different approach, was rejected. I think that is regrettable. But today is only 1 day; tomorrow is another; and we can come back to this issue afresh, with some better approaches.

Mr. KERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I join my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, in his appraisal of discussions we had at the White House yesterday, and I thank him. I thank especially the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], for his willingness to try to pull together what has been referred to, perhaps inappropriately, as a disparate group of Democrats, but certainly a group of Democrats with varying views.

I applaud the efforts of that group to have debated and negotiated in the best of faith, in a genuine effort to try to put the interests of the Nation ahead of party politics and to have put before the President of the United States and this administration an important opportunity to negotiate, to be able to really find a way out of the morass of Central America.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to rehash the process of those negotiations. There have been a number of colloquies on it. The time allotted to us for debate is running.

After listening to the President run down the proposal we put before him, and having listened to him, point by point, agree to what we had said, with a couple of major exceptions of substance, and specifically the issue of the Contras' participation in the dialog of reconciliation and how that would be stated, I was disappointed to find that each proposal brought back to us was a substantial departure from those comments of the President and a substantial departure from what we had put before him as an alternative proposal.

Now, Mr. President, it is not every day that the Senate of the United States is called on to render judgment of one kind or another on an issue of war or peace, and this is obviously one of those singular occasions.

Today the Senate faces two choices. One choice is to accede to the President's request to continue the covert war against Nicaragua, thereby risking the continued escalation of the military conflict in Central America and with it the possibility, not the assurance, but the possibility of either an accidental or conceivably a fabricated confrontation which draws the United States into a more direct combat involvement.

The other choice is one which I and Senator HARKIN and others of my colleagues urge that we choose, a course which hopefully, not assuredly, but hopefully will be able to lead us to a peaceful resolution of the conflict that currently exists.

As a veteran of Vietnam who fought and was wounded in that conflict, the choice for me is not really a difficult one at the outset. I share with every one of my colleagues in this institution a commitment to defend the interests of our Nation, our national security, and to make difficult choices about where and when we might have to send people to die at some point in the future.

But in the first instance, Mr. President, when you have other alternatives it was that experience of 16 years ago that has taught me that where you have the opportunity to pursue a chance of talking before you shoot you owe it to the next generation of Americans as well as the present to do so.

I do not delude myself into believing that the peace negotiations or the bilateral talks would go smoothly. I do not pretend that we would resolve all of the issues with the Sandinistas in such talks, but I am willing to take that chance. I am willing, as Senator DODD said in his statement, to take the risk in the effort to put to test the good faith of the Sandinistas and to see whether or not we can end the bloodshed, the suffering, and the terrorism.

It is not just the fact that American youth may be called on once again to fight and to die in the jungles and mountains of another Third World country. It is not just that that weighs on my conscience today. It is the fact that we perceive the government of a small Third World nation, not even the size of North Carolina, of even 3 million people in population, as an automatic threat to American interests no matter what that government might be willing to do in order to satisfy the interests of the United States.

It is the fact that the grinding poverty in that area is so real and apparent, the legacy of a brutal dictatorship installed by American force some 50 years ago and which in concert with a tiny economic elite plundered the natural resources of the countryside while more than 80 percent of the population were forced to eke out a meager subsistence for themselves and their families.

It is the fact that once again the American people are being misled on a systematic basis about what we are doing, and by what means, in that region and as to what our goals are in that region.

It is the fact that the Central Intelligence Agency has organized, trained, and funded a mercenary army, which has been guilty of atrocities against civilians and has resorted to terrorist methods in attempting to undermine the Sandinista government.

If anyone has any doubt about the fact, I ask that they turn to the pictures in Newsweek magazine of this week where an individual is made to dig his own grave, lie down in it, and wait until a knife is thrust through his throat and then he is buried. Those pictures record starkly that event.

I am not naive, Mr. President, about whether or not Sandinistas are guilty of brutalities, too. Yes, they have been. But when you foster war that happens. But, Mr. President, our dollars are not funding what the Sandinistas are doing, and there are other forms in which we can try to control those atrocities and ought to do so.

But we can here in the Senate of the United States and in this Congress control whether or not our dollars will continue to find what we know we can stop.

It is the fact that American treatment of our friends and allies throughout Latin America has been of such a heavyhanded and unilateral nature than deepseeded resentments are growing, and if they continue unabated that could affect our fundamental interests in the hemisphere for years to come.

It is a fact that 15,000 Nicaraguans have been killed in the last 3 years, 15,000 men and women and children of all ages. And this comes on the heels of the 50,000 Nicaraguans killed by the Somoza regime as the revolutionaries gained momentum in 1978 and culminated in their victory in 1979.

But most importantly, Mr. President, most importantly, what weighs on my conscience is the fact that our policy denies best values and traditions of our country, that the best approach we have known and utilized in the past with respect to diplomacy—that we are not living up to those traditions and that the fundamental interests, the security interests of the United States are not in fact being safeguarded as a result.

I hope you agree with me, and I hope also that the President of the United States would agree with me, that those interests are clear, they are definable, even though I do not think this administration has defined them. I want to spell out what I think our interests are in that region because it is central to this debate.

It is our belief that the foremost threats to the security of the United States in Central America would be:

One, the implacement of Soviet missiles in the region; two, the establishment of Soviet or Cuban bases in the region; three, the efforts of countries in the region to directly or indirectly support efforts to overthrow or destabilize other countries in their regions; and four, the continued militarization of the region involving the continued and growing presence of foreign military advisers and personnel, including the escalation of the regional arms buildup.

Now, I hope the President of the United States agrees with me that those are our interests. If he does, then the disagreement is over the methods that we will use to protect those interests, although these are not all the concerns we should have, Mr. President.

We have interests with our NATO allies which are currently being undermined because they are against what we are doing in Nicaragua. We have interests of international law which we have usurped by virtue of our renunciation of the World Court role in this dispute. We have our interests in the long-term relationship with Latin America, which I can say to you when President Ortega receives a standing ovation in the assembly of another Latin American country, we are clearly not winning on that score, either.

Mr. President, each and every one of these interests are not only jeopardized by the continued funding of the Contras, they are, in fact, grossly threatened by that funding. If there is one guarantee of increasing the Soviet presence in Nicaragua, it will be to force that Government into no other choice but that of turning to the Soviet Union. If there is one guarantee that we will have increased Soviet advisers there, it will be to increase the funding to the Contras so the Sandinistas will have to turn to them to help defend themselves.

If there is one guarantee that we will continue to lose the ability to prevent the establishment of any kind of constructive mechanism by which we can determine whether they are subverting their neighbors, it will be to continue to force the pressure on them so as to make that an act of self-survival.

I want to see the killing end. I want to see the death and destruction end. But I want to do it not only while abiding by the traditional American values that should guide our policy; I want to do it while enhancing them at the same time.

On the other hand, this administration seems to protect American interests by wanting to continue the process of escalating killing, and I do not believe that the American people as a matter of first choice want to choose a policy whereby we continue down that road.

I reiterate, Mr. President, Senator HARKIN and I and others who have argued this position understand clearly that we have real interests in the region and they are definable. We have legitimate security concerns. That is the reason that Senator HARKIN and I went to Nicaragua to meet with President Ortega to seek a clarification of his government's position on issues affecting the security interests of the United States. We did not travel to negotiate with the Sandinistas and we did not. We traveled to discuss personally the concerns that we have—as countless Senators and Congressmen have done before us—over those legitimate security interests.

And I share with the Members of the Senate a letter from Secretary of State Shultz to Speaker O'NEILL written on April 16, 1985, and received by him only 5 days ago.

And I share this letter with my colleagues because Senator HARKIN and I, it is alleged, have somehow done something different than what we should be doing from what Senators have done in the past. Mr. President, the letter's salient point is this: The Secretary of State says:

> I recognize the value of such foreign travel. At the same time congressional travel to Nicaragua and Central America has contributed to a better understanding within the legislative branch of the complex sources of conflict in the region. I recognize the value of that travel in assisting the Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities in the formulation of U.S. policy. Therefore, I strongly encourage Members of the Congress of both parties regardless of their views on Central America to visit not only Nicaragua but all the countries of the region, and I would urge them to spend as much time there as their schedules will permit.

Mr. President, that is what we did, and I am proud that during the course of the conversations we had we were able—in conversations incidentally which were longer than any conversations that our own Secretary of State has ever had in 5 years with President Ortega—to come back with an opportunity which said to the United States maybe there is another way.

In sum, I believe as our colleagues are aware, as a consequence of the lengthy discussions we had, we have brought back an opportunity—not a guarantee, not a surety, but an opportunity—to be able to at least stop the killing, at least sit down at a table, and put to test good faith of the Contadora process and of the Sandinistas themselves.

Mr. President, I share with this body the aide memoir which was presented to us by President Ortega. In that aide memoir, the summary of our conversation, it states that the Government of Nicaragua reaffirmed its commitment to the Treaty of Tlatelolco to which it is a signatory and in which it is guaranteed that Latin America would be a nuclear free zone. He affirmed that commitment of the Contadora forces and cooperation, and in particular he emphasized a guarantee of respect for nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries, a respect for the principle of self-determination, guarantee of the nonuse of force or threat of force in relations with other countries, and the requirement of noncooperation with individuals who seek to overthrow other governments. Here, Mr. President, in writing, is a guarantee of the security interest of the United States. And throughout this memorandum is an affirmation that there will not be any Soviet bases, and that they are prepared to sign the Contadora document itself. Not next week, not in a year, not after negotiations, but they will sign the current September 7, 1984, draft tomorrow morning. We have been the ones who have said no to that, Mr. President. And all throughout that document—and I will at the end ask unanimous consent that it be admitted as part of these comments—there are restrictions on the amount of arms. There are restrictions and verification procedures for guaranteeing that the very things which threaten our security interest not in fact take place.

I submit that, if we are sincere about this process, we will seek to get the final t's crossed and i's dotted in an effort to try to implement it, the Contadora Act for peace and cooperation in Central America.

In sum, we believe that the views that are in this document—both the aid memoir and the Contadora document that has been distributed to our colleagues—offer an opportunity for peaceful resolution of this problem.

Senator HARKIN and I remain, notwithstanding this administration's initial rejection of this opportunity, excited about the potential and the possibility that with courage, and with a willingness at least to try, we can put to test the sincerity of the Sandinistas. We believe that what is reflected in this memorandum provides not a solution but a framework; a framework for resolution of the crisis in Central America.

If we seize this moment, that could happen. We also believe that could help to make the Contadora process itself come to fruition.

I am not sure whether or not this administration, after our conversations at the White House yesterday, genuinely wants that to happen. But the Democrats I believe have offered a good-faith alternative which could test that. I would like to see the Congress and the Senate adopt that.

After more than 3 years of pursuing a unilateral military policy in the area to which Senator DODD referred, the United States is further away from achieving the goals of Contadora than when we started. And what was to have been originally a very restricted Contra operation solely for the interdiction of arms is now a Contra operation designed to literally overthrow the government.

As a result, at very best this administration has given only lipservice to the Contadora process. At worst, this administration has been a major obstacle to the successful completion and culmination of the Contadora effort. While the administration now believes that the only solution to the crisis in this region is a negotiated settlement between the Contras and the Nicaraguan Government, our friends and our allies throughout the Western Hemisphere, throughout Latin America, understand all too well that there will not be peace in that region until the United States and Nicaragua have negotiated a normalization of their own bilateral relations. If we really want to hold the Government of Nicaragua accountable, then the most effective instrument for that is the Contadora process. And I believe that is possible.

In my estimation, that is the fundamental issue that we face in Congress today: A question of whether or not in Central American debate with all its hemisphericwide ramifications, it is the policy of this administration to overthrow any government in that hemisphere with whom we might fundamentally disagree, whether or not that government represents a threat to us or to its neighbors. And I believe we owe it to a future generation of Americans, whether in the Northern or Southern Hemisphere, to stop that policy now.

Having been the victims of U.S. gunboat diplomacy in the past, Latin Americans are carrying with them the long and deep sense of history. They do not forget. And I believe that it is not in our best interest now to pursue a policy which will guarantee that in the future the children of this generation will reap the harvest of what we are doing.

In closing, Mr. President, what is at stake here is a fundamental choice about the direction of our foreign policy and really a fundamental confrontation with our values as a nation. Supporters of aid to the Contras say that the issue is about whether or not we will oppose communism. I oppose communism as staunchly as anybody in this Chamber. But the issue is not that simple, as politically attractive as that might sound. It is about how, not whether, we will oppose any kind of totalitarianism. It is about how, not whether, we will best protect the interests of the United States. It is about how, not whether, we will construct our policy toward other Latin American nations in a way that best enhances our interest in the future.

Mr. President, in defining my approach to this policy, I put the United States first. First, ahead of the Contras, and first, ahead of Nicaragua because our vital security interests are what this issue is about and how we protect those interests. Those who say we protect our interests as a matter of first choice by supporting the Contras are deluding themselves in the same way as the policy of controlled escalation with which we deluded ourselves in Vietnam.

Those who seek an army of mercenaries, whose excesses are evident for all to see, are turning away from the traditional value and the deep commitment that Americans have to diplomacy as the first choice in the conduct of our foreign relations. I have no illusions that the resolution of these complex issues will be quick or that the Sandinistas will respond with a good faith effort on their part.

I cannot promise that the negotiations will work. But I do know that if we do not talk, we do not have any way to put that to test. We have no alternative but to continue the conflict, continue the escalation, continue the bloodshed and continue the killing of innocent victims. We have an opportunity for peace, not a guarantee, but an opportunity. And I ask whether or not future generations will have to ask why it is that we did not even make the effort to try.

My generation, and a lot of us grew up with the phrase "give peace a chance," as part of a song that captured a lot of people's imagination. I hope that the President of the United States will give peace a chance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the copy of the act on the Contadora process, and also the aide memoir, as well as the letter from Secretary of State Shultz, be made a part of the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

I request unanimous consent that the following statement of the Governor of Massachusetts, the Honorable Michael Dukakis be printed in the RECORD following my remarks on aid to the Contras.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Contadora Act for Peace and Cooperation in Central America—(excerpts)]

COMMITMENTS REGARDING ELECTORAL PROCESSES AND PARLIAMENTARY COOPERATION

(We are publishing sections of the September 7, 1984 Contadora draft dealing with democratization and security. This document represents a consensus of the Contadora nations—Mexico, Panama, Colombia and Venezuela. Of the Central American states, referred to in this agreement as the PARTIES, only Nicaragua has agreed to sign the September draft.)

Each of the PARTIES acknowledges with regard to the other Central American States the commitment assumed with its own people to guarantee the preservation of domestic peace as a contribution to peace in the region, and to that end resolves:

14. To adopt measures conducive to guaranteeing the equal participation of political parties in electoral processes, ensuring their access to the mass media and their freedom of assembly and expression.

15. They further agree to:

(a) Put the following measures into effect:

(1) To promulgate or revise electoral legislation governing the holding of elections so as to guarantee the effective participation of the people as a whole.

(2) To establish independent electoral boards to compile reliable voters rolls and to ensure the impartiality and democratic nature of the process.

(3) To establish or, where pertinent, to update norms guaranteeing the existence and participation of political parties that reflect the different currents of opinion.

(4) To draw up a calendar of elections and take steps to ensure the equal participation of all political parties.

(b) Propose to their respective legislative organs that they

(1) Hold regular meetings in alternative locations in order to exchange experience, contribute to detente and promote rapprochement between the countries in the area.

(2) Take measures aimed at maintaining relations with the Latin American Parliament and its respective Working Committees.

(3) Exchange information and experience on matters of their competence and compile, for the purpose of comparative study, a record of current electoral legislation and related measures in each country.

(4) Take part, as observers, in the different stages of electoral processes occurring in the region. An express invitation from the Central American country holding elections shall be essential for this purpose.

(5) Hold periodic meetings of a technical nature, in a venue and with an agenda determined, by consensus, at each preceeding meeting. The terms and conditions of the first meeting shall be determined via consultations among the Central American countries.

COMMITMENTS ON SECURITY AFFAIRS

In accordance with the obligations contracted in accordance with international law, the PARTIES assume the following:

Section 1. Commitments regarding military maneuvers

16. To abide by the following provisions as regards the holding of military maneuvers

(a) In the case of national or joint military maneuvers held in zones within thirty (30) kilometers of the borderline, the corresponding previous notification must be made to neighboring countries and to the Commission for Verification and Control referred to in Part II of this Act, with at least thirty (30) days notice.

(b) Such notification must contain the following elements:

(1) Title.

(2) Purpose.

(3) Participating forces.

(4) Geographical location.

(5) Dates and schedule.

(6) Equipment and weapons to be used.

An invitation should be extended to observers from the border countries.

17. To prohibit the holding of international military maneuvers within their respective territories. All maneuvers of this kind already in process must be suspended within a period of no more than thirty days after the signing of this Act.

Section 2. Commitments on armament issues

18. To halt the arms race in all its forms, and to initiate immediate negotiations on the control and reduction of the current inventory of weapons, and on the number of military personnel under arms.

19. To refrain from introducing new arms systems which qualitatively and quantitatively modify present inventories of war materiel.

20. To refrain from the introduction, possession or use of chemical, biological, radiological and other weapons that can be considered excessively harmful or that have indiscriminate effects.

21. To submit to the Commission for Verification and Control their respective current inventories of arms, installations and military personnel under arms within a period of no more than thirty (30) days from the date of the signing of this Act. The inventories shall be prepared in accordance with the definitions and basic criteria agreed upon in the Annex and in paragraph twenty-two of this section. Once the Commission has received the inventories, it shall carry out, within a period of no more than thirty days, studies of a technical nature serving to determine maximum limits for the military development of the States in the region, taking into account their national security interests, and with a view to halting the arms race.

22. On the basis of the above, the PARTIES agree on the following stages of execution:

First stage: Once their respective inventories have been submitted, the PARTIES must suspend all acquisition of military equipment. The moratorium shall be in force until limits are agreed upon in the following stage.

Second stage. The PARTIES shall establish limits within a period of not more than thirty days, on the following types of arms: fighter planes, bombers and helicopters, tanks and armored vehicles; artillery weapons; rockets and short, medium and long-range guided missiles and launching equipment, and military ships or vessels, or those liable to be used for military purposes.

Third stage: The PARTIES shall establish, once the previous stage has been concluded, and within a period of not more than thirty days, limits on military personnel and on the installations liable to be used as bases for war action.

Fourth stage: The PARTIES shall be able to initiate negotiations on matters they consider essential to their interests. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the PARTIES shall be able, by mutual consent, to alter the time limits set for the negotiation and establishment of limits.

The following basic criteria shall determine the levels of military development of the Central American States, in accordance with stability and security needs in the region:

(a) No military institution shall have as its political aim the establishment of hegemony over other individual forces.

(b) In defining national security, consideration must be given to economic and social development at a given moment and to future development aims.

(c) To determine the latter, studies must be carried out that cover the following overall aspects:

(1) An awareness of the internal and external security needs of the State.

(2) Size of country.

(3) Population.

(4) Distribution of economic resources, infrastructure and population within the national territory.

(5) Extension and characteristics of land borders and shorelines.

(6) Military spending in relation to the gross domestic product (GDP).

(7) Military budget in relation to public expenditure and in comparison with other social indicators.

(8) Characteristics, geographical situation and geopolitical position.

(9) Maximum level of military technology suitable for the region.

23. To initiate constitutional procedures enabling them, if they have not already done so, to sign and ratify or adhere to international treaties and other accords on disarmament matters.

Section 3. Commitments regarding foreign military bases

24. To refrain from authorizing the establishment of foreign military bases or schools in their respective territories.

25. To eliminate existing foreign military bases or schools in their respective territories within a period of 6 months from the signing of this Act.

Section 4. Commitments regarding foreign military advisers

26. To submit to the Commission on Verification and Control a report on foreign military advisers and other foreign elements engaged in military and security activities in their territories, within a period of no more than thirty days from the signing of this Act. The definitions contained in the Annex shall be taken into account in the preparation of this census.

27. To establish a schedule for the gradual withdrawal of foreign military advisers engaged in operational and training activities. The studies and recommendations of the Commission on Verification and Control shall be taken into account for this purpose.

28. With regard to advisers carrrying out technical duties related to the installation and maintenance of military equipment, a control register shall be drawn up in accordance with the terms established in the respective contracts or agreements. On the basis of this register, the Commission on Verification and Control shall take steps to establish reasonable limits on the numbers of this type of advisers.

Section 5. Commitments regarding arms transfers

29. To eliminate the intraregional and extraregional flow of arms destined to individuals, irregular forces, organizations, or armed bands attempting to destabilize the Governments of the States parties to this Act.

30. To establish, for that purpose, internal control mechanisms at airports, landing strips, ports, terminals and frontier posts, on land, air, sea and river routes, and at any other point or area liable to be used for arms transfers.

31. To submit denunciations of violations in this matter, based on presumption or proven facts, to the Commission on Verification and Control, together with sufficient information to enable it to carry out the necessary investigations and present the conclusions and recommendations that it deems suitable. Whenever pertinent, and for purposes of verification, the following criteria shall be taken into account:

(a) Origin of the arms transfer.

(b) Personnel involved.

(c) Types of weapons, ammunition, equipment and other kinds of military supplies.

(d) Extraregional means of transport.

(e) Extraregional transport routes.

(f) Bases for storage of weapons, ammunition, equipment and other kinds of military supplies.

(g) Intraregional traffic routes and areas.

(h) Means of international transport.

(i) Receiving unit.

Section 6. Commitments regarding the prohibition of support to irregular forces

32. To refrain from giving any political, military, financial or other type of support to individuals, groups, irregular forces or armed bands whose aim is the overthrow or destabilization of other governments, and to prevent, by all the means at their disposal, the use of their territory for the purpose of attacking or organizing attacks, acts of sabotage, kidnapings, highjackings or other unlawful actions in the territory of another State.

33. To exercise close vigilance along their respective borders with the object of preventing their territory from being used to carry out any armed action against a neighboring State.

34. To disarm and remove from border zones any irregular group or force that has been identified as responsible for actions against a neighboring State.

35. To dismantle and forbid the use of installations, means and facilities for operative and logistical support within their territory when these have been used for launching actions against neighboring governments.

Section 7. Commitments regarding terrorism, subversion or sabotage

36. To refrain from lending political, military, financial or any other kind of support to subversive, terrorist or sabotage activities aimed at destabilizing the governments of the region.

37. To refrain from organizing, calling for or participating in acts of terrorism, subversion or sabotage in another State, or consenting to activites organized within their territory and aimed at the commission of such acts.

38. To abide by the following international treaties and agreements:

a. The Hague Convention for the Suppression of the Illicit Seizure of Aircraft.

b. Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Acts of Terrorism consisting of Crimes against Persons and Related Extortion when these have International Consequences.

c. Convention for the Suppression of Illicit Acts against Civil Aviation.

d. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents.

e. International Convention against the Taking of Hostages.

39. To initiate constitutional procedures that will enable them, if they have not already done so, to sign and ratify or accede to the international treaties and agreements referred to in the preceding paragraph.

40. To respect the commitments set out in this section, without prejudice to their accession to the treaties and other international agreements on matters of diplomatic and territorial asylum.

41. To prevent the participation of individuals belonging to foreign terrorist groups or organizations in unlawful acts within their respective territories. For that purpose, they shall reinforce cooperation between their immigration and police departments, as well as between the corresponding civil authorities.

AIDE MEMOIRE

(Based on the conversations held between the President of the Republic of Nicaragua, Commander of the Revolution, Daniel Ortega, and Senators Tom Harkin and John Kerry in Managua, on April 19, 1985.)

(1) President Ortega reaffirmed the national character and non-aligned nature of the Nicaraguan Revolution.

(2) The President also reaffirmed the commitment of the government of Nicaragua to peace and regional stability. To that end, the President emphasized the following points:

(a) Nicaragua reaffirmed its commitment to the Treaty of Tlatelolco, to which it is signatory and in which it is guaranteed that Latin America will be a nuclear free zone.

(b) Nicaragua reaffirmed its commitment to the Contadora Act for Peace and Cooperation in Central America, and in particular emphasized those aspects of the proposal that:

(i) guarantee the respect for non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries;

(ii) respect the principle of self-determination;

(iii) guarantee the non-use of force or the threat of the use of force in relations with other countries, and;

(iv) require non-cooperation with individuals, groups or governments involved in actions which tend to destabilize or overthrow other governments.

(c) Nicaragua reaffirmed its conviction that the Contadora process continues to represent the only viable initiative to achieve a regional peace agreement which is just and lasting. Although Nicaragua is prepared to immediately sign the Contadora proposal of September 7, 1984, and is participating and will continue to participate in the discussions to fine-tune said proposal.

(d) Nicaragua reaffirmed its intention of respecting the Contadora proposal which prohibits the establishment of bases, installations or military schools in Central American territory.

(e) Nicaragua reaffirms its commitment and insists that any regional agreement has to be subject to effective mechanisms of verification and control which guarantee the compliance of all the aspects of the Contadora Treaty.

(f) Nicaragua reaffirms its willingness of having not only normal but friendly relations with the United States.

Nicaragua expressed its firm conviction that there can not be peace between the Central American countries until a normalization (of relations) is achieved between the United States and Nicaragua.

With this purpose, President Ortega stated that if the United States, as confirmed by the Reagan Administration and the Congress, discontinued its direct and indirect support of the Contras, whether covert or overt, and immediately reinitiates the bilateral conversations between Nicaragua and the United States in Manzanillo; conversations which would include a delegation of participating observers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States and in which the relations between both countries would be discussed, so as to normalize bilateral relations and in this way contribute effectively to the Contadora process; then the government of Nicaragua would immediately call for a cease fire and would immediately solicit the participation of the High Commissioner of the United Nations and of the International Committee of the Red Cross in the resettlement and repatriation of any citizen who wishes to in Nicaraguan territory or in any neighboring country; as well as immediately guarantee full freedom of the press and reaffirm political pluralism and fundamental freedoms.

(g) Nicaragua reaffirmed that it will continue the implementation of unconditional amnesty for any member of the Contras who surrenders his weapons to representatives of the governments of Nicaragua, Honduras, or Costa Rica, depending upon the place where that person is. Nicaragua would also guarantee full restoration of that person's rights.

(h) Finally, Nicaragua, while affirming its dependence and national pride, recognizes that hemispheric interests are better guaranteed by friendship, cooperation and mutual respect among states.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, DC, April 16, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Thank you for your letter of February 28 requesting the Administration's views on a letter to you of the same date from Nicaraguan President Ortega.

In addressing a detailed statement of Nicaraguan policy and objectives to the Congress, together with specific proposals for action, Mr. Ortega is obviously attempting to circumvent normal government-to-government channels. Although unorthodox and inappropriate under our constitutional system such tactics have become routine practice by the Sandinistas in their efforts to obtain diplomatic and public relations advantage and to influence directly the Congress of the United States. I was pleased, therefore, to note in your letter to Mr. Ortega the emphasis on the constitutional responsibility of the President for the conduct of our foreign relations.

In this same vein, I believe the most appropriate procedural response would be a formal diplomatic note from the American Ambassador in Managua, on behalf of the United States Government, to the Government of Nicaragua. This response would note the referral of Ortega's letter by the Congress to the Executive Branch and would attempt to discourage the Nicaraguans from the belief that they can conduct foreign relations with the United States Congress as distinguished from relations with our government.

Mr. Ortega's direct invitation to the Congress to conduct an official inspection of the Nicaraguan military buildup presents obvious difficulties. At the same time, Congressional travel to Nicaragua and Central America has contributed to a better understanding within the Legislative Branch of the complex sources of conflict in the region. I recognize the value of such foreign travel in assisting the Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities in the formulation of U.S. policy. Therefore, I strongly encourage members of Congress, of both parties and regardless of their views on Central America, to visit not only Nicaragua but all of the countries of the region. I would urge them to spend as much time there as their schedules will permit, to travel outside the capitals, and to talk with citizens in and out of government and of all political persuasions in order to better understand the difficult issues we must all resolve in forging a bipartisan policy on Central America. The Department of State will be pleased to assist Members of Congress with their travel in any way possible.

With respect to the substantive points raised by Mr. Ortega in his letter to you, I have enclosed an analysis that I hope will be useful. We plan to respond to these points in our note to the Government of Nicaragua referred to above.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT
Boston, MA, April 23, 1985.

Ms. JAYNE PLANK,
Director, Intergovernmenal Affairs, Office of Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs, Department of State, Washington DC.

Dear Ms. Plank: Thank you for your letter of April 15 outlining the President's position on our escalating involvement in Nicaragua and enclosing two booklets entitled: The Soviet-Cuban Connection in Central America and the Caribbean and Misconceptions about U.S. Policy Towards Nicaragua.

I am strongly opposed to the President's policy in Nicaragua and do not support this latest proposal. I believe that what the Administration is trying to do in Nicaragua is both morally and legally indefensible and I think you and the President are entitled to know why.

In September 1947, the United States signed the so-called Rio Treaty which for the first time attempted to establish a framework for peaceful, longlasting relationships among the countries of the Western Hemisphere. The Rio Treaty was not an insignificant event. Coming after decades of U.S. interventionism in Latin America—interventionism bitterly resented by virtually all of our Latin American neighbors, whatever their political ideology, it was a major event in the history of U.S.-Latin American relations.

The Rio Treaty was ratified by the U.S. Senate on December 8, 1947. The Charter of the Organization of American States was signed by us in 1948 and ratified by the Senate in August 1950. Under Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, "all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land."

Article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States provides as follows:

No state . . . has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, . . . in the internal or external affairs of any other states. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force, but also any other form of interference.

The language of Article 18 is clear and unequivocal. It does not say that it can be waived when we don't like the government of a particular Latin American nation. It does not say that it applies in the case of a right wing dictatorship, but has no effect if the dictatorship is of the left. It provides in no uncertain terms that there will be no—repeat, no—attempt by a signatory to the treaty to intervene militarily, through surrogates, or otherwise, in the internal affairs of a member state.

Before the President finally revealed that what we have been trying to do is overthrow the Nicaraguan government all along, he kept telling us that our attempts to aid the contras were designed to interdict the movement of military supplies from Nicaragua to El Salvador. In fact, the administration has had an exceedingly difficult time finding any such movement of supplies to interdict.

But the Rio Treaty does not give us—or any signatory nation—the right unilaterally to make that decision. There is a carefully prescribed procedure for dealing with such a situation in the treaty itself.

Article 3 Paragraph 2 of the treaty states that:

On the request of the State or States directly attacked and until the decision of the Organ of Consultation of the Inter-American System, each one of the Contracting Parties may determine the immediate measures which it may individually take . . . The Organ of Consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

In addition, Article 5 requires that:

The High Contracting Parties shall immediately send to the Security Council of the United Nations . . . complete information concerning the activities undertaken.

It, therefore, we were serious about stopping the movement of such supplies—if they existed at all—we had a perfect right to invoke the provisions of the treaty which cover such illegal activity on the part of others. The fact that we did not do so suggests to me that "interdiction" was nothing more than a cover story for our efforts to overthrow the Sandinistas.

In short, what we have here is an unlawful attempt by the U.S. Government—unlawful under national, as well as international law—to overthrow the government of a member state of the OAS.

I, for one, and, I believe, the vast majority of American people, do not believe in breaking the law. And we are outraged when our government engages in lawlessness. But that is precisely what the Administration is doing.

We are reminded over and over again that those who ignore the lessons of history are condemned to repeat them.

In 1954, we overthrew the democratically-elected government of Guatemala in a CIA operation directed by our own ambassador right out of the American Embassy in Guatemala City. Today, Guatemala has one of the most repressive regimes in the hemisphere—one, I might add, so brutal that it makes Sandinista violations of civil liberties look like a Sunday School picnic by comparison.

In 1973, we helped engineer the overthrow of the democratically-elected government of Chile. Today, the Pinochet dictatorship makes no pretense of its disdain for democracy or civil liberties.

How many times are we going to repeat the sorry lessons of Guatemala and Chile before we realize that there must be another way—a way which is consistent with our ideals and principles and which conforms to obligations of law which we chose to assume when we joined the Organization of American States?

I hope the Administration will abandon this foolhardy and lawless course. I hope it will consider seriously the proposals with which Senators Harkin and Kerry returned from Nicaragua. Those proposals are the only basis on which we can build a lasting peace consistent with our own and international law.

Very truly yours,

MICHAEL S. DUKAKIS,
Governor.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I yield to Senator MITCHELL.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, how much time does the Senator seek?

Mr. WALLOP. Ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I have listened with both amazement and dismay to many of the remarks which have been put forward on the floor this afternoon. It is almost inconceivable that we would remain blind to historical fact, to the facts of the revolution in Nicaragua.

It is a fact that this country gave more aid in the first 18 months of the existence of the Sandinista regime than it had given during the entire regime of Somoza which preceded it.

It was and remains a fact that this country was courting the Sandinista regime in every way only to see the Sandinistas tighten the noose around the necks of their people. It was they who began to build up in the face of no threat whatsoever. It was they who began to build a large military power base against threats that could not possibly have been visited upon them by their neighbors. It was they who promised Senator DOMENICI that they were going to institute pluralism, democracy, labor unions, free press, the whole bunch of things which they also promised to the Organization of American States; and it was they who broke those promises.

What on Earth can persuade anybody to believe that they would live up to any promise they were to make now?

We did not start the civil war in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas started it, not in response to us but against their own people.

The Carter administration, history will show, was the first to recognize the threat posed by the increasing totalitarian nature of the Sandinista regime, and to conclude that it must be changed. It did this in a finding filed with the Intelligence Committee in 1979. But many have conveniently forgotten this.

What does it take to get the attention of the opponents of aid to the Contras? The bipartisan Kissinger commission's warnings also go unheeded. It warned that we cannot have stability in this region or indeed in this hemisphere with Nicaragua as a totalitarian state aligned with the Soviet Union, and that if we did not contain it within Nicaraguan society we would sooner or later have to contain it on our borders.

Liberal Senators just back from Nicaragua say that Ortega is now interested in talks; that he is feeling the pinch of economics and our pressure. But they argue that our policy is not working. It is lost on me why he would be feeling a pinch, and the need to talk, if our policy were not working.

There is no reason in this except that these are the very people who would defang any foreign policy tool available to the President of the United States to push the Sandinista government into conversations with its own citizens. Nevertheless, Mr. President, they would have those citizens become our clients.

These very Senators are threatening us with Vietnam revisited. It is they who are doing that. And it will be visited upon them should this resolution fail.

It is they who are saying that this is not an internal affair of Nicaraguans but an affair between the United States and the Government of Nicaragua. This is a civil war with Soviet participation on the Communist side. The question for us is whether we help our side.

These Senators want to leave behind people who seek to establish the freedom they thought they had won. They do it in the most absurd, cowardly of ways by saying that some of these people are former Somocistas. That argument is just about as valid, Mr. President, as saying that Chancellor Kohl and Chancellor Schmidt of the Federal Republic of Germany are Nazis because they once served in the Wehrmacht. It is absurd on its face and it is an excuse in which to hide in the face of real problems that are down there.

These Senators loudly hope that the Sandinistas will become democratic if left alone. But history will not show any circumstance in which a government who has given the control of its army to Communists, to Marxists, has fallen from their grasp. Hence these Senators, Mr. President, are endorsing the Brezhnev doctrine on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Some would propose that we grant $14 million in humanitarian aid delivered by something like the Red Cross which, by its charter, cannot give to individuals but only to governments. This would force the Contras to come hat in hand to the government that they are fighting, a government which highjacked their revolution from them, to receive their aid. Fourteen million American tax dollars would fulfill the fondest dreams of the Sandinista Government, that is, to get the Contras to lay down their arms, and to identify themselves, and to give that government the time to do resettlement of its own people by force, so as to isolate the Contras.

Senators on the other side of the aisle charge that we are not talking with the Sandinistas. And yet the Secretary of State has talked, Ambassador Shlauderman has talked, others have talked and talked and talked, and the Sandinistas have used the talks to buy time to tighten the noose around the throats of their own people, to build up an armed force that far exceeds the most irrational dreams of any Nicaraguan who could feel paranoid about the threats from Nicaragua's neighbors. These Senators' trust in talks exceeds their grasp of reality.

When can it be said that this trust takes over from common sense, from ordinary readings of history, not of bygone times but of history through which they have lived?

They tell us that if the administration were sincere, they would try another route. But history tells this administration and any other administrations, and anybody who would look at the facts fairly that there is no other route. The Sandinistas' own behavior on the international scene, in front of their own people, in front of their own Organization of American States, in every instance, says that trust cannot be offered.

So, I say to my liberal colleagues in the words of a famous movie go ahead, make my day, vote against the Resistance. But while you do so, remember I have three sons who will fight somewhere because of you. Between Panama and the Mexican border there are 100 million people whom we are abandoning to totalitarianism, whom we are abandoning to the grip of the Soviet Union. We will have to pay for that.

I think it is irresponsible and I think it is irrational, and I think it does not bear any credence in the face of the history through which most Members of this body have lived. It is just an irrational reaction, trying to do something to make clients and then abandoning people who are in pursuit of freedom—something we take for granted.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce that it is the intention to go back and forth to each side for those seeking recognition.

Mr. STEVENS. I might say to the Chair, "For a period of almost 2 hours there have been no speakers on this side." I am seeking now to allocate some time so that we might wind up this thing earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. BUMPERS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. How much time remains on each side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority has 165 minutes; the minority has 55 minutes.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator from Alaska yield for a further question, if he knows the answer to it? Is it the intention of the majority to use all its time?

Mr. STEVENS. It is the intention of the majority to try to work out with the minority leader a time for voting which might be earlier than the 9 o'clock time. In that event, we would not use all of our time. We are trying to work in some of these Senators who want to talk, with some limitation at this time.

I want to say to my good friend from Maine, I know he has been waiting. We did have sort of a list here. We waited for the time to be used on the other side, and two of our Members want some time now.

How much time does the Senator from Alabama desire?

Mr. DECONCINI. I will abbreviate my remarks. I would say no more than 4 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield the Senator 5 minutes. After that, we shall not use time for a short period of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I overheard some of the remarks earlier by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], who, after referring to his veteran's status, said he hoped we would find peaceful ways of dealing with the situation in Central America, particularly Nicaragua. I reflect the same observation.

I believe the way for the United States to deal with its own interests, which was the emphasis of the other Senators whom I heard speak—that is, we should worry about our own national security—I concur with that also. That was the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

I believe if we do not deal with the problem in Nicaragua in the mild way which would begin with the passage of this resolution today, we will not be working toward peace, we will not be working toward the support of the interests of the United States. But, more importantly, Mr. President, we will not be working toward that which this Nation was founded to bring to mankind. I refer to freedom.

In his 1985 State of the Union address, President Reagan observed that "Freedom is not the universal right of a chosen few." Our Declaration of Independence states what we regard as an inalienable right endowed by our Creator and among one of those rights is liberty. When the Senate votes this evening on whether or not to show some kind of support for the anti-Communist, anti-Sandinista forces now fighting in Nicaragua, we will be making our own statement about the right of people to live in freedom, or at least their right to try to obtain freedom from a government which promised it to them, and then betrayed that promise.

What kind of Nation are we if we do not supply some aid to those people who simply aspire as we do, aspire in the concept of the basic reason for this Government, unique in the world?

For that reason, Mr. President, I intend to support aid for those fighters who are often known as the Contras, even if it is for now merely in the form of humanitarian assistance.

For that reason, I intend to support aid for those fighters, who are often known as the "Contra," even if it is, for now, merely in the form of humanitarian assistance. Their cause is just; the Sandinista government has left the Nicaraguan people with no real alternative to armed struggle. To vote otherwise, I believe, would betray the aspirations for freedom that motivate not only the Nicaraguan people but many other struggling democratic organizations and resistance movements throughout the world.

The United States cannot afford to betray the cause of freedom in Nicaragua—as it did in Vietnam—without far-reaching consequences for stability in our hemisphere, for world peace, and ultimately for the survival of our own freedoms. I urge my colleagues in the Senate carefully review that situation in Nicaragua and to examine the Sandinista record.

It has been nearly 2 years since the Congress began publicly to debate the merits of U.S. policy toward Nicaragua and U.S. covert support for the Nicaraguan people who took up arms to prevent the consolidation of a Marxist regime in Nicaragua. When the debate intensified, I was greatly alarmed by the very public, high profile treatment of a very sensitive policy matter.

Although I am still concerned about the security implications of the disclosure of duly approved covert activities, I believe that there has been some benefit from the open discussion. The congressional debate has led to the accumulation in the public sector of a wealth of information about Nicaragua and the true nature of the Sandinista revolution. Many Americans have become wiser about the dangers and the threat posed by Soviet- and Cuban-backed Communist regimes.

At the same time, however, because of the openness of the congressional debate, this body and the American public have been the target of a massive propaganda campaign, which has distorted the reality of the Nicaraguan tragedy and played upon the genuine concern and compassion of our people. The campaign has confused many Americans and clouded both congressional and public understanding of U.S. policy toward Central America. As a result, there are many myths that exist about the Sandinista government. Many of them, I expect, will have surfaced before today's debate is concluded.

Today's Wall Street Journal contains on its editorial page a factual, step-by-step example of the manner and degree to which the Sandinistas have insinuated their own propaganda machinery into American policymaking. The article is entitled "A Lobbying Drive Began in Managua."

The article is sincerely recommended for reading by my colleagues. The author is Jim Denton. It tells of the origin and path of a set of myths which made its way through the media and into Congress. The sad story of media-transported myths affecting and running foreign policy formation is reminiscent of Vietnam days. I pray that all of us in this body and the other body, in the media, in the executive branch, the people, can excise myth from objective debate on Nicaragua.

I also pray that in the 10th year that has passed since the fall of Saigon, we can continue what I consider a refreshingly new approach with regard to our perspective on Vietnam, which is so lingering in its effect on our discussion of this issue.

I ask unanimous consent that the article I referred to be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. DENTON. Among these myths I referred to are the following: The view that the Sandinista military buildup and many of the repressive measures instituted by the Nicaraguan regime was caused by and was a reaction to U.S. aggression; the belief that the Sandinista government wants peace and is willing to engage in good faith negotiations; the belief that the Contras are thugs, thieves, and terrorists who routinely commit atrocities; the perception that the Sandinistas have improved the quality of life for many Nicaraguans—or would have if U.S. policy had not forced the Nicaraguan regime to divert significant resources to defense; the suspicion that humanitarian aid to the Nicaraguan refugees is a covert aid program for the Contras; and, last but not least, the conviction that the Sandinista regime is not Marxist-Leninist, nor totalitarian. I had thought, until Sunday, that this last myth had finally been laid to rest when a distinguished Member of this body was reported to have said that Marxist doctrine "does not dominate what is happening" in Nicaragua.

These are serious misstatements about the true reality of Nicaragua today. If they are left to stand, and if they are used to justify a compromise that comforts the Sandinistas while pretending to further the cause of freedom, peace, and prosperity in Nicaragua, I fear for the future of the Nicaraguan people, for the security of their neighbors, and for the vital interests of the United States.

I would like, therefore, to discuss a few of the misperceptions in order to set the record straight.

During a Sunday press conference, a Member of this body was reported to have repeated an idea that I have heard numerous times before. He stated that "every escalation by us has forced them—the Sandinistas—to look somewhere for assistance and aid. They want independence from the Soviet Union."

This notion depends upon two false assumptions. The first assumption is that the United States Government sought from the outset to destabilize the Nicaraguan Government of National Reconstruction, a coalition government that initially included not only the Sandinista National Liberation Front, the FSLN, but also representatives of broad sectors of Nicaraguan society. The second assumption is that the early Sandinista regime was benign, and that it was truly nonaligned and committed to the formation of a pluralist, democratic government. The evidence supports neither argument.

It is a matter of record that not only did the United States hasten and facilitate the fall of the Somoza regime through our decision to not resupply the dictatorship and our position taken in the Organization of American States in June 1979, but that we openly embraced the new government. The Congress, at the request of President Carter, allocated $120 million for Nicaragua during the first 1½ years of Sandinista rule, and it was largely through our efforts that the Sandinista government received all the funds that it needed from the various multilateral lending institutions.

If that were not enough, we sought to send teachers, doctors, and technical experts to help rebuild earthquake-hit and war-torn Nicaragua. About the Sandinista reaction to our generous overtures. Lawrence Harrison, our USAID Director in Nicaragua from 1979 to 1981, observed the following:

> During those two years [July 1979 to July 1981] the U.S. government was the most important source of food aid and one of the most important sources of financial aid to revolutionary Nicaragua . . . We had tried very hard to build that new relationship. But the effort failed principally, I believe, because the Sandinistas could not live with a positive image of the U.S. government. They did not try at all.

The United States, of course, did not discuss providing immediate military assistance to the Sandinistas. It did not appear necessary. The Sandinistas had inherited the arsenal of the fallen national guard and faced no external threat. They had come to power with the help of neighboring countries, which had provided sanctuary, arms, and both political and moral support to the FSLN.

The new regime did not even face an internal threat. In September 1979, a meeting of the Sandinista political cadre produced a report that included the finding that "at present there is no clear indication that an armed counterrevolution by Somozista forces beyond our borders is going to take place and jeopardize our stability." Nevertheless, 5 months later, in February 1980, Defense Minister Humberto Ortega announced the government's intention to build a 200,000-man militia "to defend the revolution" against "counterrevolutionaries."

Cuban military advisers were already well entrenched in Nicaragua, some of them having arrived in Managua on the very day the Sandinistas came to power. Within months, the Sandinistas had begun their military buildup, more than 2 years before any aid was provided to their opposition. Within weeks, they were shipping supplies and arms to the Marxist-Leninist Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front in El Salvador. Efforts to distabilize neighbors were not confined to El Salvador alone. Since coming to power, the Nicaraguan Government has also mounted clandestine operations against Honduras, Guatemala, and Costa Rica.

Alarmed by the developing trend, which included the first resignations by non-FSLN members of the Junta of National Reconstruction, President Carter suspended the disbursement of aid moneys to Nicaragua before leaving office.

Some critics of administration policy argue that Sandinista repression was brought about by U.S.-backed counterrevolutionary activity. To these people I point out that harrassment of independent labor unions began within hours of the Sandinista triumph. By August 1979, the labor organizations complained publicly; and, by December 1979, their headquarters and regional offices were being attacked and forcibly occupied by Sandinista troops. This was not a response to U.S. "aggression."

When Jorge Salazar, the President of the Superior Council of Private Enterprise, was murdered in November 1980, it was not a response to U.S. "aggression."

When the Sandinistas came to power they did so as a coalition government and in accordance with what became known as the fundamental statute of the republic. They provided for an executive, legislative, and judicial branch. The FSLN appropriated to itself the most powerful ministries and then failed to convene the legislature, the Council of State, until 10 months later. By that time, the junta had issued 392 decrees, one of which created 14 new seats in the Council of State. These were assigned to the FSLN, and the Sandinista party then had a 76-percent majority in the Council.

Alfonso Robelo, then a member of the junta and now a leader of the armed resistance, resigned in protest over the FSLN action.

In November 1979, the FSLN-directed junta created special courts to operate outside the regular judicial system that had been established by the fundamental statute. The FSLN controlled the appointment of judges. Military courts and agrarian courts were also established in 1980 and 1981. There was no appeal from the rulings of any of these courts. These actions to concentrate political authority in the hands of the FSLN were also not a response to U.S. "aggression."

Cuban teachers and advisors flooded into Nicaragua, including the Atlantic coast. They filled jobs previously held by Nicaraguans. When unemployment rose to unacceptable levels in Bluefields, and food rationing became intolerable, the black population organized a peaceful demonstration, in October 1980, to manifest their opposition to the Sandinistas' policies. The government responded by arresting 250 Creoles, including the five organizers. After being tortured, they were tried and sentenced on charges of counterrevolutionary activity. Was this a response to U.S. "aggression?"

Those represent only a few examples of the policies pursued by the Sandinista government in the early years of its revolution, and which caused many of its former supporters to flee and, in some cases, to consider the path of armed insurrection. In December 1981, when President Reagan made the difficult decision to provide limited assistance to the budding, but growing, insurgency in Nicaragua, the Sandinista regime was already fully engaged in establishing its military preeminence in Central America, destabilizing its neighbors, and revoking the civil liberties that had been guaranteed by the fundamental statute of the republic.

Since the President took that decision, the Congress has sought to second-guess him and pushed for alternative methods for dealing with the Sandinista government. Some Members of this body have argued that the Contras are unworthy of U.S. support and, despite the indisputable fact that thousands of Nicaraguan peasants are fleeing their homeland through Contra-held territory and thousands more are joining the armed resistance, they persist in accusing the Contra of unspeakable atrocities. At the same time, they turn a blind eye and deaf ear to the refugees' accounts of Sandinista brutality.

Let me share with you some excerpts from an unclassified Embassy cable, which relays to Washington information gleaned from the latest refugees to reach Honduras from Nicaragua's northern provinces. During interviews, when asked about reports of FDN complicity in noncombatant deaths and alleged atrocities, the refugee officer reports that "the variable response was 'that is a lie.' . . . Several refugees explained that the Sandinistas use propaganda like that to promote their point of view."

A deserter from the Sandinista Army reported that:

> It is categorically false that the FDN is killing civilians. We soldiers saw the destruction of the villages, of the campesinos, and how it was organized by the Sandinistas. When international groups, human rights groups, or others arrived, they would say that there had been a battle, and the Sandinista Army had defended the people. In fact, it was the EPS that had destroyed the villages, and they wanted to have a psychological advantage before the nations of the world.

A gray haired grandmother insisted that the FDN was fully respectful of noncombatants. When asked about reports that the FDN killed civilians, she said, "That is a lie. If you take a look, when the FDN goes through an area * * * they even purchase what they need."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the unclassified cable be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See Exhibit No.2.)

Mr. DENTON. A recent extended visit by two Brigham Young University students to refugee camps in Costa Rica and Honduras yielded similar results, which they have published. I shall ask unanimous consent that a copy of their report also appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. Their interviews, however, also provide a picture—not so different from that presented by the Permanent Commission on Human Rights in Nicaragua—of Sandinista human rights violations, which conflicts with the picture painted by Americas Watch and by the Brody report, the latter the subject of today's Wall Street Journal article.

The Brody report is noteworthy because it was the brainchild of Reichler and Applebaum, the law firm that represents the Sandinista government here in the United States, because its authors were given material support and transportation by the Sandinistas during their stay in Nicaragua; and because they admitted that local officials and health workers, more than likely party members in good standing or Sandinista sympathizers, were a primary aid in helping to locate witnesses to alleged Contra atrocities.

The result was a conclusion that the Contras regularly and systematically violate human rights. To date, I have determined that at least three, perhaps four, incidents mentioned in the Brody report were not accurately characterized. The most blatant example was the Brody report's description of the December 1983 exodus of 2,000 Miskitos to Honduras as a massive kidnaping by MISURA, an Indian Contra force. That event was widely reported in the press, the American-born priests who voluntarily accompanied the flight asserted that the departure was voluntary, and an independent journalist who filmed the entire exodus says the Francia Sirpe residents were packed and ready to go with the MISURA forces when they arrived.

I urge my colleagues to talk with leaders or members of the Nicaraguan armed resistance. I am convinced that you will find them worthy of U.S. support and committed to ideals that are similar to those found in our own Constitution. The FDN, ARDE, MISURA, and MISURASATA are not reactionary organizations and are not engaged in an effort to replace the Sandinista revolution with Somozismo.

Each fighter with the FDN is given a pocket-size "Blue and White Book," which outlines the principles upon which its struggle is based. I quote for a moment from that book:

> Democracy is the true power of the people to elect and be elected. And it only exists when periodic elections, free and universal are practiced. Social justice is the goal of any process of democratization in the free world, because political democracy is the basis of economic democracy,

And finally,

> FDN means enforcement of human rights: above all, man, and the respect for human rights, because where man is not respected as an individual being man is not respected either as a social being.

I ask unanimous consent that a translation of the FDN's "Blue and White Book" appear in the RECORD following my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. DENTON. I conclude my remarks with a few observations about the myth that the Sandinistas are willing to enter into good-faith negotiations for peace.

Over the weekend, Daniel Ortega suggested that Nicaragua could only find peace if the Reagan administration halts "terrorist aggression" by U.S.-backed insurgents and resumes direct negotiations with Managua. Given the confusion that is the result of much of the media reporting on Nicaragua, it may not be readily apparent to the Congress or the American public, but the United States has not provided assistance to the Contras in almost a year. In May 1984, because of a stalemate between the House and the Senate, the Congress approved no funds for the anti-Sandinista forces. The $14 million that was approved in October and which is the subject of today's debate could not be spent.

Under Congressional pressure, the U.S. Government has met Sandinista demands. We have sent no money or material support to the Contras, and we entered into direct bilateral negotiations at Manzanillo. I submit to you that these actions led to no improvement for the people of Nicaragua, nor did they produce a reduction in Nicaraguan efforts to extend Communist influence and control in Central America.

Harassment of the Catholic Church and other religious groups has increased, particularly since the fraudulent November election to ratify and consolidate FSLN political authority. Between September and October 1984, a Catholic father was framed by State Security and arrested on charges of counterrevolutionary activity. Shortly thereafter, 10 foreign-born priests were expelled from the country. These priests worked under Archbishop Obando y Bravo in Managua and were particularly effective in helping the poor and the youth.

Shortly after the November elections, a document slipped through the censors and was published in La Prensa, perhaps a deliberate slip to spread intimidation. The document directed the civil defense committees to begin compiling the following information on religious groups: Location of chapels, religious denomination of the congregation, names and addresses of leaders, description of cars and other means of transportation used by leaders, evaluation of political attitudes of leaders, description of personal habits or vices of leaders, description of the size and nature of religious gatherings, license numbers and descriptions of cars of people attending services from outside the neighborhood, and the source of funding for the church.

Between January and March 1985, Felix Rosales, director of the Nicaraguan National Council of Evangelical Pastors, and Jimmy Hassan, the head of Campus Crusade in Nicaragua, were both summoned to appear before the Managua Regional Committee of the Sandinista Revolution, which is chaired by Interior Minister Tomas Borge. They were required to respond to charges of counterrevolutionary activities.

La Prensa has continued to face heavy censorship, and its reporters and some Costa Rican journalists have been arrested and detained.

On Christmas Eve 1984, Sandinista State Security invaded the Costa Rican Embassy to regain custody of Manuel Urbina Lara, a young law student who had sought asylum there. Thousands of young men are fleeing the country to evade the draft. There are reports that the Sandinista government harasses and even arrests relatives of such draft evaders.

In the Atlantic coast, reports filter out that the Sandinista military has, without provocation, attacked villages. Indian survivors are rounded up and forcibly relocated to new military relocation camps. Six villages were attacked in January, others in February.

New foreign travel restrictions have been imposed. State Department officials have advised me that the Sandinista government requires travelers to obtain an exit permit. Airline tickets must be paid for in dollars, and must be for round trips. An additional tax is levied, which also must be paid in dollars. The government also limits to $500 the amount of foreign currency that a Nicaraguan national can possess. Taken together, those measures make foreign travel prohibitively expensive for almost everyone.

The Sandinista government has categorically rejected dialog with the anti-Sandinista forces, despite the Contras repeated offers to enter a cease-fire agreement. Unlike the FMLN in El Salvador, power sharing has not been a demand of the Nicaraguan fighters. Dialog and national reconciliation have been urged by all parties: The Catholic Church and the internal political opposition. The Sandinista government consistently refuses.

Now the Sandinista military has begun the massive relocation of thousands of peasants from the northern provinces. The number to be relocated is projected to reach as high as 50,000. A journalist who has interviewed many of those peasants, who have been forced off their land, was told by the people that the Sandinista military had ordered them out and threatened them. They were told the vicinity would be "burned with aircraft."

These relocations are now public knowledge, but what has not yet been reported is that many of these same peasants have refused to be relocated to Sandinista-controlled collectives. They remain hidden in the hills, people displaced not by Contra activity but by government edict.

There is speculation that one reason for the relocations is that the Sandinista government is creating a free-fire zone in which it can use its MI-24 helicopters and other weapons to wipe out the Contras. If this is the case, I fear that, when the Sandinista offensive begins, there will be many innocent civilian deaths. The Sandinistas will claim that the peasants were Contras, when, in fact, all they really were were campesinos who chose to stay near their homes rather than submit to tyranny.

The future of the peasants and other Nicaraguans like them, the future of the refugees in Honduras and Costa Rica, and the future of the Contras forces who are willing to bear arms to resist the Soviet-style tyranny of the 9 Commandantes in Managua are in our hands. I urge all of my colleagues to support aid for the Contras, and to do so without imposing the kind of limitations and requirements that will only extend aid and comfort to the repressive Sandinista government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an interview with 4 of the 10 priests who were expelled from Nicaragua appear in the RECORD following my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 4.)

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the report I referred to earlier be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NICARAGUA

(A report by Wesley R. Smith and Richard H. Rygg)

INFORMATION ON THOSE CONDUCTING REPORT

Wesley Smith and Richard Rygg conducted the interviews presented in this report. They speak fluent Spanish and each has experience working with farmers and peasants in Latin America. The Nicaraguan refugee populations in Costa Rica and Honduras are largely comprised of farmers and peasants.

Wesley Smith is a 23 year old senior studying International Relations at Brigham Young University. He served as a missionary to Spanish speaking people in Argentina and Arizona.

From 1 May 1984 to 15 July 1984 Wes worked as an intern in Costa Rica for the newspaper La Nacion Internacional. The interviews appearing in this report from Costa Rica were conducted by him at this time. He was in Nicaragua from 14 Dec 1984 to 13 January 1985 interviewing.

Richard Rygg is 28 years old and will receive his M.B.A. from Pennsylvania State University in June 1985. He served as a missionary in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Honduras from 1977-79. His work involved extensive interaction with the Nicaraguan peasantry and middle class.

Both of these students visited Honduras from March 4 to March 15. While there they visited the refugee areas of Teupasenti, Roos Roos, Danli, El Paraiso, Jacaleapa, El Triunfo, and Choluteca. They funded their own trip to Honduras.

INTRODUCTION

This report emanates from a compilation of interviews conducted in Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Honduras during 1984-1985. During this time period over 250 Nicaraguans, inside as well as outside Nicaragua, were interviewed. The few interviews and stories selected for this report are representative of the majority of the people we spoke with during our visits.

We did not go to Central America looking specifically for evidence in support of one side or the other. Rather, we wanted to speak with individuals that represented that majority which wears neither the Sandinista nor the Contra uniform. Our main purpose was to find out what the Nicaraguan people had experienced and why so many people were fleeing their country.

Those people interviewed within the refugee camps were randomly selected to insure a representative statistic of all the refugees within those camps. In speaking with the Nicaraguan people we worked in conjunction with no one else—no ecclesiastical authorities, government agencies, human rights organizations, or international groups. This unobtrusive approach allowed us access to information which, according to those refugees interviewed, generally is not expressed by them.

In publishing this report we are not endorsing either side of the conflict. The stories, feelings, and opinions of the Nicaraguans represented here are not in favor of the Sandinistas. However, this is not a deliberate attempt by us to show only one side of the story. In this report we have simply compiled the stores of the Nicaraguan people that represent the groups we talked with.

We were asked by most of the people we spoke with not to reveal their names for fear of reprisal. Therefore we have substituted most names, but we will be glad to furnish the real names to responsible reporters who will not jeopardize these people's safety. They took us into their confidence and we are obligated to respect their wishes.

(Note: The questions of International Law are not examined in this report although we address the abuses which have arisen because of the internal conflict in Nicaragua between the Sandinistas and the Contras.)

FINDINGS

Contras

We found no evidence of any systematic abuses conducted by the contras from the people we interviewed. This would include the Nicaragua Democratic Force (FDN), as well as the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE) and the Sandinista Revolutionary Front (FRS) in the South. We do not deny that abuses have taken place by these forces. In a war-like situation which exists in Nicaragua there have been abuses on both sides. However, what we were looking for was a policy or systematic practice of human rights abuses by either the Contras or the Sandinistas. We have no evidence on the Misura nor the Misurasata because there was not enough time in those areas to investigate the truthfulness of the reports received.

In interviewing refugees, many of which were inside Sandinista controlled areas like Managua, Matagalpa, and Leon, Wes could find no specific incidents of Contra atrocities. He did interview with Sandinistas involved in the conflict. They told him of contra atrocities in general but did not supply any specific instances or relate any personal experiences.

The refugees interviewed mentioned some civilians were killed as Sandinista and Contra forces fought in the mountains. No accusations were received which spoke of Contra forces intentionally killing, torturing, or raping civilians or Sandinista war prisoners. In fact, almost the opposite was true. Of those Nicaraguans who spoke of civilians being killed, nearly all mentioned that only the Sandinistas were participating in such activities—indiscriminate bombing, shooting, torture, etc.

The Nicaraguans interviewed said their attitudes toward the contra forces had changed during the last 2 years. According to statements, the towns in which they lived did not support or sympathize with the Contra movements in 1981–82. Although no specific reasons were given they referred to the contras as rebels and most said they had been indifferent to their existence during this early period.

However, those interviewed said their feelings toward the contras changed and they now sympathized with the Contra movement. They mentioned how after 1982 the contras stopped their abusive tactics. In addition, they explained that the Sandinista policy of land reform, especially among the peasants, religious persecution, and repression of those who did not support the Sandinista process, were factors causing them to now sympathize with the Contras. One young boy told us that, "the contras had problems before because they robbed a lot and killed people. Now they're part of the people."

About 20 percent interviewed felt that they had been caught in a cross fire between Sandinistas and Contras and had not sided with either one. These people said they began sympathizing with the Contras when the Sandinista policies became too repressive for them.

While in Nicaragua Wes interviewed several Sandinistas including those from the Juventud Sandinista 19 de Julio. Their feelings about the conflict were generally the same. One Sandinista Youth leader in Leon was interviewed and although she mentioned no specific cases, her feelings represent those of other Sandinistas interviewed in Managua, Matagalpa, and Leon.

We know about the aggression of the United States and of President Ronald Reagan. The mercenaries (contras), we know that they come, not only to make money but to burn farms, schools, and kidnap peasants. Over 70 percent of the youth are involved in Sandinista organizations. The Contras are ex[Somozo] guards.

Sandinistas

Evidence gathered during these three visits points to a systematic process of human rights abuses conducted by the Sandinista government against the Nicaraguan people including those who have taken up armed resistance against the Sandinista government. The abuses reported to us or witnessed by us personally, fall under the following categories.

Forced recruitment of Nicaraguan youth by the Sandinista military.

Religious persecution.

Indiscriminate shelling of villages.

Mistreatment of prisoners.

Forced Volunteerism in the co-op system.

Repression of the opposition.

FORCED MILITARY RECRUITMENT

In the last six months forced recruitment of youths by the military has increased dramatically. We received numerous accounts of young men being forcefully taken from their homes, local theatres, discotheques and parks. These stories were from eyewitness accounts and from young boys who had been taken but released or who deserted. Some boys as young as 14 have been taken by the military.

While in Nicaragua Wes witnessed one such incident in the town of Nagarote. He arrived at the town at about 11 a.m. Two young girls snuck him through some back roads. While there he spoke to 15 people who related their story to him and saw 10 people who had been beaten by the military. One man received a severe gash. A "mobster" wearing a military uniform had entered his home, and struck him with the end of a hoe.

A 14 year old girl, Eliana Mejilla, described to Wes what had happened earlier that morning:

At 6:30 a.m. on 27 December 1984 the Sandinista military arrived on the outskirts of town. They came in 2 IFA troop transports and about 15 jeep with the yellow triangle insignia "Prevencion" sprayed on the side. When they started rounding up the young boys from the streets and the parks the people organized themselves. The Catholic father sounded the church bells and the people built barricades on the streets leading into the center of town.

The Sandinista soldiers beat those families members who resisted the military when they forced themselves into the homes. After the barricades were broken down the military sent in two IFA trucks. Half of the mobsters in those trucks were military soldiers who laid down their weapons outside the town and had replaced them with clubs. Only three boys had been taken but 47 adults were taken prisoners for "counterrevolutionary" activities. The people who resisted the military were not armed contras but strictly civilians. Around 40 people received injuries from being struck by the military soliders. That night the mobs returned in two IFA military trucks, broke into a house facing the TelCor office and burned a jeep."

While in Honduras we spoke to a group of 35 Nicaraguan youth who had come across the border several weeks before. They said they had fled Nicaragua because of the military draft. Several had already served in the Sandinista military and had deserted, while others had gone into hiding inside Nicaragua to avoid the military draft. Many of these youth had been imprisoned for not joining the servicio patriotico [patriotic service].

Andres Cornejo was inscripted into the military on 15 January 1985 and deserted one month later. He describes the treatment while in the military.

"The Sandinistas grabbed me on 15 January 1985. I was in the training camp called San Gabriel. While there we [those inscripted] were constantly threatened by our Cuban advisers that if we tried to desert there was a good chance we might get 'shot" or thrown in prison or be taken to the most dangerous zones where there was no escape. I was there for one month and then was transferred to the base called Oscar Curos. From there I deserted and came across the border."

(Note: All those interviewed who had been imprisoned or served in the military spoke of Cuban advisors which worked in the prisons and within the military system. In asking these Nicaraguans how they knew they were Cubans they gave similar reports: the accent; phrases such as "tu chico"; their mannerisms; and even the type of cigarettes they smoke; etc. One Nicaraguan who spent 16 months in prison told me, "we as Nicaraguans know our own people and we have seen enough Cubans to know who they are and how they act.")

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION

The groups most hard hit by systematic persecution of religion in the northern regions of the country are the Pentacostals and Evangelicals. According to their reports their practice of individuality and belief in God has created friction between them and the government.

A peasant living in the northern zone of San Jose described the religious persecution he received from the Sandinistas.

"I have been serving God for 7 years in the Pentacostal church, Assembly of God. I was preaching in the fields and was persecuted. I have been imprisoned three times for preaching the gospel. I don't know what it is like to take up arms but when they had me they threatened to kill me if I didn't join the military. You were forced to take arms and this pressure happened all over the zone where I lived. In that area they gave me 8 days to decide whether to fight or "disappear. We didn't have any other choice but to flee. We were in the mountains for 18 days before arriving in Honduras."

Two other families that fled with him across the border were in the same camp and substantiated the story he gave.

Lidia Herrera and her two children Maritza and Jose Alberto, were victims of a Sandinista attack during a prayer meeting on 7 February 1985.

The following is their story:

"We were praying during a religious meeting when we heard bullet shots from outside. When we heard the shots we continued praying and then a member of the Sandinista military entered the house and told us to stay inside or we would be shot. The Sandinista then left the house and we continued praying and heard a rain of bullets. When we looked around seven people were dead and three were wounded. One of the dead was my son Jose Alberto. He had been hit in the face with bullets. The Contras hadn't been in that area that day. In fact we hadn't seen them for a long time.

Those peasants not willing to take up arms are branded as counterrevolutionaries. Many peasants testified that they had been imprisoned and tortured for their religious beliefs. Gerrardo Bustomonte also received perscution by the Sandinistas for his religious beliefs.

The Sandinistas had called me into the prison and then they accused me of working with the counterrevolution. They asked me how I could preach the "message" and be a counterrevolutionary since Christ himself was a revolutionary. They told me I was going to tell them the truth. They put a .45 pistol here [motioning to the temple] and said, "you are going to tell us the truth that you are a contra and that you collaborate with the contra. You're a contra because you won't take up arms.

He then hit me in the chest and let me free. Before I left he told me that if he caught me working the counterrevolution he would eliminate me. He then said that according to them the counterrevolution was preaching the Word of God. Even if you don't have any arms they accuse you of being a contra if you're not willing to take up arms.

MISTREATMENT OF PRISONERS

It should be noted that many of the prisons in Nicaragua are clandestine and known only to those who have experienced them. They are nick-named by the Nicaraguan prisoners that know of them. The prison names used in this report are those mentioned repeatedly by the Nicaraguan people interviewed.

The prison system in Nicaragua is supplied by the Judicial system which is run by the Sandinista party. Those who have been imprisoned speak of tortures and abuses of human rights. While in prison they receive insufficient clothing, food, and medical attention.

In many instances prisoners, over 90 percent of whom are peasant farmers, were forced to make confessions, then tried and sentenced because of these confessions.

The following are torture methods used on prisoners.

Water is dropped on their heads for days at a time.

Light deprivation.

Interrogations in the middle of the night.

Beatings with sticks wrapped in wet towels.

Guards using boxing gloves repeatedly beat prisoners.

Sleep deprivation.

In the northern provinces prisoners are put in tubs of cold water for extended periods of time.

Hanging by the wrists.

Isolation from any human contact.

Forcing prisoners into cells where they cannot sit down or stand up completely. There were repeated testimonies of this occuring in the Department of Chontales, City of Juigalpa.

THE PERMANENT COMMISSION OF HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA. (CPDH)

The CPDH receives testimonies from people who were imprisoned and then set free or had finished their sentencing. It estimates it only receives 10 percent of the total incidences of human rights violations. In order for the CPDH to process accusations the victims must supply names and residences. Because of fear of retribution people are afraid to give this information.

Wes conducted several interviews in December 1984 and January 1985 with Lino Hernandez, one of the directors of the CPDH.

From testimonies and evidence gathered, the CPDH estimates that over 95 percent of those convicted by the Popular Anti-Somoza Tribunals were convicted by accusations against themselves while in State Security prisons. Of that 95 percent nearly all have been tortured into accusing themselves. On the average, those accused spend more than 6 months in prison before coming before the Tribunals. Those brought before the Tribunals are condemned by evidence gathered in three ways.

1. Confessions of prisoners against themselves while in State Security cells.

2. Confessions of prisoners against other prisoners.

3. Testimony of State Security guards who heard prisoners confessions during interrogations.

In the majority of the cases the peasants were accused of giving food or logistical aid to the contras. The following is part of an interview with Lino Hernandez of the CPDH in January 1985.

In principal every person that arrives at the State Security prisons is declared guilty. They have a method for each person. We have received testimonies of tortures that don't leave marks or scars. While in State Security they are subject to isolation in dark cells without any light. They are not given food either. We have received information that they use both physical and psychological torture.

Wes interviewed Ramon Melendez in Managua, January 1985. Wes was referred to him by the CPDH. Ramon was released from prison in November 1984. He spent 17 months in prison. He was accused of counterrevolutionary activities. His story follows.

I was sleeping in my house at 5 a.m. when eight guys arrived with machine guns. They pushed the doorbell and the maid let them in. They took me to the State Security [behind the Hotel Intercontinental] and placed me in cell number 18. I entered the cell and you couldn't see anything. There was only light when they opened the door to interrogate me. I spent 96 days in that cell. I got a skin fungus on my feet and all my hair fell out, because in the interrogations the Sandinista grabbed me by the hair and told me "you're going to talk or else", and when he did this the hair stayed in his hand.

After being imprisoned for five days they showed me my wife at the other end of the hall wearing a prisoners uniform. They quickly put me back into the cell and from that day on they told me that my wife was dying. I heard my wife saying "my love, I can't stand it anymore. I'm dying. My children". It must have been a tape recorder or another woman because my wife was only in jail for one day but they made me believe she was in jail permanently. In my cell I could only imagine the days passing, because in there I didn't know it if was night or day.

Ramon spent 3 months in solitary confinement and six months in a cell with other prisoners. While in El Chipote they told him if he signed a confession his wife would be released. State Security then condemned him with his own accusation. He was given 7 years imprisonment at his first trial, but the appellate court raised it to 15 years. The Sandinistas said he deserved the extra 8 years for complaining to the human rights commission that they, the Saninistas, were torturing him. He was later transferred to the prison called "Zona Franca" near the Managua International Airport. He said there were over 80 political prisoners in the "Zona Franca" and he estimated thousands are being held in other clandestine prisons within the country. He spoke with hundreds of prisoners that had been transferred from outlying areas into the Zona Franca.

Several defense lawyers that were interviewed in Managua also estimate there are thousands of unaccounted for Nicaraguans who have become victims of the clandestine prison system in Nicaragua.

Rogelio Benavides is 33 years old, from Ocotal, Santa Clara. He describes his treatment while in prison. He was accused of hiding arms for the counterrevolutionaries.

On 20 March 1984 they took me from my house in Santa Clara at midnight and took me to Ocotal. I was in prison for three months. They investigated [interrogated] us. At night they bathed [soaked] us with cold water. For eight hours we had to stand up soaking wet. They stuck us in [the water] and soaked us and then investigated [interrogated] us. It was painful and we always got out trembling. We were many. They did it the first time to interrogate us. The interrogater asked us where we had the arms. They made me take off my shirt, pants and underwear. The next day they stuck us in again. I left the prison with pneumonia.

Pedro Ruiz Alfaro left Nicaragua on 16 January 1985 with this wife and two children. He spent 1 year in Esteli in a prison called "La Barranca" from July 1983-84. The Sandinistas then transferred him to Chinandega where he was kept in "El Penal" and released him four months later in November 1984.

I was accused of hiding arms for the counterrevolutionaries inside my house. They brought me before the Anti-Somoza tribunals in Esteli. I had several witnesses which defended me but it didn't matter because they had their frogs [informants] from the CDS [Sandinista Defense Committee] which accused me. The two CDS members were Amado Arados and Dela Segovia. They searched the house and found nothing, but they accused me anyway.

While in prison several Cuban and Nicaraguan guards tortured me. After being there for two weeks they injected me two times with a yellow fluid. With these injections I felt like running, yelling and crying. I laid on the floor and trembled. They placed a small tape recorder next to my mouth but didn't ask me any questions. The next day they gave me a second injection much more powerful than the first. They interrogated me around 20 to 30 times. The Cubans would put a pistol to your head called a "Macaron" until you confessed you were a contra. While I was transferred to Chinandega they treated me with more consideration.

The CPDH has investigated several reports of prisoners shot while trying to "escape". These investigations have shown that many of these prisoners were tortured before they were killed. Similar reports obtained during our investigations substantiate these claims. The following story was provided by the CPDH:

Jose Esteban Lazo Morales (correct name), 39 years old is from Chontales. He was captured 14 November 1983 in San Pedro de Lovago and was taken to the State Security prison in Juigalpa. Four days later he was taken to his home in a coffin which had been sealed with screws. They told the family that they couldn't open the coffin because it would be a health hazard and they would have to bury him immediately at sunrise.

When State Security left, the family opened the coffin. Jose had a fractured nose, and bruises covering his face. His head and ears were bleeding, his ribs were broken and his genitals were badly bruised. He had been knifed in the back many times which left marks in the shape of a half moon. When State Security found out the family had opened the coffin, they sent a forensic doctor to check him out. He diagnosed Jose as having died of a heart attack. They told the Sandinistas that he was bruised on the forehead after falling while showering. And that his nose was fractured because he had fainted and fallen on his face.

Felipe Hidalgo was in prison from March 1982 to September 1982. He told us the following story.

I first spent two nights in the prison in Jalapa. I was then in Ocotal for 15 days and from there transferred to La Barranca in Esteli for 45 days. The last four months I spent time in a prison in Esteli called "19 de Julio". In Jalapa they hung me over an open sewer because I didn't obey them. There were eleven of us there. All 11 were transferred from Jalapa to Ocotal in the middle of the night. While in route, three of the prisoners were taken out and carried down to the side of the road. The first one lowered from the truck was Eduardo Herra Bustamante. I knew him because he was from a small town near Limon. The next one lowered from the truck was a photographer from Jalapa named Fidel Gabona. He already had a broken arm from before. The third one was Eriberto Gonzalez. He was from the aldea called Santa Barbara.

Felipe said he learned that these three had been killed because when he was released from prison shortly after his prison transfer his family told him that the Sandinistas said the three had been found in the mountains with their throats slit. Family members said the Sandinistas had blamed the Contras for the massacre. He said the story had been written up in La Barricada as a contra massacre.

Pedro Ruiz Alfaro (see story above) is from Esteli and left Nicaragua 16 January 1985. From July 83 to July 84 he was in "La Barranca" prison in Esteli. From there he was transferred to El Penal in Chinandego and was released in November 1984. The following is his story.

Two weeks after leaving prison in Chinandega I started to work driving a sand truck with two other helpers on the road that leads out of Macuelizo. When we arrived at the river near Macuelizo we left the truck and started searching for sand down by the river. While there we ran across a shallow grave, what we call on aguacera. To us an aguacera is where they kill people. In this aguacera were two men I knew from San Fernando. We calculate there were from 50 to 60 bodies but I could identify only two. I recognized the two because their faces where only bloated. The rest I didn't recognize because their faces were all bruised. They had been with me in La Barranca. The Sandinistas took me out [to Chinandega] but these two men stayed. After I saw them dead I returned and told the families of the dead men. They said they had gone to the Barranca only a few days earlier and the Sandinistas told the families they were no longer there in prison.

Ismael Herrera, a 55 year old farmer from Mora, Nueva Segovia left Nicaragua 5 November 1983. He was imprisoned in April 1983 in the prison La Barranca.

They put me in jail because one of my sons had joined the counterrevolutionary forces. They put me in a small cell and all I could see was darkness—no light. It felt like you were being hit in the heart every time they came by to take you out of the cell. You feared, because you thought they would take you out to kill you. I know they killed some because they would investigate [interrogate] people at midnight and some never returned. They grabbed me by the hair and put a knife in my throat and an AK in my kidneys and kicked me. They did this so I would say I had been helping the contras. If I had told them that, they would have killed me.

In addition to the mistreatment of civilian prisoners many refugees and people still living in Nicaragua reported incidents of mistreatment of contra prisoners and Sandinista deserters.

A nurse stationed in a Zone called "La Guinea" described an incident with a contra prisoner. She was in a place called "La Fonseca" near Verdun in September 1983 when this occurred.

I was stationed in this town in the health center when one day the [the Sandinistas] captured a contra boy up in the mountains. They brought him into town behind a horse. The boy was wearing a blue outfit and didn't have any shoes on. He was blindfolded and had his hands tied behind his back.

They took him to the town square where I was stationed at the health center. There, the Sandinistas shot off their AK 47's and when they did that the horse took off running. The boy was tied to the horse and it drug him away—tied and bound. The rope then hit a rock and tore. The boy just laid there on the ground badly beaten. They then took the boy and tied him onto a horse that had arms and took him out of the town. The whole town saw this happen.

Luiz Payan is a 37 year old farmer from Jicaro. He witnessed a similar treatment in his home town in November 1983.

They captured a commander there in Jicaro. He was the one they tortured after he was dead. They spit on his face and stabbed him with a bayonet. They paraded him around the city tied to the fender of their car. The whole town saw it and they almost made me go out and trample on the commando myself. This happened at about 9 a.m. and they called all the people out into the plaza and told us this is what would happen to people who fought against the Sandinistas.

INDISCRIMINATE IMPRISONMENT

Testimonies received in Costa Rica, Honduras and Nicaragua indicate a policy of indiscriminate imprisonment and detainment by the Sandinistas State Security forces.

In the last half of 1984 forced military recruitment increased rapidly. With this conscription came an increase in indiscriminate imprisonment and detainment of youth which appeared to be within the qualified age limit. While in Managua Wes spoke with youth who had been detained by the military longer than 24 hours. In many instances family members don't know the location of there children until they are released.

Salomon Calvo Arrieta is a lawyer in Managua and worked as correspondent for the Costa Rican radio "Impacto". While in Nicaragua Wes investigated the case of his imprisonment thoroughly.

"Salomon was imprisoned 29 December 1984. Two days before his imprisonment he broadcast information about the insurrection in Nagarote which occurred on 27 December 1984. He was taken from his home at 8 p.m. and carried to the military complex called "El Chipote". For the first three days his wife attempted to visit her husband and find the reason for his imprisonment. She was told they weren't sure what law he had exactly broken but it had something to do with "counterrevolutionary" activities. His wife and Wes visited him in prison on 5 January 1985. He was still incommunicado and the authorities would not permit the visit. They accused him of supplying false information about the insurrection in Nagarote—saying that the insurrection hadn't occurred when it actually had. When the international press received the Nagarote story the State Security then accused Salomon of paying money to Manuel Urbina to exile himself in the Costa Rican Embassy in Managua."

INDISCRIMINATE SHELLING OF VILLAGES

Refugees not involved in the conflict but living within the war zones have come under repeated attacks by the Sandinistas. The Sandinistas indiscriminatly use artillery against civilian population areas in the Segovias mountain region and have done so along the southern border as well.

Since July 1984 to as late as February 1985 the area around and including "Los Harrados" has come under heavy artillery fire at least 5 times. In the first week in January 1985 a man, Donald Lario, was killed when a morter fell on his house. The accounts of Sandinista bombing and mortering of civilian areas were taken from eight different people in three different refugee camps. Their stories coincide with each other on the shelling incidents although the number of bombings reported ranged from 5 to 7. One specific bombardment was reported by Cristina Mariana Reyes. She left her home in Los Harrados near Monsonte, Department of Nueva Segovia on 21 February 1985.

"My own people have been bombed five times in our community. They say the Contras are living there but that is not true. It is true they have passed by our way before but, it has been months since they did that. My nephew was killed in December when a mortar fell through his house. They mortared us from the town of Monsonte. The people protested but they would not listen to us. On my way to Ocotal saw the cannons from where they fired at us."

In August 1984 in an area near "Los Harrados" the Sandinistas bombarded several areas from their bases in "Plan de Gramma" and a place called "La Joba". Ramos Portocarrero Sirias is from Jinotega, residence of Laguna Verde, Jurisdiction of Wiwili. He left Nicaragua in October 1984 after his community was mortered by the Sandinistas. His story was supported by 3 other refugees not related to him.

We are talking about a bombing which happened in August 1984 that left the valley all burned. We know it was the Sandinistas because we, the peasants, are united and we communicate to one another. We know where the Sandinistas are and what they're doing. The place [where they bombed] is called Laguna Verde and about 6 or 7 powerful grenades were thrown. They have a high powered rocket launcher, morters and cannons. The bombs came from "La Joba", a place close to Wiwili in Jinotego. There are about 20 houses there and they are pretty spread out. In Plan de Gramma they [the Sandinistas] have a base and they also mortered from that area. It is located about 4 kilometers from Laguna Verde.

Felix Monteguello is from Laguna Verde and left that community in November, 1984. He fled because one of the shells dropped on his ranch and burned it. His ranch was located in El Triunfo, an area close to Laguna Verde. His story supported the testimony given by Alejandro Jordian Bucardo.

REPRESSION OF THE OPPOSITION

Many of the interviewed said they had been accused of counterevolutionary activities simply because they didn't support the Sandinista political process. This would include absence from CDS meetings, weekly vigilance duty, absence from participating in the cotton and coffee harvest and from attending revolutionary rallies. Those involved in political and civic opposition groups have come under increased persecution by the "divine mobs" and paramilitary groups supported by Sandinistas.

Guadalupe Castellanos is from the town of Dipilto, Nueva Segovia. [She permitted the release of her real name since she no longer has any family in Nicaragua.] She left Nicaragua in April 1984 after recovering from grenade wounds to her back and arm.

I went to church a few days before Christmas in 1983 and there was a State Security men named Manuel Martinez who was there preaching to us. He said we had to have a bible in one hand and a rifle in the other so that the revolution would be successful. I had an argument with him and then went to cut coffee with my two children.

They came with me because as poor people one needs to work hard for a living and they were small so they accompanied me. We were let off work at midday since the next day was December 24. I stayed to gather big leaves at the bottom of the gulley so I could make a Christmas decoration for my children. While in the gulley I ran into some Piri who were still there guarding the coffee fields. They started harassing me and tried to grab me but I ran away from them for a short distance. They then caught up to me and started beating me. I told my two children to run up the mountain and catch up with the other group of coffee pickers that had already left.

After the Sandinistas beat me they left me there and went off a little way. Maybe they thought I was dead or they were just waiting to see if my sons would return to help me. I'm not sure, but what I am sure of is that I got up and started running up the hill to reach my children. I caught up with them and then passed them because I knew which way we needed to go. I turned around to see if they were still following us and yes, they were behind us.

Just as we were getting to the top of the hill a grenade exploded in the middle of us. We all fell on our faces and when I turned around I could tell my 6 year old boy, Luis Alonso was dead. The crown of his head had been cut right off and it was laying there a few feet from his body. It was a clean cut because you could see the bone of his skull. My 12 year old son Misael had been hit in the ear and I tried to help him up but he couldn't hold out his arms. He had a shrapnel wound in his back and it looked like the shrapnel had severed his [spinal] column. He told us to pray and then he told me to return and get some help. I left them together and was taken to the hospital. We weren't allowed to return for six days. When we returned six days later both of them were dead but the older boy must have lived several days because his body was fresh compared to Alonso's body.

In the first interview Guadalupe Castellanos said the Sandinistas had prohibited the people in her hometown from returning to the area where the grenade exploded. In her second interview she only mentioned that they did not locate the bodies until the sixth day but another independent witness testified that the Sandinistas had not permitted them to return and look for the bodies. The 12 year old, Misael was still alive when she left them. Guadalupe received two shrapnel wounds—one in her back and the other in her right elbow.

In responding to questions about how she knew it was the Sandinistas and not the Contras or a land mine she stated:

It was a grenade because all the other people that were cutting coffee had passed through that same path and nothing had happened to them. You see, this isn't something invented or made up but is a reality because if my companions had passed by there and nothing happened to them, how was something going to happen to me. They had gone ahead of me and I was the last one to go up the path so there had been nothing in the path. The Sandinsta were the ones following us and the contras weren't anywhere around so it would have to have been them.

Guadalupe's story was supported by almost undeniable evidence. Wes interviewed her on March 9 at about 11 a.m. That same day Wes interviewed a different group of 20 Nicaraguans in a different refugee camp that had arrived from the border only two hours before. Within this group was a 60 year old lady named Juana Maldonado de Castellano. When she mentioned she was from Dipilto Wes asked her if she remembered about anything that happened in her town two Christmases ago. She then responded,

You must be talking about Guadalupe Castellanos. Her two sons were killed that Christmas when the Sandinistas threw a hand grenade at them. We [the people] weren't allowed to go look for the bodies out by the coffee fields for six days because the Sandinistas prohibited it. A piece of shrapnel had severed the young boy's [spinal] column and he died hugging his younger brother because that is the way we found them, except the younger boy was decomposed.

PERSECUTION OF POLITICAL OPPOSITION

Repression of Civic opposition groups has been extensive within Nicaragua since the revolution. Political dissension, especially among the youth, is not tolerated by the Sandinistas. Aside from the majority of those youth interviewed who fled to avoid the military draft, there were many who belonged to civil opposition groups inside Nicaragua. These Nicaraguan youth testify they were persecuted for their political divergence from the Sandinista revolutionary process.

While in Nicaragua Wes interviewed Manuel Urbina Lara's brothers. Manuel Urbina was the Nicaraguan youth who had exiled himself in the Costa Rican Embassy in Managua. On 24 December 1985 he was forcefully taken out of the Embassy by Sandinista State Security. There are conflicting reports as to what actually happened at the Embassy compound on 24 December.

Wes had an interview with the Costa Rican Ambassador a week after the incident. The Ambassador emphatically stated that Urbina must have been forced to leave the Embassy. Manuel Urbina's two brothers—one is named Luis Corronado Urbina Lara—were interviewed in the first week in December. Their version of Manuel's exile in the Costa Rican Embassy is different from the Sandinistas.

Manuel was a law student at the Central American University in Managua. There he belonged to the political branch of ARDE. In October 1983 he and 50 other students were accused of counterrevolutionary activities and imprisoned. While in State Security custody they were placed in cells of 1 cubic meter and were forced to stand in cold water up to their ankles and were left there for several days. During this time the State Security forced them into collaborating with them. They were to return to their activities within the political branch of ARDE and find ways of discrediting the organization. After 12 days they were sent to the "Zona Franca" because of protests the government received from the CPDH. They were released on 22 December 1983 in a pardon given by the Sandinista government. Six months later Manuel Urbina sought asylum in the Costa Rican Embassy.

On 2 May 1984, Cesar Augusto Miranda Ortega, member of the Social Democratic Party (PSC) in Nicaragua was forcefully taken out of his classroom by members of the Sandinista Youth 19 de Julio. They shaved his head, whipped him with belts and covered his body with oil paint putting it into his nose and ears. They did this while the Sandinista police stood by watching. He was then taken to the Sandinista Police Sub-Station and interrogated by State Security. Six hours later he was transferred to the Hospital Manolo Morales.

They took him out of the classroom because, as a member of the political opposition, he voiced his opinions about the Sandinista ideology. His accusation appeared in the CPDH. While in Managua Wes interviewed several ex-students who witnessed the event. One of the female students said many people quit studying at the University after Cesar Miranda was beaten. They said they feared for their lives and couldn't study under such conditions.

A similar incident occurred in the town of Matagalpa in April 1983. Esteban Martinez witnessed "divine mobs" attack a student named Cesar Flores. The following is his story.

Cesar Flores belonged to an organization which opposed Sandinism called the Social Christians. One day the mobs, the Sandinista Youth, came to class and took him out and humiliated him. They cut his hair and made him swim in the open sewer there by the school. I saw this happen in April of 1983.

DEMONSTRATION IN CHINANDEGO

There was a demonstration in Chinandego one week before Arturo Cruz visited there during his political campaign for the Presidency in November 1984. Several civic and political youth organizations were protesting against the forced military recruitment. The "turbas" attempted to break up the demonstration but were outnumbered by the students involved in the protest. Fabian Gustavo Betancour was the Secretary General for the Social Democratic Party in Leon and Chinandego and was involved in organizing the demonstration. He is now a refugee in Honduras. He describes the following incident.

"I am here [in Choluteca Honduras] and fled political persecution because I am a member of the Social Democratic Party. We had a protest one week before Arturo Cruz arrived. In this demonstration there were anywhere from one to two thousand students. the Mercantil college had asked me to organize a protest against military conscription. The Sandinstas arrived at this school and carried a list of all those who would serve in the military. We organized a peaceful demonstration because we didn't want to serve. We didn't want to kill our brothers and we wanted all this to end. We started the protest and took to the streets. Since the 'divine mobs' couldn't attack us because there were only a few, they called in to Leon and Managua. Close to 1000 turbas arrive in IFA troop transports. Nearly all the schools were there with us. The streets were full of students, fathers. The turbas arrived and started hitting us with clubs. The police not only didn't stop them but joined in to help them attack us. As I told you before, this was a peaceful demonstration against the military service. During the demonstration a girl had her throat slit. Many people saw that a CDS woman who works in the market had done it. The Sandinistas said she had been asphyxiated, but how could she be asphyxiated with all the blood all over. There were journalists from La Prensa but they censored the paper so we couldn't read about it."

Four students from Chinandega subsantiated Fabian's story about the murder of the girl. Two of the students were interviewed in the Jacaleapa refugee camp and the others were interviewed in Teupesenti.

FORCED VOLUNTEERISM

The Nicaraguan sector most affected by the forced labor policies of the government cooperatives are the peasantry. Nearly every peasant farmer interviewed testified that they were threatened into working on the government cooperatives. Most of these peasants have fled because they would not defend the cooperative—cooperative workers must carry rifles to defend the land they work.

Eduardo and Maritza Pereira left Nicaragua 19 May 1984. They lived in an aldea called "Las Playas" in Nuevo Segovia. Olivia's family wouldn't sell their grain to the government cooperative store in the area in which they lived. This incident occurred on 26 June 1983.

Olivia's father Alejandro, would not accept the low price which the government offered him for his grains. When he refused to sell them the grain at that price they said they would force him to. The next day the Sandinistas arrived at Olivia's home and forced there way into the home. Alejandro and Olivia's two brothers were taken out to the back of the house. One brother managed to escape through the corn field. The father and son were put against the house and shot. Those who witnessed the shooting were Olivia's mother, a neighbor girl about 25 years old and Olivia's brother that had escaped. She said they had come to the house to teach her father to be cooperative and not ever sell his grain to anyone but them.

Rodriguez Sanchez from Murra, Nueva Segovia is another peasant farmer who felt pressured by the Sandinista Cooperative system.

The Sandinista regime made life impossible. Before there was a free commerce. Now if you sell your grain without permission they'll throw you in jail. Many of my friends were jailed for doing that. I left Nicaragua because I realized that the Sandinista regime didn't support the working campesino.

The students coming across the border told us that they are pressured, through the educational system, to work on the cooperatives. A common feeling among these youth was, "if you don't cut coffee and cotton then you are not advanced into the next grade".

CONCLUSION

As stated in the introduction, we have tried to follow the guidelines of objective research. Except for certain political and civic leaders in Nicaragua, we randomly selected all other sources from which we wrote this report. The testimonies were checked against other stories to verify their accuracy. Many testimonies were discarded in this process. The testimonies used in this documentary represent common themes encountered during the investigations. This report is based on personal testimonies given to us. We used only a few examples to illustrate the abuses we heard during our interviews. We have many more which would further substantiate our findings.

From the 100's of interviews conducted we conclude that the Sandinista regime has systematically repressed those Nicaraguans who are not in support of their government.

The Sandinista government has lost popularity among the Nicaraguan people and has attempted to retain it's stronghold in Nicaragua through the use of force and terror.

Those groups most effected by the Sandinista's systematic use of force and repression are:

Religious groups; especially evangelic and pentecostal movements.

Peasants not willing to farm cooperatives or sell food to the government.

Teenage youth from 15 years and older not willing to serve in the military.

Civic and political organizations which don't support the policies of the government.

Nicaraguans not actively involved in promoting the growth of the Sandinista system.

There is an underlying fear among all the Nicaraguans interviewed which should be mentioned in order to explain the diversity of stories currently coming out of Nicaragua. The people feel betrayed by their government and by the international community as a whole. They are very cautious about speaking out against a government they feel has control of the international humanitarian groups as well as the international journalists.

Many refugees said it was too dangerous to tell visitors about their experiences while they were still in Nicaragua. Others mentioned how they told reporters and Sandinista officials that their sons and daughters had been kidnapped by the Contras when in reality they had fled the country voluntarily or had joined the Contras themselves. To lie was the only way for them to avoid reprisals. We believe the type of systematic repression instituted by the Sandinistas has been successful in keeping much of this information from leaving Nicaragua.

We ask human rights organizations and journalists to talk to refugees in Honduras and Costa Rica. If they do this, a new side of the conflict in Nicaragua will become even more apparent. If groups choose to continue to ignore the causes of the steady stream of refugees and the stories they bring, reporters and human rights activists will not be doing justice to truth, nor to the common people of Nicaragua.

CONTRA ATROCITIES, OR A COVERT PROPAGANDA WAR?

A LOBBYING DRIVE BEGAN IN MANAGUA

(By Jim Denton)

The likely congressional defeat of President Reagan's proposal to provide military aid to the anti-Sandinista Contra forces comes in the wake of an extraordinary lobbying campaign. The struggle for the hearts and minds of Congress has mobilized a handful of partisans who have been enormously effective in distorting the Nicaraguan human-rights story. Although it is not uncommon for foreign governments to try persuasion on Capitol Hill, the manner and degree to which the Sandinistas have manipulated public and congressional opinion is noteworthy.

A review of the origins, the dubious handling and the reception of a report recently released by Rep. Samuel Gejdenson (D., Conn.), and two putative human-rights groups provides a case study of how Sandinista propaganda is legitimized and makes its way into the public debate and, ultimately, congressional policy.

The Washington, D.C., law firm of Reichler & Applebaum is the Nicaraguan government's official registered agent in the U.S. For its services, the firm is paid an annual rate of about $320,000. From all outside appearances the firm has ably represented its client. An accounting of the lobbyists' appointments with legislators and staff reads like a Who's Who among Senate and House liberals.

But Reichler & Applebaum's lobbying efforts on the Sandinistas' behalf have gone beyond the congressional routine. In an interview, Mr. Reichler confirmed that some months ago he originated and orchestrated a plan to send a team of "professional attorneys to Nicaragua to conduct an objective, independent investigation of Contra atrocities."

Reed Brody, a 31-year-old lawyer, and Jim Bordeloin, a law-student, were selected to conduct the "objective investigation." They spent four months in Nicaragua taking statements from witnesses of resistance-force atrocities, all with the full cooperation of the Sandinistas. Mr. Brody confirms that most of the investigators' in-country transportation, boarding, housing, office space, staff and, one can assume, the witnesses themselves, were provided compliments of their Marxist hosts and sympathizers in Managua.

Upon completion of the "investigation," the 141-page Brody Report, consisting of nearly 150 sworn affidavits from "witnesses," was duly processed back through the Sandinistas' lobbyists at Reichler & Applebaum. There it was prepared in final form and, according to a report submitted go the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, passed to the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), the International Human Rights Law Group and Rep. Gejdenson for public dissemination.

These three parties all have their individual biases. WOLA, for example, has been a particularly prolific and harsh critic of the human-rights records of Latin American governments friendly to the U.S., as well as the Contras, and sympathetic to the Sandinistas and other Marxist insurgents in the region. In reviewing WOLA reports, articles and studies, no serious or critical account of Fidel Castro's human-rights record in Cuba could be found. It is also worth noting, in weighing the group's objectivity, that two former WOLA employees are now employed by the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry.

Apparently recognizing that a hasty embrace of the Sandinista-sponsored Brody report might be viewed with skepticism, Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group assembled a second delegation to verify the Brody findings. This second delegation consisted of Michael Glennon, former chief counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under the chairmanship of Frank Church, Donald Fox, a New York City-based international human-rights lawyer-activist; Valerie Miller, the delegation's interpreter, who lived in post-revolutionary Nicaragua for two years and wrote a book on the Sandinista literacy campaign; and, as an observer, a staff aide to Rep. Gejdenson. Mr. Fox confirmed that his Nicaraguan-born wife, now a U.S. citizen, Ana Clemenzia Tercero, accompanied the group to Managua to visit family members at WOLA's expense. Ms. Tercero's brother is a high-ranking official in the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry assigned to Rome. This group uncovered no discrepancies in the Brody findings after having corroborated only 10 of the nearly 150 Brody affidavits during its one-week visit to Nicaragua.

Then, on March 7, in releasing the Sandinista-sponsored Brody Report, Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group called for a congressional investigation into contra atrocities before a packed press conference on Capitol Hill, Mr. Gejdenson stated he was forwarding the report to Rep. Lee Hamilton (D., Ind.), chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Michael Barnes (D., Md.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, of which Mr. Gejdenson is a member. In their prepared press statements, Mr. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group did not mention the Sandinistas' role in originating and facilitating the Brody Report.

Last week the House Western Hemisphere Affairs Subcommittee held several days of hearings on aid to the contras. At Thursday's session, at the request of Mr. Gejdenson, Mr. Brody testified before the committee and had his report entered into the Congressional Record. Mr. Fox also testified, embracing the Brody report. And, apparently in order to gain some distance from the Sandinista-inspired document, Mr. Fox submitted a second report written by himself, Mr. Glennon, the Law Group and WOLA. The findings of this report substantiated and reinforced the Brody report.

The Brody document made its way into the public and congressional debate with a splash. The media fallout included articles in the Washington Post and the New York Times, and network coverage, including about 2½ minutes on the CBS Evening News. None of these accounts seriously challenged the report's origins or handling, ignoring or playing down the Sandinista sponsorship to the point that it was virtually unrecognizable to the audience.

The overall impact of the press accounts and congressional responses served the purposes of a Marxist regime to distort the U.S. public and Congress' understanding of the human-rights saga in Nicaragua—all of which will continue to shape U.S. policy in that war-torn country.

Subject: Nicaraguan refugees Reject Reports of Atrocities by Anti-Sandinistas.

Ref: Tegucigalpa 4336.

1. Summary. A recent sampling of the refugees who left Nicaragua in the last few months uniformly rejected current allegations in the U.S. press that anti-Sandinista insurgent groups were responsible for deaths of non-combatants or atrocities against them. Embassy officer spoke to three different groups of five-to-ten refugees and numerous family groups from the unncr camps in Teupasenti and Jacaleapa. Each group responded spontaneously, and there was no sign they had been counseled to give a prepared response.

2. During four recent visits to the Nicaraguan Ladino refugee camps in Honduras, Refoff has sought out groups of new refugees to inquire about reports of anti-Sandinista atrocities. All those interviewed were aware that they were talking to a U.S. Embassy officer, Refoff asked about reports blaming the anti-Sandinistas for non-combatant deaths in the areas of conflict. The invariable response was "that is a lie." All responded the same way when the question was rephrased to ask specifically about alleged FDN atrocities. Several refugees explained to Embassy officer that the Sandinistas use propaganda like that to try to promote their point of view.

3. Three of the groups interviewed were composed of young men escaping forced conscription in Nicaragua, but Embassy officer was also able to speak with families two had recently arrived. Their stories were consistent with those of the young men. None of these refugees interviewed had any direct relationship with the FDN that would affect their assessments. Most of the refugees were from areas where the FDN operates, and several said they had sought FDN assistance in escaping, but none admitted to have had any actual direct contact or affiliation with the FDN.

4. The following are illustrative excerpts which were recorded with the understanding that the identity of the refugees would not be compromised:

"Ivan" was drafted into the Nicaraguan Army and served from November 17, 1983, until he deserted in May 1984. He said, "it is categorically false that the FDM is killing civilians. We soldiers saw the destruction of the villages, of the campesinos, and how it was organized by the Sandinistas. When international groups, human rights groups, or others arrived, they would say that there had been a battle, and the Sandinista Army EPS) had defended the people. In fact, it was the EPS that had destroyed villages, and they wanted to have a psychological advantage before the nations of the world." He said when he was with the EPS, he was fighting in the mountains of Matagalpa and Jinotega. In earlier discussions which were not recorded, Ivan pointed out that the EPS used artillery when it went into battle. The artillery caused most of the civilian casualties, he said, and the anti-Sandinista forces did not use it.

Mrs. Gomez, a gray-haired grandmother insisted that the FDN was fully respectful of noncombatants: "I know they behave themselves everywhere. We don't have any complaints to make about them." Asked about reports that the FDN killed civilians, she said, "That is a lie. If you take a look, when the FDN goes through an area . . . they even purchase what they need. That is a real lie."

"Gladys" was part of a group of 14 people who had left Nicaragua three weeks earlier. She said that they had looked for the FDN, but had been unable to find them. Asked why they looked, she said, "So that they could help us get our car across. It was left in Nicaragua. We knew that they would help us get it across if we found them." She said that her father left the car, and the Sandinistas came half an hour later and confiscated it. They shouldn't be afraid of the FDN since there were reports they killed civilians, she said, "This is a big lie. They didn't do anything to anyone. When they pass by, they don't do anything. In combat sometimes it happens; but stories that they come by and kill civilians are a lie. When people are cooperating with the Sandinistas), they won't leave them alone, but they don't do anything to the campesinos who are working." Asked if the campesinos were afraid of the FDN, she said, "No, but in reality they are afraid of the authorities."

5. REFOFF plans further refugee interviews shortly.

PRAYER OF THE CHRISTIAN NICARAGUAN

FDN—God, Homeland, Democracy

Introduction

Democracy should be understood as an evolving process, in the political, social, and economic orders, and not as a static condition, since the democratic system contains corrective factors and those of change in society, unlike communism, which is a "state of perfection" that Marxist dogmatism establishes as stationary and not subject to changes.

That explains why still within the most imperfect forms of democracy in the Western world, those societies progress toward more evolved forms of coexistence. Also, Spain has been developing its process of democratic evolution, in Europe, and in America, another has been the Dominican Republic.

And in those same periods, in what direction have regimes such as Czechosolavakia or Hungary, in Europe, or Cuba, in America, advanced? Is it possible that those Communist countries have gone backwards, in the indicators of economic and social development, when compared with their democratic neighbors of a similar size and resources?

From that perspective, the solution for underdeveloped countries is to accelerate the evolutionary democratic process, since almost none of them have reached even the first phases of the capitalist economic system, and they are societies more identified with economic feudalism than with democratic capitalism.

On the other hand, the failure of communism in the countries in which it has imposed its political regime has shown that the nationalizing of the means of production does not solve the problems of those societies and rather aggravates them due to the detriment that this system implies for the values of the individual. Historically, it is shown that Communist societies obtain a lower productivity of their citizens, a marked failure in meeting their spiritual needs, a sectarian vision of universal culture, and a centralistic bureaucratic State that paralyzes the creative abilities of the human being.

So, the evolutionary process of countries should be directed at the perfecting of the democratic mechanisms that will insure the alternation in political power, social mobility and a fairer redistribution of wealth.

Other aspects of the integral development of man as a human being are implicit in such societies when these mechanisms are carried out. This means that the society of well-being in democracy is achieved as an effect of the putting into practice of the mechanisms of the system, and not as the result of a decision "planned" by some powerful central "bureau."

The Blue and White Book contains a series of ideological thoughts that uphold the struggle of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force. And in a congruent manner with the pluralist and democratic nature of our movement, it is a compilation of the political objectives expressed in diverse ways by its bases, made up of thousands of Nicaraguans of different democratic ideologies and of all the socio-economic strata of the country.

This book is, then, an extensive but still incomplete treatise on democracy as a means of solution to the current difficult situation in Nicaragua. In it are contained the thoughts that constitute the mystical theology of our struggle, one of whose principles is, precisely, the right to think differently, which always leads to new points of view.

The Blue and White Book is also an instrument of political training. If the reader wishes to use it with that objective, a general reading of it initially is recommendable, in order to have a vision of the set of ideological thoughts of the FDN.

For purposes of political study in groups, each one of the chapters can be analyzed and discussed separately. They are structured by specific themes, in such a way to facilitate their comprehension, for which purpose easy-to-remember phrases are included at the beginning of each chapter, summarizing the political thinking presented in it.

This type of presentation is also recommendable for the proselitist propagation of the concepts.

Ten chapters make up the Blue and White Book. The first of them points out the geopolitical aspects of Nicaragua and the identification with the Christian and Western culture. It also establishes an assessment of our nationality, its symbols, and its importance in the unity of Nicaraguans.

The second chapter presents the democratic and pluralist nature of our movement, its political and military composition, and a compendium is made of the motivations of the struggle, and recommendations on the conduct of the freedom commandos of the FDN, in an easily memorizable form.

The third chapter emphasizes the continental solidarity of the free peoples of America, both in the struggle against the dictatorship of Somoza as well as the Sandinista Marxist totalitarianism.

The fourth chapter makes a politicial assessment of the need for the reconciliation of the Nicaraguan family, through true political pluralism.

The fifth chapter presents the democratic system as the political solution to the problematic situation of Nicaragua, and suggests concrete objectives such as the formation of a Provisional Government, and the calling of free elections for a National Constituent Assembly, with the participation of the political parties and democratic sectors of Nicaragua.

The seventh chapter is dedicated to the theme of social justice, agrarian reform, replevy of the labor conquests of Nicaraguan workers, the redistributive role of public spending, and the need to foster the adoption of forms of participation of workers in the profits of companies in which they work, and the fair opportunity to become co-owners of the same.

The eighth chapter presents the ways in which the FDN proposes to put into effect Human Rights in Nicaragua, and to restore the public freedoms trampled upon by Sandinista Marxism.

In the eighth chapter are presented the solutions that the FDN proposes to the economic disaster brought about by the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. It espouses a democracy in which the economic desires of the population, through the mechanisms of the market economy, will turn the great majorities into consumers, the economic system culminating in a society of well-being.

In the ninth chapter human progress and social mobility are assessed as goals of a democratic society. The important role of the woman and of youth in the new society is established, as well as the permanent climate of social peace and human solidarity.

The tenth chapter is dedicated to reaching national and international peace in the area, through the solution of the internal Nicaraguan problem, subsequent development of an adequate international policy, and the democratic restructuring of the armed forces in Nicaragua.

Immediately thereafter is attached the "Prayer of the Christian Nicaraguan," currently very identified with the religious spirit of the Nicaraguan.

The Blue and White Book reflects the ideological democratic concepts stated by the bases of Nicaraguan Democratic Force, through study groups during several months in which we have combined the arduous struggle of combat with political training.

The commandos of the FDN are then, the authors of this book which, as was said initially, remains open to new points, the result of dialogue, study and discussion of the subjects, within that democratic re-evolutionary concept, where the change toward progress through the liberty of man constitutes our greatest strength.

SEPTEMBER 1983.

NICARAGUA

(We are Central Americans, our past and future are tied to America. We are Christians, and we love our homeland, the blue and white flag, and our national anthem.)

Nicaragua is in the center of the Americas. The history of our people is tied to that of the other countries of the isthmus and the rest of the continent. In the same way, our political, economic, and social future is tied to the brother countries of America.

The Organization of American States (OAS) is an organization made up of the democratic countries of the continent, on the bases of mutual commitments in defense and international trade and culture. These countries contributed to the overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship, with resolution of the XVII Ministers' Meeting, which includes commitments to democratization that the Sandinista government has not kept.

Our nationality is Nicaraguan. All of us born in national territory and children of Nicaraguans born abroad are Nicaraguans. Our nationality is characterized by being for the most part Christian and identified with Western culture.

Above all, we are Nicaraguans and we should feel united by this tie that overcomes political, religious or racial differences. For Christian Nicaraguans hatred between brothers of the same nationality because of differences of class or racial origin is not acceptable. Therefore, we love and support our brother Miskitos, Sumos and Ramas.

The symbols of the homeland deserve our respect, since they symbolize our nationality and cannot and should not be exchanged or replaced by others of a political nature:

The blue and white flag is the only one to which we owe respect and veneration.

Our National Anthem is the only one that we patriots accept as a national symbol.

The national heroes are those who forged our nationality: This is, a homeland for all without political differences, and they are: Miguel Larreynaga, Jose Dolores Estrada, and Andres Castro.

NATIONAL ANTHEM OF NICARAGUA

Hail to you, Nicaragua , on your soil the voice of the cannon no longer rumbles, nor is your glorious bicolored banner stained with the blood of brothers.

Peace shines beautifully in your sky, let no one cloud your immortal glory, and work is your worthy laurel and honor your triumphant insignia.

NICARAGUAN DEMOCRATIC FORCE

(We are Nicaraguan citizens of diverse democratic ideologies, united in a political and military movement dedicated to rescuing Nicaragua from the Soviet occupation.)

The Nicaraguan Democratic Force, FDN, is a political and military movement essentially nationalistic, i.e., a defender of national sovereignty and which is struggling to rescue Nicaragua from the Sandinista Marxist totalitarianism imposed by the Soviet imperialism that has occupied our country, with an army of thousands of internationalists.

The FDN is a pluralist movement because it is made up of citizens of diverse democratic political ideologies and of all the socio-economic strata, which enables it to assume the organization of a new national government in Nicaragua.

The FDN is a civil movement because it proposes the installation in our homeland of an essentially democratic government, through free and universal elections, i.e., with the participation of all citizens.

The FDN is also a military movement because circumstantially it has found itself forced into armed struggle as the means to the political solution in Nicaragua. Our forces are made up almost in their totality of armed civilians: 80% peasants, workers, students, professionals, 19% ex-Sandinistas of an extraction similar to the above, and 1 percent former Nicaraguan soldiers.

Once the goal of rescuing Nicaraagua from the Sandinista Marxist totalitarianism has been reached, the members of the FDN shall reintegrate in the productive process of the country, in their respective activities or professions.

The commandos will have the option of forming part of the Amred Forces democratically restructured, or of roles that will require some military preparation, such as police services, customs guard, coast guard, etc.

We all have the right to participate in national policy, whether within the existing parties or by forming new parties, as well as from labor associations or free professionals.

The FDN emerges because of the national need for a pluralist political platform, which was the intitial plan of the Nicaraguan revoluiton, whose power was usurped by the Sandinista Front.

We advocate a new Nicaragua: Without Somocism, Without Sandinism. And although neither of these factions constitute a political doctrine or ideology, and they come from very dissimilar leaders, in practice as a government, these minority groups have agreed in genocide, theft of the money of the people, moral corruption and betrayal of our nationality to foreign interests.

In the midst of these minorities that have polarized their struggle for sectarian interests, there are more than two milion of us Nicaraguans not identified with any of those factions, and who are suitable for the Nicaraguan Democratic Force.

I AM AN FDN COMMANDO—WHY DO I STRUGGLE?

Because we truly love God we are freeing our country. For its blue and white flag, we commandos are fighting.

We are armed workers against the occupation of the thousands of Cubans who humiliate our nation.

In the FDN as brothers, we struggle for democracy, we demand human rights for our disgraced people.

Our goal is freedom in its grandiose dimension, elections and social justice, free economy and free expression.

I AM AN FDN COMMANDO—HOW SHOULD I BEHAVE?

With discipline and with loyalty to the cause.

With absolute respect for the population.

With a spirit of service for all.

With morality and good behavior.

With generosity for the needy.

With the decision to be heroic.

With solidarity for my comrades.

With honesty and justice in my actions.

With respect for prisoners.

With democratic thoughts in mind.

With Nicaragua in my heart.

We Democrats should give an example of democracy with our actions. This is the best way to win the support of all our people: Treat others as you would like them to treat you.

CONTINENTAL SOLIDARITY

The free peoples of the world support the struggle of the Nicaraguan people, because it is the struggle of justice against injustice; the struggle of democrats against Communist.

THE PEOPLE'S INSURRECTION OF THE PAST AND THE OVERTHROW OF THE SOMOZA DICTATORSHIP

The Nicaraguan people of all socio-economic strata and political ideologies rose up against the Somoza dictatorship, supported by several democratic peoples and governments of the world, including a Resolution of the XVII Consultation Meeting of the Ministers of the OAS, of June 23, 1979, which was based not only on the "immediate and definitive replacement of Somoza regime," but also on the "installation of a democratic" and pluralist government in Nicaragua, the "guarantee of the respect for the human rights of all Nicaraguans without exception," and the "holding of free elections as soon as possible which will lead to the reestablishment of a truly democratic government that will guarantee peace, liberty and justice," as the resolution states.

Of the four bases pointed out, only the first was followed, and the other three, legitimate aspirations and rights of the Nicaraguan people, were rejected since the Sandinista Front usurped the political and military power in the new government.

The popular insurrection of the Nicaraguan people and the subsequent international democratic support was not in order to replace a dictatorship of the right with one of the left, more genocidal, corrupt and repressive than the previous one. So the governments represented in the OAS have an unavoidable responsibility toward our people. The XVII Meeting of OAS Ministers is still open. . . .

The democratic community of American countries and other peoples and governments of the world support the insurrectional struggle of our people against the Sandinistas Marxist totalitarianism, backed by Soviet imperialism.

This continental solidarity, and even-worldwide solidarity, is more and more evident as the Sandinista government shows itself to be a strategic piece in the Soviet intermediate and long term imperialist plan, to subdue the American continent, and it parts from the development of a pluralist democracy, respectful of the human rights of each and every Nicaraguan as was the original plan of the revolution.

FDN MEANS NATIONAL CONCILIATION

In the reconciliation of the Nicaraguan family are contained the democratic solutions to peace, to the economic recovery of the country, and to social justice.

A decisive factor of the failure of the Sandinista revolution is based, precisely, on the fact that they have systematized hatred as a political and social practice, behavior that belongs to Leninist-Marxist regimes. Hatred of classes, political parties, and racial groups.

The hatred and desire for political revenge are sentiments that should be removed from the political future of Nicaragua. On the other hand, the Christian sentiments and those of social reconciliation will be the basis of the new Nicaragua. A united and integral society means a society without class hatred, nor hatreds of any kind.

Even more, democracy is based precisely on the representative nature and participation of the different political, social, and economic sectors of the community in the decisions that affect individuals and groups. Therefore, hatred and political revenge systematically turn out to be antidemocratic. National reconciliation is essentially democratic.

We should advocate the reconciliation of all Nicaraguans as just one family, and the reintegration on the soil of our homeland and in the productive process of the country of those hundreds of thousands of political exiles, through an institutional and legal framework that favors national reconciliation.

In this way, it will also be possible for honest and democratic public servants in the service of the current regime to be able to keep their positions in the new government, the same as soldiers and policemen in active service and who have not committed crimes, and who possess a democratic vocation, to fit into the restructuring of the armed forces of Nicaragua, once the dark forces of Marxism have been beaten.

In short, all measures that lead to the reconciliation of Nicaraguans will help in the democratization of the country through true political pluralism.

FDN MEANS DEMOCRACY

(Democracy is the true power of the people to elect and be elected. And it only exists when periodic elections, free and universal, are practiced.)

Free and universal elections in a periodic manner constitute the democratic mechanism that guarantees the people the changes in public power, and they constitute the only political solution in Nicaragua.

With respect to the above, a Provisional Government Junta will be established, as well as a Government Cabinet, with the participation of all democratic parties and bright forces of the country, which will have among their responsibilities of priority, the creation of the conditions for the notice of the meeting and the development of a democratic process for elections of a National Constituent Assembly and of the Municipal Authorities throughout the country, to be carried out within a period no greater than a year after the Provisional Government has been installed.

The National Constituent Assembly, made up of representatives of the diverse political parties and forces of the nation freely elected, will come to be the highest body of the government, with authority to name the authorities of the Executive Branch and the Judiciary for that same period, and to promulgate a new Political Constitution and the laws that they consider appropriate.

The Executive Branch named by the National Constituent Assembly shall call for free and universal elections for new executive and legislative authorities of a new term of Government.

FDN MEANS SOCIAL JUSTICE

(Social justice is the goal of any process of democratization in the free world, because political democracy is the basis of economic democracy.)

Integral agrarian reform will grant to the Nicaraguan peasants definitive deeds, and not for use, as in the Communist agrarian reform. The democratic conception places the peasant as the subject and beneficiary of the agrarian reform, offering him the opportunity to work on his own land, whether in an individual manner or in cooperatives or another form of free and voluntary association, operated by their members with the technical, economic, and cultural assistance of the State.

The national lands and large land holdings or private farms that are not sufficiently exploited will be used in the agrarian reform plans.

In democratic societies, the worker has wide work options, unlike Communist society where just one boss exists, the State, who determines the level of the social benefits of its workers.

In Nicaragua, the new Provisional Government will call for the labor rights that the Nicaraguan workers had won, such as payment for overtime, a thirteenth month free, etc. and those obtained through private collective bargaining.

Participation of the workers: The adoption of forms of worker participation in the profits of the companies in which they work will be encouraged, as well as the fair opportunity to become a co-owner of the same, on the basis of a harmonic understanding between capital and labor.

Restructuring of the tax system: Taxing, both nationally and locally, will be reasonable and fair, so that the public taxes will be in relation to income. The tax on real estate and moveable property should be progressive, so that those who have more pay more. There will be a deduction for real estate that is the home, as well as for persons with physical handicaps and others who deserve special consideration.

FDN MEANS ENFORCEMENT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

(Above all, man, and the respect for human rights, because where man is not respected as an individual being man is not respected either as a social being.)

We will respect and guarantee the observance of the Human Rights consecrated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations and in the American Declaration of Duties and Rights, of the Organization of American States. Specifically, the exercise of the freedoms of expression and propagation of spoken and written thought, of assembly, of association, of conscience, and of worship, of culture and of minorities will be guaranteed.

The abuses that are committed in the exercise of said freedoms will be punished in accordance with the laws.

Because in principle they are contrary to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, of the United Nations, and the general principles of the law, the confiscations carried out by the Communist government of Nicaragua will be considered without effect and the creation of an Ex-officio Court will be created, for the return of the goods affected to their respective owners, whenever they show their legal and honest acquisition. The property that in the public interest cannot be returned will be indemnified by the State.

Without any distinctions, absolute civil and political equality of all Nicaraguans will be guaranteed, and the exercise of all authority will be regulated by constitutional or legal norms.

The education of children and of youth in their integral training, i.e., technical and cultural, constitutes a right of the Nicaraguan people, and an unavoidable responsibility of the State, which shall offer it in a free and obligatory form.

However, it will be a right and a duty of the parents of students to decide on the type of education that they desire for their children and to contribute to their religious and cultural education. The educational action of the State in this field should be limited to offering at no cost a wide number of educational options to parents.

The most extensive and absolute freedom of worship and the immediate return of the temples seized will be guaranteed.

Free unionization of workers will be guaranteed and stimulated as the most appropriate means for the attainment of economic and social improvements of the same, and it is recognized as a means of contributing to the democratic system through dialogue and negotiation. The democratic labor union is recognized as an effective instrument of protection. The basic rights of workers will be written down in consitutional norms, especially union freedom and collective bargaining.

Trust and safety will be returned to the indigenous communities, by promulgating legislation that fully guarantees their rights; at the same time, the necessary programs will be prepared and developed for the achievements of their social, cultural, economic and political development. In addition, the mechanisms that will allow them to receive and spend government funds for the solution of their problems, in accordance with resolutions taken by their own authorities, will be created.

The Judiciary will be autonomous: This branch will be strictly professional and its members will not be militant politicians. The judicial career will be established and its independence guaranteed.

The administrative corruption characteristic of dictatorships of the left and of the right will be abolished. Civil Service will be the basis of operation of the public administration, which should be aimed at the attainment of the common good to the maximum degree, and governed by strict standards of honesty and efficiency.

The Public Administration will be renewed in accordance with social changes and decentralized, keeping the unity of government action and the necessary constitutional coordination.

The Office of the Comptroller General of the Republic will investigate, judge and punish the misdeeds or crimes committed by public officials, and an Administrative Court for Contentions will be created, which will define the responsibilities of the case in the first instance.

FDN MEANS THE SOLUTION TO THE ECONOMIC DISASTER

Any policy for the improvement and recovery of the national economy should be based on the economic strengthening of each Nicaraguan as individuals.

Free enterprise and private property will be basic fundaments of the national economic system. However, private property should fulfill a social role, and therefore, its possession and administration shall be subject to the norms demanded by the maintenance and progress of the social order, and can also be aimed at goals of public utility or of social interest through the just indemnization for the respective owner.

It will be the responsibility of the State to coordinate and orient the economic activities in order to achieve the best and most rational use of the human and material resources of the country, to the benefit of all the Nicaraguan people.

Austerity policies for public spending will be implanted, in a special way in those sectors that do not affect investment in the social sector (education, health, etc.) and simultaneously incentive policies for production will be developed, for their increase and diversification, mainly with respect to exports.

Investment projects will be fostered and guaranteed, so that they will contribute financially and technologically to the development of the country and to the diversification of its production.

The State will protect and foster activities pertaining to farming and animal husbandry.

All kinds of monopolistic exploitation of private interest will be prohibited.

The resources, systems of production and basic services of the economic structure should be preferentially of Nicaraguan ownership.

The democratization of the entrepreneurial system will be fostered through the participation of the small investor.

The progressive industrialization of the country will be promoted, on the basis of the maximum utilization of our national raw materials; the basic industries will be fostered and those of transformation will be favored, all of that in relation to the benefit that they can represent for the economy of the country.

FDN MEANS SOCIAL PROGRESS

(Private initiative is not the privilege of minorities. In a democratic society, private initiative is the privilege that makes it possible for the man of the majorities to emerge.)

The respect for, promotion and recognition of human dignity as a sublime manifestation of Divinity will constitute the fundamental bases of the action by the State, so that it will promote in all forms the dignifying, integral training and technical, cultural and spiritual training of man.

The family, as the primary nucleus of society, will deserve the protection and legal, economic, moral, and cultural assistance of the State. Therefore, programs referring to the well-being of the family, infants, youth, and the elderly will be studied and put into practice. The family will be strengthened and will not be replaced in its roles by any organization.

The families that have been victims of the struggle for the liberation of Nicaragua will enjoy the protection of the States, through the laws that will be issued in that area.

The political and civil rights of women will be defended and promoted, their participation in the fields that they have traditionally not occupied will be stimulated, their technical and professional training will be intensified, special legislation will be promoted for the professional risks that are peculiar to women, and violations against the dignity of the women, child and adolescent will be punished severely.

A policy will be developed that will turn the youth into a motor of the public administration, tying them especially to the social programs, such as those referring to housing, education, health, protection, the environment, and in addition, they will be integrated in the productive process of the country. Youth recreation, programs, as well as the technical and professional preparation of youth, will have preference.

The organization and operation of cooperatives will be promoted and stimulated, as a dynamic and indispensable instrument of economic and social improvement.

Preferential attention will be given to the solution of the problems of urban and rural housing, especially through the incentive for investment in these areas and incentives for the self-effort and mutual assistance programs, and a preferred place should be given to the studies of the design and construction of rural housing, in relation to the optimum utilization of the materials and procedures of local work, in accordance with the climatological conditions of each zone. Standards aimed especially at favoring the families of limited income will be issued, so that they will have worthy housing.

State action will be aimed at obtaining the greatest degree of benefit for the large majorities of the Nicaraguan people. To that end, the state resources will be analyzed and managed so that they reach those who need them the most.

A permanent climate of social peace and human solidarity will be fostered based on a substantial increase in national wealth and its fairest redistribution, as the result of policies that will combat the poverty, ignorance, the lack of health, defending in that way the physical, mental and spiritual health of all Nicaraguans without exception.

FDN IS THE WAY TO PEACE

(Peace can only be achieved through pluralist and participative democracy for all Nicaraguans, and with long-term objectives congruent with our geopolitical location.)

An effort will be made to establish and maintain friendly relations with all those peace-loving democratic countries in the world, and all forms of intervention in the internal or external affairs of other states will be repudiated.

A struggle will be carried out in order to recover the international prestige of Nicaragua, profoundly eroded due to the irresponsible behavior of the current and previous governments, in addition adhering to the principles and norms of international law, particularly those which promote peace, the peaceful solution of conflicts and the harmonious coexistence of all peoples.

The Armed Forces will consist of the Army, Air Force, Navy and National Police, with their respective commands coordinated at the Cabinet level and subject in the final run to the civilian authorities who establish them. Although their members will not be able to exercise political activities personally or collectively while they are in those positions, they should be instructed and motivated to defend adequately the democratic, humanist and Christian values of national life.

The number of the Armed Forces will be limited proportionally to the resources and needs of the country.

The Armed Forces will not be an institution dedicated exclusively to maintaining the security, order and defense of the national territory, but rather will be a permanent school that allows its members a better knowledge of community problems and the way to contribute to their solution; for the better achievement of these goals, the members of the Armed Forces will be prepared in the professions and liberal arts.

Cooperation will be given in the strengthening of the Inter-American system for the defense and promotion of freedoms, human values, the democratic system and business freedom.

In the area of foreign trade, an effort will be made to deal with all countries whenever that is a benefit for the economy of our nation. An effort will be made to obtain fair prices for the exportable Nicaraguan products, and support will be given to all the standards of justice in trade relations.

The relations with the different churches will be preserved and expanded, based on the idea that the majority of the Nicaraguan people possess deeply religious sentiments in diverse creeds, and it should be in the State's interest to intensify such spiritual values of our people.

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS AND RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN NICARAGUA

On July 9, 1984 ten Roman Catholic priests were expelled from Nicaragua for allegedly having engaged "in intense political activities contrary to the government of reconstruction" and participating in "plans intended to provoke a confrontation between the Catholic Church and the Sandinista people's revolution."

This action characterizes the Sandinistas' continued and concerted effort to undermine and eventually eliminate the Nicaraguan people's chances for a free society.

Four of those expelled priests recently appeared at a special briefing arranged by the National Forum Foundation for a bi-partisan group of Senate staff members whose primary responsibility lies in the area of national security.

The priests who participated were: Father Mario Fiandri, Father Benito La Plante, Father Manuel Huertas, and Father Mario Madrid.

The priests' remarks provide a first-hand account of religious persecution and human rights violations in Nicaragua. This issue of Policy Forum presents the transcript of the briefing at which the priests told their side of the story.

SELECTED COMMENTS

On Sandinista Disinformation Efforts:

"The Sandinistas and the popular Church have a whole network of information to send press releases and everything they want overseas and control international public opinion. That is why . . . there was only one side of the picture."—Father Mario Fiandri.

On Religious Persecution in Nicaragua:

"What I think, is that this was an attack, not against myself, nor my colleagues, but rather an attack against the Catholic Church, particularly the diocese of Managua."—Father Mario Fiandri.

On Life Under the Sandinista Regime:

"At the present, people have less food and fewer jobs in Nicaragua. I'm taking into account all the people who have fled the country. Now, in order to get anything, you have to prove that you are Sandinista."—Father Benito La Plante.

"The Sandinista government also persecutes those who are fighting against them. However, they do not respect anybody else who chooses to remain neutral because they want to force everyone to become a Sandinista. In other words, before (under Somoza), you could remain neutral if you chose to do so. Today you are forced to become a Sandinista or you are not allowed to live. He who is not a Sandinista is a second class citizen, exposed to anything they wish to do to him."—Father Mario Fiandri.

On "Liberation Theology":

"One of our best Nicaraguan authors, who was also a wonderful Christian, when giving a lecture to a clerical reunion, was asked if Aristotle had been Christianized and if so was it possible to do the same thing with Marx. He answered, it's possible to Christianize Marx. But the mistake is to Marxicize Christ, which is in fact what the popular church is trying to do."—Father Manuel Huertas.

On Human Rights Violations:

"I think by the same token it is also immoral for any government in any part of the world to utilize for political purposes the people, by taking control of their bare necessities for survival."—Father Mario Madrid.

THE NATIONAL FORUM FOUNDATION—BRIEFING BY NICARAGUAN PRIESTS (AUGUST 16, 1984)

Mr. JIM DENTON. I would like to welcome you to this bipartisan briefing which the National Forum Foundation has arranged for the benefit of those Senate staff personnel whose primary responsibility lies in the area of foreign policy. With us today are four of the ten priests who were expelled from Nicaragua early last month. As you know, the Catholic Church is engaged in sensitive negotiations to allow these priests reentry into Nicaragua and back to their parishes. For that reason, this meeting is intended to be low-key and off-the-record. There are no members of the press here, and I will be asking you at this point not to take pictures. We are making a concerted effort to keep these proceedings out of the press, simply because it might upset negotiations that are going on between the government of Nicaragua and the Catholic Church.

Regarding the format for the meeting, I will ask each of the priests to make a brief statement and then begin a question and answer period. The priests have encouraged me to ask that your questions be as forthright, as candid, and as challenging as you feel is necessary to get to the point you wish to discuss. So, please keep that in mind when you ask your questions.

May I introduce, immediately to my left, Father Mario Fiandri, who would like to say a few words to you.

Father MARIO FIANDRI. My name is Mario Fiandri, and I have worked in Nicaragua for nine years. Until last February, I was the rector of the youth center of the Salesians in Managua. It includes about 50,000 people; it's a vocational training center for laborers, both men and women, with about 1,000 students who were working and attending classes in the mornings, afternoon or evening.

The student center had various sports and other music activities. Between 9,000 and 10,000 people participated on Sundays; the director of the Center was the legal representative of the Salesians to the Nicaraguan government.

Father BENITO LA PLANTE. I have been in Nicaragua for 14 years. Originally, I went there for 5 years with the Church. I was a priest of the Diocese. My church didn't have any physical structure or settlements in Nicaragua, so I had to start from scratch. I remained in Nicaragua for 14 years because Monsignor Obando called me to work in Nicaragua and I was to remain there as long as he was Bishop of that Diocese. I witnessed the 1972 earthquake and then tried to help the poor Nicaraguans by establishing a housing cooperative.

After the first co-op, we set up three more co-ops which produced hand crafts, agricultural goods and products for consumption. When I left Nicaragua a month ago we had about 1500 Diocese associates and we constructed over 1,000 homes. This was not my primary area of responsibility, but rather my work was serving the religious needs of the people. That is why Archbishop Obando put me in charge of the rural parish in Managua. In Managua, they have about 572 different peasant communities distributed among 28 different parishes. Of these communities we started out with 350 that were working and I personally visited 214 of them just within the last year. I do not want to forget to mention that these communities cannot be visited with a car like a Dodge or Mustang. You must ride a horse or mule. Four years ago, we founded an institute for peasants in Managua. Every week we would have seminars and once a year we have an intensive 22 day training program for the leaders of these communities.

I was also a member of the National Commission of Peasants which worked with the Archbishop in Jinotega. As far as education, we provided for all the families of the co-op to attend and later this was extended to everyone in the entire town. The education center was approved by the Ministry of Education who named the education complex in the town. We have five different sections, including preschool for small children. We have an elementary school for adults, high school, accounting school, secretarial school. Now, I am here.

Father MANUEL HUERTAS. In the years 1961, 1962, and part of 1963, I was working in Nicaragua for the Salesian high school in Masaya. At the time, one of our students was the person who is now known as Commander Ortega. I was the director of the studies and discipline, and also in charge of the spirituality of the students. On December 27, 1983, I arrived in Nicaragua—which means that I have only served in Nicaragua for 7 months. I was in charge of the parish La Magdalena in Monimbo. I went to replace my predecessor Father Jose Maria Pacheco who was also expelled from the parish. Therefore, at the time I was just getting acquainted with my parish, visiting the different communities and helping in the construction of their chapel and getting associated with the community. I was also getting to know their traditions to be able to better cooperate with these people.

Therefore, I really had no plan and was thinking of letting the year go in order to get acquainted with the Christians there. They are very colorful and different people.

Father MARIO MADRID. My name is Mario Madrid, of Panama. I went to Nicaragua right after the earthquake. I was working in a project that included training for nuns, a youth center, a parish school and a medical center. I was principal of the high school in charge of studies for over 1,000 students. We had two sessions, one in the morning and one at night. I was a teacher there, too, and my specific duty was to deal with youth. I was in Nicaragua during two different periods from 1973 to 1978. I fled Nicaragua prior to the last insurrection. I came back to Nicaragua in 1980 and stayed until July 9, 1984, when I was expelled.

Mr. DENTON. Thank you, Father Madrid. May I just start the questions? I will ask for any one of the priests to just mention, discuss, the events surrounding their expulsion. I know each one has an individual story, but if someone would care, or all would care, to comment about that, I think that it would be helpful.

Father FIANDRI. The situation around my expulsion from Nicaragua, July 9, 1984, came about in the following way. After lunch, I went out to run some errands in the city. At 3:00, I went to another parish, Santa Fas, which wasn't my parish, to conduct a funeral for the deceased mother of a friend of mine. After the Mass, I went back to my home. When I entered the sacristy of the church where I prepared to officiate the services, I found a group of about 30 people who were crying; I asked them why. They said that the military people had come over and taken away Father Montero, who was head of the parish, to expel him from Nicaragua. And that, in front of my own office, two military people were waiting for me for the same purpose. One of the old ladies in the group offered to hide me because they didn't want the Sandinistas to take me out of the country. I told her that everybody knew me, that I was not a criminal or a delinquent, that there was no reason for me to hide.

I proceeded to my office where there were two security officers in front of the doors, waiting for me. I introduced myself, and offered to tell them anything that they required. They asked me to show them my documents proving my residence in Nicaragua as a foreigner. I told them that my documents were in the hands of the Immigration Department, because, according to Nicaraguan laws, anybody who has to leave the country has to leave their documents with them, and I had just returned from a trip to the U.S. and I hadn't had the time to go get them. So, they asked me to show them my passport. I said that it was in my room and that I could go and pick it up. They, in fact, insisted on me picking it up.

On my way out of the residence of the Salesian priests I found another one of my brother salesians. He told me that they didn't want to only see my documents but rather to deport me as they had with the other Father, Juaquin Montero. When I came out, I talked to the two security officers who were waiting for me. I said, "Neither you nor I are children. We are grown up people, so why don't we speak clearly of what we are going to do." I said to them, "If you are going to take me away with Father Montero, I only request enough time to get together my belongings, especially things that have a sentimental value to me, like the pictures of my brother and friends." They told me not to worry, that all they wanted to do was to check on my documents, and that it would take 20 minutes. I would be back. To my surprise, when we were inside the car, I realized that we were heading not toward the Immigration office but to the airport. At the airport, Captain Mario Mejilla, the General Director of Immigration, was waiting for me. He told me that permission to reside in the country had been suspended. I told him that I respected the decision of the Sandinista government, but I requested his help to understand the reasons behind it. He said that he was going to explain that to me later. Half an hour later, we were all in a room with the other regular priests who were going to be expelled, and he came back again, and I asked him the same question. And then he said, "For some of you, the rationale is personal charges against you. For the rest, it is circumstances that are forcing us to do it." When I was on my way to the airplane, I stopped him again and asked him the same question. And then he replied, "We have had a whole lot of patience with you. We have put up with a lot, but now we are obligated to make this decision." I asked him to explain this statement and to tell me in which way I personally provoked them to make that decision. Then he said, "You are not responsible, but we have been forced to make this decision."

In Costa Rica, through the Italian Ambassador, since I am Italian, I was able to have a conversation with the Nicaraguan Ambassador to San Juan, Costa Rica, asking her for explanations about my expulsion, because everybody else received a letter and I didn't. I just didn't know why I was expelled. The Ambassador there replied that she did not know but she was going to leave for Managua the next day, and would be back in a week. In that week she would get the information. I also asked for an explanation about the official press release of the Sandinista government that she had helped distribute in Costa Rica. I asked her about it, because the official press release of the Sandinista government said that we had violated the laws of Nicaragua. I asked her how had I violated the law. We had also been accused in that press release of having exercised "intense political activity." I asked her to tell me what my political activity was. The press release had also accused us of trying to "provoke a clash between the Catholic Church in Nicaragua and the Sandinista government." I asked her to give me specifics of my participation in those activities. She said, "I do not know what to tell you, but a week from now I will have the answers." After nine days, I decided to call her because I had not heard anything from her. She said, "I still have no explanation for you." My provisional superior went to Nicaragua to meet with members of the Sandinista government. He was able to talk with Rodrigo Rieles, the Secretary of the Junta. He told my superior that there was no explanation for my expulsion but rather "orders from above." So anyway, as of today, a month and seven days later, I still do not know why I was expelled from Nicaragua. I have tried everything I could to find out why.

I feel this is very strange because of the following reasons. During the last four months, I was not physically present in Nicaragua. I was visiting my family in Italy and five days after I returned from Italy, I came to the U.S. to attend a funeral. Five days after my return from the U.S. to Nicaragua, my expulsion took place. So, I didn't have any time to do anything wrong in Nicaragua.

This seemed even more strange to me because last November, I was talking to the Minister of Education, Carlos Turnerman, and the Father Superior of the Salesians in Central America, discussing the problems of another of my Salesian brothers, who was serving at the House in Masaya. The Minister of Education, himself, talking to my superior, said, referring to me, that everything was OK with me, that they had never had any problem with me and that they were happy with the development of the community that I was heading. So, I do not understand how overnight I could have become such a bad guy. If the reason for my expulsion as it was printed in the news media had been my participation in the demonstration in solidarity with Father Pena, I want to make clear that I did not participate in that demonstration. Finally I would like to share a detail with you, and that is, that on my way out of Nicaragua I was not allowed to take anything. All I had was a passport and the clothes that I was wearing at the time.

Mr. DENTON. I'd like to open up the questions to the group. May I ask that when you do ask a question, you identify yourself for the benefit of those in the room who you may not have met before, and the office that you are coming from. Yes M'am?

Question. Why do you think that you were expelled?

Father FIANDRI. What I think, is that this was an attack, not against myself, nor my colleagues, but rather an attack against the Catholic Church, particularly the Diocese of Managua. There was a cause-effect relationship between the demonstration in support of Father Pena and the expulsion of all the priests. According to what has been said, the demonstration was over around 2:00 and the first priests started to be rounded up by the security forces by 2:30 that same day. According to words of the Vatican representatives to Managua at the airport, the expulsion of these ten priests was the clear purpose to weaken the Catholic Church in Managua in very important aspects because these ten priests were working in the very poor neigborhoods of the capitol city except Father Benito, next to me, was working with the peasants. Father Mario Madrid, on my right was working at the vocational level. I personally was working in Managua in the largest and most active youth center there is. On the other hand, if you like to hear a relevant story, I can refer you to something that happened in 1980.

Monsignor Pietro Sambi, who was the Vatican representative in Managua, in February of 1980, only a few months after the Sandinista revolution, came to visit our parish and our youth center. He was very impressed with the amount of youth with whom we were working and the extent of the religious and social activities taking place. We were visiting the diseased, the poor, the wounded and he stayed for a full day with us. That night, as he left for home, he said to me, "I don't want to scare you, but you Salesians are going to be the first ones to have troubles with the Sandinistas." I asked why. I said to him under Somoza, who were leading the congregations, persecuted religious groups, and that under him, we had brothers who had been expelled and ultimately that we worked with the people. He laughed and said, "I can tell you are really young and you don't understand how things are. You will be the first ones to run into trouble with the Sandinistas. Not because you have supported the Somoza government, nor because of your work with the people, but because you have too many people, particularly youngsters here, and they all follow you. This government will never allow you to take away from their monopoly on youth." Today five years afterwards, I understand the words of Monsignor Sambi and I know that was a prophecy.

Question. I have a question for Father La Plante. What is his opinion about the activities of the Valdivieso Center and Central American Historical Institute?

Father LA PLANTE. I think that the Central American Historical Institute is the center of the popular church, the Liberation theology and not only for Nicaragua, but for all of Central America, since it was down to just a few men after the Sandinistas came to power. In Nicaragua, with the good support they received from outside, they are organizing seminars and publishing newspapers and magazines. They keep a long series of different activities, from advocating socialism and what they call ecclesiastic Marxism. They have three different centers: one for the peasants called CEPA, one for college students, and the Central American Historical Institute, which is the main organizing body and the headquarters of the planning team. The people of Nicaragua know very well what these three organizations are. The Nicaraguan people, whose devotion and faith, in particular towards the Virgin Mary, know them very well and pay them no attention.

I am Canadian, and I know what they think of them outside of Nicaragua, and I think that the same that I can see in Canada is valid here. They claim to speak on behalf of the Catholics in Nicaragua. They also claim that all the Sandinistas in Nicaragua are with them. I believe that no more than 5% of the population supports them. The mainstream of their supporters among the church are religious persons and priests who are not Nicaraguan born. I should say that any time members of the Church, other than them want to seek some support for their own pastoral work, it becomes almost impossible because they tell you that they have already given support to other religious groups in Nicaragua who are not coordinated by me. He has proof of that with him.

Father FIANDRI. I would like to add something to those comments. I respect the opinions and beliefs of all the religious persons and priests who orbit around the Church and the Central American Historic Institute. A few of them who are the principle ideologists of the popular church, Bolina and Arguello, have always been friends of mine, although I do not share their ideas. The reasons why I do not share their ideas are as follows: first of all because I believe that if we are talking about the Church—we can not talk about a church that was formed by the people, because a church is solely and exclusively born from Jesus Christ, although it was developed by the people; secondly, I must say that it is impossible to understand the Church without communion with the Bishops and the Pope—as Christians, we must recognize that even though they are human beings with all their defects, they are intermediaries between God and us. I, therefore, believe that to cut communion with the Pope you are cutting the communion of the Church and Christ himself. In addition, I do not believe that this is the mission of the Church—to support or attack any government or any country, least in the way that the Christians are doing it, by using religious feelings, the religious institutions and the Church on behalf of the particular ideology or an individual government.

Because it is an ally of power. Historically, none of the Churches of the poor that have claimed to be for the poor people have been glorified or sustained by any temporal power, and the Church that changed the government called by the rich and the bourgeois is being vindicated and not supported by the government. I think that there's a contradiction in terms here. I also believe that as well as in Latin America, people are asking for a total separation of the historical alliance between Church and political power. The unity between the temporal power and the religious power is being criticized. People keep in mind the relationship between the Church and the Roman empire—the Western empire and Eastern empire. This relationship has damaged so badly the image of the Church, I cannot understand why now the popular church is willing to commit the same mistake in the name of revolution.

Question. I would be interested in the changes in conditions of the people and their work of the last several years, particularly in terms of things like: food, housing, jobs, and quality of life. How has it changed, if it has changed, under the Sandinista government? And what do the priests see as the trend for the next two or three years.

Father LA PLANTE. I think that there are many ways to answer this question, but I am going to answer it by referring you to what the people think and say in Nicaragua. They would say that in the country, [using a local saying,] that things are (Literally translated, "Turning the Tortilla" upside down,) going backwards.

At the present people have less food and fewer jobs in Nicaragua. I'm taking in account all the people who fled the country. Now, in order to get anything, you have to prove that you are Sandinista. In my parish of San Marcos three weeks before I was expelled, there was no corn and all food was being rationed. The excuse was that everything had to be given to the military. I know from other sources that aid that comes from overseas is given only to the Sandinista militia and the military. Canada had donated 17,000 tons of wheat and in my parish we don't have any flour. We have spent many days with no bread. If we analyze the programs of the Ministry of National Planification, we can always say that they are very well done, but the reality of the people living in Nicaragua is quite different. Analysts and college students from Canada and the U.S. visit Nicaragua. They are all very happy and pleased with the Sandinista revolution because they see that everything has been done thinking (of) and involving the people. They look at the programs on paper, but they never get to see the real people in the towns. I believe that Mario can confirm that.

Father MADRID. I would like to give you a few concrete details. You have to recognize that the Sandinista government, in fact, has done a few good things on behalf of the Nicaraguan people at the educational level, at the health care level, and housing level. But at the same time, you have to take into account that the situation in Nicaragua can be compared to an iceberg. We all know that we can see an iceberg is only ⅒ of an ice mountain and that there is no problem. However, ⅑ of that iceberg is under water and those are the ones that cause the problem. In Nicaragua, things happen as in my example of the iceberg. Specifically, first, the educational level. It is true that the Sandinista government has built many schools. But why? Because each one of those schools are a means for ideological indoctrination of youngsters and adults. As proof last year the Sandinistas reformed the educational programs. It is the only program all over the Country, with only one text for students. The line of thought, historically and philosophically, is the Marxist thought and the class struggle. All spiritual or nontranscendental ideas are immediately taken out. The 1980 literacy National Campaign was described by Father Ferdinando Cardenal, director of that particular campaign, not as an educational program but as a political program using education.

And I continue. Second, regarding the health and care services, the Sandinista government has built a few medical care centers and has supplied vaccines against disease that were common among our children. I would like to point out something that I think is important. The only way you can benefit from all these is through the Sandinista's organizations. For example, the Sandinista Defense Committees, the Sandinista youth, the Sandinista Womens Association, etc. In other words, there is nothing you can do unless you belong to the party and go through the party to get any of these (health and care services).

At the housing level, I would like to present the case of something that happened in my own parish. Many people without housing obtain a license from the government to occupy an empty lot that did not belong to the government but to private citizens. They were allowed to set up their shanties there. In the last four years those people have been forced to participate in every single political demonstration of the Sandinista Front and to become a member of the mob ("Las Turbas"), the divine mobs, which are "storm troopers" for the Sandinistas. For example, when the Pope arrived and visited us, these people were forced to go and attend a mass, not as Christians or as members of a parish, but as members of the Sandinista committee mobs. The one in charge of the Sandinista Defense in that particular neighborhood, threatened them if they attempted to get close to the parish even if they would need help. To us who have a plan for building houses for these people, we are in agreement with (the people of) that community. During four years the Sandinistas did not allow us to enter, I asked myself, what is more important to a person to have food, housing, education or dignity. Are all these the same worth if the price you have to pay for them is to give away your dignity as a human being? I personally believe that it will be absolutely immoral for me, as a priest, to pretend to convert to my own church everybody by giving them money, food, or material goods. I think by the same token it is also immoral for any government in any part of the world to utilize for political purposes the people, by taking control of their bare necessities for survival. Everything that I have said has been without denying certain good things that the government has done.

Father LA PLANTE. I would like to add two details, although we have heard Father Fiandri and the details are more than enough to have a good idea. Just to emphasize the scarcity or shortage of certain things. In my community of Masaya, I was in charge of the parish, but I was living at the high school. Our project director would go out and try to get around 30 bags of cement for the construction projects that we were conducting at my school. He had to go to a couple of different bureaucrats, who had to first authorize the selling of these materials. After two weeks, the Sandinistas released a decree authorizing for me to be sold one bag of cement.

Another example. Shortly after I arrived in Nicaragua, I had problems with my blood pressure, it was very low. My doctor, who had also been my pupil, prescribed four different products to regulate my blood pressure. He said, go and see which one of these (drugs) you can get. I went to every single one of the drugstores in Masaya and I could not find any of them. I asked the doctor later, what do you do in an emergency with this situation? And he said, well, our patient dies.

Question. I would like to direct this to Father Madrid. I am curious. What is the government's attitudes in regard to schools run by the Church, such as the one you work for?

Father MADRID. They impose the program and we have to follow it by the letter. Periodically they send supervisors and they go to observe the classroom. I taught Spanish there. The lectures they imposed upon me were speeches from the commanders we had to analyze in our classes.

Father FIANDRI. I would also like to add, it is mandatory in all the schools on every level, to teach something that I believe is taught only in Nicaragua. First of all, there is not one national flag, but two. The Nicaraguan, blue and white, and Sandinista, red and black. In the official ceremonies in our schools it is mandatory to sing both anthems—the national anthem and the Sandinista anthem. Within the schools the only ones allowed to organize any type of activity are those youngsters who belong to the Sandinista youth. Everybody else is forbidden from doing anything. What they teach for Nicaraguan kids to read is the history of the Sandinista Front not the national history. Everything is praising the victories and successes of the national duration of the Sandinista Front.

Mr. DENTON. (Referring back to the previous question) I'd like to follow up just for a second on your question, and that is to focus for a moment, which I think (the gentleman) was trying to do, on the differences between the Somoza regime the Sandinista regime in the areas of human rights and freedoms of assembly, worship, dissension, and so on.

Father LA PLANTE. I was expelled from Nicaragua by both Somoza and by the Sandinistas. Our organization or co-operative was negated under Somoza, but everything that we have worked for ten years has been declared invalid by the Sandinistas. Somoza did not approve of a school for adults in my parish. The Sandinistas have approved the schools, but they run their programs. I worked under Somoza for seven years in literacy campaigns with the peasants. But, under the Sandinistas we are not allowed to conduct a private literacy campaign, they control that. When I visited in my jeep under Somoza my fellow peasants, I found military posts and they would check what I had in my jeep. But under the Sandinistas, they go to each one of the communities I visted after I leave and they tell the peasants "don't mind him, he's an agent of the CIA". That was only small in comparison. I remember that under Somoza we had construction, we did not lack food, or the basics to survive. We had everything we needed to satisfy basic needs. At the present, since January, you cannot get any cement for construction or tin roofs for the shacks of the peasants. Under Somoza you could have, but under the Sandinistas you can not, build a church or school without approval from the Sandinistas. And if a priest is promoting the activity they (Sandinistas) will systematically deny permission to conduct such activity. Under Somoza, I was considered a communist. Under the Sandinistas, I was expelled for being a counter-revolutionary. But the funny thing is that I did exactly the same under both. All I do is I love the Nicaraguans and I love my Church.

Father FIANDRI. I would like to answer that question. I do not know if you know, or you have heard that the main officers and the main institutions first persecuted under Somoza are exactly the same persons, individuals and organizations being persecuted by Sandinistas today. I will give you some examples. The Catholic Church, in particular Monsignor Obando, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, the La Prensa newspaper, the CPN or Workers Central Union, Radio Cordorscion, the Miskito Indians. At a personal level, I can say as Father Benito said, that under Somoza, I was considered communist and subversive. During the war, the National Guard wanted to execute me. Today, I am considered counter-revolutionary, fascist and a CIA agent. Now, a little thought of mine, that Somoza as a leader certainly was a cruel dictator and a criminal. I believe that in Nicaragua nobody wants to go back to a rule like Somoza. Nevertheless, Somoza killed everybody who did something against him but left alone everybody else who had nothing to do with him. He was "innocent", as he did not (personally) participate in any activity against them. The Sandinista government also persecutes those who are fighting against them. However, they do not respect anybody else who chooses to remain neutral because they want to force everyone to become a Sandinista. In other words, before (under Somoza) you could remain neutral, if you chose to do so. Today you are forced to become a Sandinista, or you are not allowed to live. He who is not a Sandinista is a second class citizen, exposed to anything they wish to do to him.

Question. The last point seems to be a very important one. The question of neutrality, I explored with the Secretary of the Conference for Religious Experience in Nicaragua, my own Dominican Priest, Father Lamera Garcia. And also, I've discussed this with some of the Jesuits and Maryknolls. I am surprised that some of these religious priests, of the Jesuit and Dominican order, will say that, in agreement with Father "to be a good Christian, a good Catholic, you must be a Sandinista." There is no possibility of neutrality. I've heard the same thing. I'm wondering why the people in the United States cannot understand this point.

Father FIANDRI. There is a very concrete motive. I believe, although I am not a sympathizer of Hitler, one of his sayings is, "to inform is to govern." During the nine years I spent in Nicaragua, I never sent a report or any information to anyone.

Question. You mean outside the country?

Father FIANDRI. The Sandinistas and the popular church have a whole network of information to send press releases and everything they want overseas and control international public opinion. That is the reason why in many parts of Canada and the U.S., where we have visited, there was only one side of the picture. This is probably our fault, we never speak out. It was also dangerous to speak out. For example, I was in Italy in March, April and June of this year and many people asked me to participate in conferences, seminars, interviews and debates. I refused to get involved in any of those bacause I wanted to return to Nicaragua. I know that telling the truth, giving complete details meant not to be able to return to Nicaragua. Unfortunately, there is only one side of the story being told.

It is easy to believe that that is the truth, although it is not. But I can give you hundreds of cases of people who have lost their jobs because they refused to become Sandinistas; who have lost their jobs because they have refused to join the Sandinista's militias, who, in theory, or at least they say, so are volunteer militias. Many families had to leave their neighborhoods because they did not participate in any meetings of the Sandinista organizations. They were considered counter-revolutionaries. Many families, who for the same reasons are being considered revolutionaries, have been injured by the mobs. The mobs have hurt them physically and damaged their properties. From an ideological point of view, I believe that if you heard that coming from the Dominicans and the Jesuits. I find that very logical. Because the Minister of Education, a Jesuit, Father Cardenal, for him, to be a Sandinista, to be a Christian, to be a Priest, is all the same thing. For me it is not the same thing.

Question. I'd like to comment on that last point. Could you explain the dynamics of the Church, the Archdiocese of Managua, where the Dominicans, the Jesuits, the Maryknolls have completely different views than you do, and many of the politicians of the U.S. listen to people like Sister Peggy Gilly, Father William Callahan, Peter (Marketia) and go through the list? Why, in the religious community, the religious orders, is there such a complete divergence of views: Are there more views than we know about?

Father FIANDRI. It is true that the only thing that gets published from the popular church in Nicaragua is around what the Jesuits, Dominicans and the Maryknolls say. I have talked to them because, although I do not share their ideas as I've said before, I am friends with them. This is what they have told me. They believe to work on behalf of their own people, there is no way other than to work through the Sandinistas. Therefore, because you want to help the people, and you want to do good for the people, then you have to support the Sandinistas. They also believe that in the same way that Thomas Aquinas used the philosophy of Aristotle to explain the Christian philosophy, they think that they can do exactly the same thing by using the philosophy and ideology of Karl Marx. They don't see any contradiction in Christianity and Marxism. As for the second part of your question, as to whether or not there is a third point of view, or a third way, I don't know if this is the best way, but it is a path that we, the Salesians, follow and continue to follow in Nicaragua—not to support or serve any government but the people. We are not aligned with any government, but simply we walk side by side with the people. We, in Nicaragua, have never spoken neither against the Sandinista government nor on behalf of it, because we believe that it is a free choice that every individual has to make. Our duty is to walk with the people, regardless of the government that is in power. It is the Church's mission, and therefore the Priest's mission, not to support or topple down any government, but to develop Christian consciences among the people.

Father HUERTAS. I would also like to make a comment on what you have said about Saint Thomas and the Christianization of Aristotle's thoughts. One of our best Nicaraguan authors, who was also a wonderful Christian, when giving a lecture to a clerical reunion, was asked if Aristotle had been Christianized and if so was it possible to do the same thing with Marx. He answered, it's possible to Christianize Marx. But the mistake is to Marxicize Christ, which is in fact what the popular church is trying to do.

Father FIANDRI. There are many publications coming out of the Center Valdivieso, the Central American International Historic Institute. Based on authentically Christian and Evangelical assumptions, all of them lead to the same practical conclusions—to be Christian is to support the Sandinista Front—to be Christian means to fulfill your duty as a revolutionary. This has been the way they continue to prostitute religion and nothing else. At this very moment there are a series of publications that I can give you, two titles. One title is, "Are You Afraid of Communism? I Am Not" published by the Central American Historic Institute. The other one is Capitalism and Socialism for Beginners, published by the Centro Valdivieso, which intends to explain that Karl Marx was atheist and imperialist, because of the circumstances in which he was born. Today, that very same Marxism can be different, so that today you have nothing to be fearful of Marxism as Christians. Incorrectly, you can be as Cardenal said, Christian and Marxist at the same time.

Question. Are you going to attempt to go back to Nicaragua like Bishop Slafton did, and at the price of returning to continued silence?

Mr. DENTON. I don't think (the translator) picked up the end of your question. Would yo say that again?

Question. I happened to see Bishop Slafton the day he got back to Nicaragua. It was clear then that the price of his return to Nicaragua was to remain silent for the International press. Is this the same price that these Fathers contemplate having to make?

Interpreter [for Father Huertas]. He said that, no, no conditions have been imposed upon them. They were just expelled. This is the letter that they received. It is in reference to one of them and says, "By this means we notify you to the resolution taken by the Immigration and General Direction cancelling from now on your condition as resident in Nicaragua. As of this notification, you will have to leave the country. Sincerely, Captain Mejia, General Director of Immigration and Organization."

Mr. DENTON [to the Interpreter]. Let me ask you would you let the gentleman ask the question again and translate precisely that which he asks. I don't think that his point has gotten to the priests in the translating.

Question When Bishop Slafton returned in January to Nicaragua, I, by accident, met him in the Foreign Ministry. It was clear to me, and events have proven this to be true, that the understanding that made possible his return, was Bishop Slafton's silence about the events in his Diocese. Is this the type of agreement that you too will have to make to return?

Father LA PLANTE. Bishop Slafton was not expelled, but we were expelled, that is the difference.

Question He was declared dead, perhaps worse.

Father MADRID. If I return to Nicaragua I would return as a hero. The Sandinistas will not like this. There have been several cases of expulsions in the past, and in this case, they have been not allowed to return. There were no advantages (to the Sandinistas) to do so.

Father FIANDRI. There is no further litigation. We were just expelled. We do not expect to have imposed any conditions to return because we expect to remain outside. Unless the Sandinistas make a very, very special exception this time, we don't foresee any possibility of returning to Nicaragua. Perhaps the conditions will be to free some political prisoners. In that case, I would be required to admit that I have been guilty and that I have conducted activities against the government. In order words, I will have to make a public confession, which is something that I will not do, because I am not guilty of anything.

Mr. DENTON. I would like to point out, however, because it sounds as if this may contradict what I said earlier, that there is a delegation of Catholic Bishops who are going to visit Nicaragua in the next week. They are attempting—this is a group representing the Catholic Bishops' Conference—they are attempting to negotiate for their reentry. I think that what the Father is saying, of course, is that they do not anticipate that negotiations will be successful. Are there other questions? I want to thank everybody for coming and for taking the time to allow these gentlemen to speak with you. They'll be up front for a couple of minutes. If anyone would like to pursue certain points, by all means, come forward.

Thank you very much.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am going to conclude with these remarks and reserve the right to ask for recognition later, but in deference to my colleagues, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I shall vote against the resolution to provide $14 million in additional military aid to the "Contras", the rebel forces fighting in Nicaragua to overthrow the government of that country.

The resolution is short and straightforward. It provides:

That the Congress approve the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

I shall vote against it because it implements a policy toward Nicaragua which, in my judgment, is wrong for two reasons. It is illegal and it is not working.

The Contras say they are fighting to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. Any military aid we provide the Contras, therefore, will be used for that purpose, regardless of how it is characterized here in the United States. That is so obvious that even President Reagan, after years of claiming otherwise, has not publicly acknowledged that the purpose of his policy is to change the government in Nicaragua.

Both the United States and Nicaragua are members of the Organization of American States. Article 15 of the charter of that organization prohibits the "direct or indirect intervention in the internal affairs of any member state."

Thus, the current U.S. policy of providing direct financial and military assistance to the Contras, whose goal, as acknowledged and supported by President Reagan, is to overthrow by force the Nicaraguan Government, is a clear violation of our obligations under the OAS Treaty. Under our legal system our treaty obligations have the force of domestic law. We, therefore, are violating our own law as well.

The interests of the United States in Central America do not hinge solely on the makeup of the Government of Nicaragua. They hinge more broadly on preventing war, promoting democracy, reducing Soviet influence, and helping to improve the lives of the people in that region.

The President has diagnosed the problem in Central America as Soviet-inspired revolution. While there can be no doubt that the Soviets are trying to exploit the situation, it is equally clear that they did not create it. Since 1821, when the Central American republics gained their independence from Spain, they have been the scene of violent conflict, largely growing out of the political and social conditions there.

The President's solution to this problem does not even reflect his diagnosis of it.

His solution is to provide military aid to rebels seeking to overthrow the governing regime in Nicaragua.

But whether or not those rebels succeed in their objective, that will not resolve the problem the President has diagnosed. If the problem is Soviet adventurism in the hemisphere, and I believe it is that in part, the proper course is to address the source of the problem directly.

We cannot operate on the assumption that a rebel victory in Nicaragua—of whatever ideological persuasion—will eliminate the desire of the Soviets to take advantage of problems in the region or to encourage the Cubans to exacerbate differences in the region.

The President's current course is not in the best interests of the United States. It is a shortsighted policy that ignores the facts of history, alienates other Latin American nations, and plays directly into the hands of the Sandinista regime.

The fact that American Marines occupied Nicaragua for several decades in this century and that America placed in power and supported the dictatorial Somoza regime is something that Americans may prefer to forget.

But it is something that Nicaraguans remember. It is a historical fact that the Sandinista regime emphasizes to maintain popular support and opposition to the Contras. American actions that ignore that historical fact are not based on the reality of history.

The United States, by virtue of its size and economic strength, is the dominant nation in this hemisphere. For some, our dominance is a target of convenient rhetoric by which they impugn our motives and condemn our behavior. That is one of the inevitable consequences of political and military power.

But the influence that stems from our size can only be maintained if we remain true to our own principles. We cannot espouse independence in theory and undertake intervention in practice. We cannot espouse human rights in theory and accept violation of those rights in practice. We cannot espouse political liberty in theory and support repression and censorship in practice. We cannot do those things and remain the United States of America.

The Soviet Union does those things: It says it supports independence but crushes opposition by force; it preaches human rights but practices political repression. The result is that the only influence left to the Soviet Union is the influence that stems from the force of arms. There is no moral basis for the Soviet system and that is why it is failing and must ultimately fall.

The problem with a U.S. policy that mirrors Soviet policy is that it effectively negates the important differences between our nations. It makes us look the same to those whose allegiance we are trying to win, when we should be trying to emphasize the differences.

Our Nation's interests cannot be promoted in the long run by a policy that consists almost entirely of the delivery of weapons to our favored surrogates and ignores the realities of Latin American development and politics.

Long-term stability—which is our national goal—demands that the region not become an arena for superpower conflicts.

Our Nation's permanent long-term interest in Latin America is to encourage peaceful economic development and to encourage Latin American solutions to Latin American problems.

The policy of financing the Contras as surrogates for an American presence does not further those interests. It does not help end the violence and it does not encourage the search for local solutions to local problems.

If our influence in the hemisphere comes to rest only on our military power, we will have set the stage for repeated, lengthy, and inconclusive tests of military strength in the region for decades to come.

That outcome would not only be a disservice to our children, who will inherit our legacy in the region, it would be a manifest mishandling of our Nation's purposes in the larger world.

We are a nation which leads by the strength of law and example, not by the barrel of a gun. We are very strong militarily, but it is a strength for the defense of liberty, not for conquest. As a result, our material wealth, our political liberties, and our personal freedoms are in effect the goals that almost all revolutionaries promise to their followers.

Our strength and our ability to ultimately prevail rests on our ideals. A purely military response—which has so far been the administration's response in Central America—is a resort to the least resonant American strength.

It is surprising that President Reagan, who has demonstrated such a clear grasp of the essential differences between our system and the Soviet system, and who has effectively promoted the elements of our system that other nations try to emulate, should be so unwilling to recognize that those differences are particularly potent in our own hemisphere, where knowledge of the United States is widespread and distortions of our national character hard to maintain.

But instead of pursuing our strengths, which would best be served by energizing, not undercutting the democracies of Central America, the so-called Contadora nations—Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela—the administration has chosen to emphasize military force, a choice which the Sandinista regime has exploited.

The course the administration has chosen to pursue has given the Sandinistas a potent propaganda weapon. It is a course that relies on a surrogate force whose ability to prevail is doubtful. It is a course that alienates our Latin American neighbors. It is a course that has little public support here at home.

As a result, it is a course with little chance of success but immense risk of failure.

Legally, as I noted earlier, financing a rebellion against a government we recognize is prohibited by article 15 of the charter of the Organization of American States, to which the United States belongs.

Practically, $14 million or any similar sum will not enable the Contras to prevail in the military conflict in the foreseeable future, according to the administration's own estimates of the military situation.

Politically, we risk squandering public support in this country for the legitimate use of American force, when it is necessary and appropriate, in an inconclusive debate over the relative merits of two Nicaraguan factions, both of whose commitment to democratic principles has been questioned.

And because our interest is to maintain our hemisphere free of Soviet intervention, we risk focusing attention on Soviet surrogates rather than dealing directly with the Soviets themselves, although it is their activities to which we are taking exception.

Central America is a region about which most of us know too little and whose importance we generally underestimate.

In this hemisphere, we confront regional realities born of our history and our size. On the one hand, earlier American interventions in the region have left many of our neighbors suspicious and instinctively hostile to any display of American power. On the other hand, our size and power allow many of our neighbors to blame their own shortcomings on the United States.

I do not accept the premise that the shortcomings of the current regime in Nicaragua are a direct result of U.S. actions. Nor do I believe we should give credence to such claims.

At the same time, an American-imposed military solution in Nicaragua would create as many new problems as it might resolve.

That sums up the impasse we face. It is an impasse that will continue so long as we are unwilling to focus on the source of our problems in the region and deal directly with that source.

We can and should make available essential humanitarian aid to those who have suffered from the war. We can and should pursue the regional Contadora process energetically and substantively.

That process offers a peaceful and meaningful path to progress led by the democratic nations of Central America whose interest in preventing a regional war is even greater than ours.

Their plan calls for a halt to the shipment of arms into the region; the verified withdrawal of all foreign forces from the region; the protection of human rights and a commitment to free and open elections throughout the region. That is the course we should follow in our interest and in the interest of the people of Central America.

DEATH OF SAM ERVIN

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina for a very sad announcement.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. It is my sad duty to report to the Senate the passing of the Honorable Sam J. Ervin, Jr., who served with such distinction for so long in this body. Senator Ervin had been in failing health for some time now, and he passed away this afternoon at 4:15 at Bowman Gray Medical Center of North Carolina Baptist Hospital in Winston-Salem.

Mr. President, I have never known a more remarkable American than Sam Ervin. The 2 years that I was privileged to serve in the Senate as his junior colleague will always rank as a major blessing for me. In the years since he left the Senate, he has been my mentor, my adviser, and my friend. We did not belong to the same political party, but I always consulted him on constitutional matters because he was recognized across this land as a constitutional scholar. He never hesitated to help. As a matter of fact, on so many occasions, I was amazed at the inordinate amount of time he spent to be helpful in clarifying and explaining various complex issues that came before the Senate.

Obviously, Mr. President, I am grieved by the passing of Senator Ervin. A courageous giant has fallen, but America is far better because of his life, his dedication, and his unfailing fidelity to principles that deserve to survive.

Mr. President, at a later time I will have more to say about this distinguished American, but I know that the time of the Senate today is short and I will make no further comment except to say that Mrs. Helms and I extend our deepest sympathies to "Miss Margaret," Senator Sam's dear wife, his children, and his grandchildren.

I do thank the Senator for yielding for this sad announcement.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR SAM ERVIN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to add my voice to those expressing profound sorrow at the loss of our former colleague, Sam Ervin.

Senator Ervin exemplified the highest qualities a U.S. Senator can possess—honesty, integrity, dedication to his constituents, and his country.

During his 20 years in the Senate, Senator Ervin never forgot his North Carolina roots. I have always had a special admiration and appreciation for his independence and his natural, down-to-earth sense of humor.

Sam Ervin served in the Senate during a turbulent period and saw major shifts in the power structure in the Senate. Even though I did not always agree with him, during that entire period he displayed a remarkable consistency in his reverence for the Constitution.

For Sam Ervin, the word and spirit of the Constitution dictated the response to policy questions. He never tried to twist the Constitution to rationalize a particular viewpoint. He believed the Constitution means what it says and let the words of the Founding Fathers guide his views on the issues of the day.

Sam Ervin led a long and productive life. A life his family and friends can look to with great pride. His friends in the Senate will miss his presence.

FUNDS FOR SUPPORTING MILITARY OR PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS IN NICARAGUA

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, the sad words of Senator HELMS remind us that the torch of leadership is being passed from one generation to the next. In the last hours we have heard a lot from a new generation of Senators in opposition to our involvement in Central America. I rise to speak in favor of a strong America that plays an active role in the world for good, an America that advances the cause of peace and freedom.

I look at this world and let me tell you what I see. From the mountains of Central Asia to the tropical jungles of Latin America I see human liberty under assault. Ideology and fanaticism imperil the hopes of men and women for peace and self-government. Throughout our history, Americans have believed that freedom is the birthright of all people, that victories against poverty are greatest and peace most secure where people are free.

We cannot, we should not, be passive when freedom is under attack. We must stand by our democratic allies. We must keep faith with those who are fighting tyranny on this continent and throughout the world, from Afghanistan to Nicaragua.

The question we must answer today is very straightforward: Do we stand by friendly people and oppose Marxist expansion, or do we do nothing?

I must observe that there has been a great change in the body politic. It seems that Republicans and Democrats have changed places. Democrats today are talking like Republicans of old. What has happened to that great Democratic tradition of a strong and active America?

It was Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, who believed passionately that the world had to be made safe for democracy. Democratic Presidents led America in World War II and Korea and, yes, in Vietnam. They believed that America had a responsibility to advance the cause of peace and freedom. Often in those years it was Republicans who argued in favor of isolationism.

It was a Democratic President, John Kennedy, who urged the American people to "pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, in order to assure the survival and success of liberty."

Where are those speeches today? We certainly do not hear them from the other side of the aisle. But I suggest to my colleagues that the words of John Kennedy are as powerfully relevant to America in the 1980's as they were when spoken two decades ago.

What has happened since Vietnam, since the decade of the 1970's? Democrats seem to have adopted the view that America should retreat to her shores. More times than not, they oppose a strong America and defense spending. They seem to deny that we have national interests that are worth protecting. They seem to deny that freedom anywhere in the world, especially in our hemisphere, is worth advancing.

It seems that today it is Republicans who advocate the view that, like it or not, America is the leader of the free world, and there are times we must act like it.

Let me talk about the Sandinistas. By their own words and their actions, the Sandinistas are Marxists. The Sandinista regime has betrayed its promises of political pluralism, a free press, and a mixed economy. The Sandinistas now export revolution in the Americas, aided and instructed by the Soviets, the Cubans, the Libyans, the North Koreans. Does that not tell us something? We judge people by their words and their actions and also by the company they keep?

Today we have heard impassioned speeches opposing aid to the Contras but saying at the same time to the Sandinistas, "We implore you to give your people freedom and to put away the weapons of war." Where in the pages of history has any Marxist government established a free and open society and lived in peace with its neighbors? Can we find any precedent for that Scenario in the history of Nicaragua's Marxist allies—the Soviet Union, Cuba, North Korea? Of course not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used his 5 minutes.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I ask for 2 more minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 2 more minutes, but I do so reluctantly, because we are trying to shorten the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TRIBLE. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. President, as one of my colleagues said at lunch today, anyone in the Senate who believes that Danny Ortega is going to drop his commandante fatigues and put on a pinstripe suit of respectability is absolutely delirious. How naive can we be?

Today we can provide a small amount of assistance and a large symbolic boost to the opponents of the Sandinista regime or we can do nothing.

I want a clearcut vote because I believe our action or our inaction will have a substantial impact, and I want the American people to hold each of us accountable. Whatever we do, I hope history will judge us correct. But I must say that I believe our failure to provide assistance today will only create greater problems and greater challenges in the days ahead.

Not taking action today will only encourage the Marxist regime to further consolidate its power, further suppress freedom, and further export revolution and terror in this world. What a legacy we leave to our children! May they have the opportunity and the courage to act, should we fail to do our duty.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time remains to those in opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority has 45 minutes and 45 seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. I will try to be brief, because a number of Senators wish to speak.

Mr. President, today the Senate is considering the most important foreign policy issue it will face this year: Whether Congress will allow President Reagan to continue a covert war to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

The issue is not whether we should give $14 million in humanitarian aid to the Contras. The real issue is whether Congress is going to sign a blank check for the President to lead this country down the road to direct U.S. military intervention in a Central American war, a war the American people do not want.

So that no Senator on either side of the aisle misunderstands what we are deciding here, I emphasize that the President has clearly spelled out what he intends to do about Nicaragua, both in an open report and in a classified report to Congress. Obviously, I cannot and will not go into the classified report here. However, before Senators vote today, I strongly recommend that they read that classified report and understand its contents.

I stress the importance of reading the classified information, because later if things begin to go wrong in Central America, such as happened last year, when there was a CIA mining episode, or we see on television some ghastly atrocity committed by the Contras, or the United States slides more deeply into a quagmire, I do not want any Senator to plead ignorance. I do not want anybody rushing to the floor, as happened a few days after we voted for aid to the Contras last year, saying: "I didn't understand about that mining incident. Can I please change my vote?"

If that happens, I promise I will come immediately to the floor and remind everyone that the information on the President's long-range plan for making Nicaragua cry "uncle" was there for every Senator to read.

Mr. President, I hoped this Contra issue would not come to a head-on confrontation. Whichever way it turns out, and I do not doubt the President can twist enough arms to get at least 51 votes, the country will be the loser. A close vote will signal not unity, but division, not leadership, but confusion. No one, friend or adversary, will be able to predict what our foreign policy will be.

We could have, and should have, avoided this dilemma. It was clear months ago that support for the President's policy of overthrowing the Sandinista was eroding. Senators are hearing from the country, and they know the American people do not support this illegal, immoral and counterproductive secret war.

My instinct was to try to work with the President and my colleagues in the Senate, Republican and Democrat, to forge a bipartisan approach to Nicaragua. I heard all sides in the conflict—the Sandinistas, the Contras, and the administration—loudly claim they wanted to stop the fighting and start talking. I wanted to take them at their word.

So, far as I was concerned $14 million for food, medicine, clothing, and shelter was a small price to pay to stop the killing and open the door for negotiations. If both sides would agree to a cease-fire, and the President would agree to talk again to the Sandinistas, there would be a chance for peace. The alternative was more war.

However, there was one point upon which I could not compromise. I cannot and will not agree to any approach, alternative, policy or deal which keeps the United States supporting a secret war against Nicaragua, managed by the CIA, financed by the American taxpayers, and aimed at overthrowing a nation with which we maintain normal diplomatic relations.

A number of us have tried very hard over the past several days to reach a bipartisan coalition on this issue. I was one of the six Democrats at the White House for 8 hours yesterday, working with the President, the Vice President, the Deputy Secretary of State, and others, trying to agree on something that would allow the President to signal to the countries of Central America that he had bipartisan support for a new approach. There were a number of Republican Senators there as well.

We worked hard to find an alternative that would avoid this pointless confrontation. We offered to help find a way to have a mutual ceasefire and renewed negotiations with the Sandinistas in support of the Contadora process. We looked at ways to provide real humanitarian aid, not disguised military assistance, to the Contras who would agree to stop fighting, through the Red Cross, the United Nations, or some other independent mechanism.

If the United States remains committed to overthrowing the Sandinistas, the Contras cannot do it alone. Sooner or later, the President will have either abandon them to defeat or send in American military force.

After those hours and hours of talks, the bottom line of the administration never really changed. I frankly do not believe the President will ever change his view that we cannot live with Nicaragua and we must overthrow the Sandinistas.

I cannot support the President's course, nor that of his supporters who have put together different routes to the same goal. the Contra insurgency is a failure, a running sore for the CIA, and a blot on this Nation's conscience. We must follow a new approach toward Nicaragua, one that does not try to substitute a covert action for a foreign policy. It is long past time we used diplomacy and negotiations to find peace in that tortured region.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the effort to find a solution to this problem did not work. I think it was an effort entered into in good faith by both Republicans and Democrats in this Chamber. It was a serious attempt on the part of Senators from both sides of the aisle to avoid this confrontation.

I would hope that everyone would be able to avoid partisanship now. We sincerely tried an alternative that would show a united United States and not a divided Government that pursues a policy by the barest of majority.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time does the Senator seek?

Mr. NICKLES. Five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the Senator 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to express my strong support for continued aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. I believe we have a proposal before us which should be enacted before we discover that communism has become the ruling faction in Central America and masses of refugees are fleeing to our country for our continued aid and support. Just because this may not happen tomorrow, does not mean it will not happen in the not too distant future. We must take some action now.

We have heard a lot of discussion today about military aid. I think everyone should know that this resolution before us accompanied with the President's letter is humanitarian aid and not military aid.

We are looking at $14 million to be provided as humanitarian aid to assist the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. Abandoning those individuals in Nicaragua who are fighting for the freedom of their people, sends a signal not only to Nicaragua, but to the entire world, that the United States is backing down on our commitment to help others in the quest for freedom. On March 19, a panel of renowned individuals from Europe presented a strong case for continued assistance to Nicaragua. They expressed the concern from citizens of their countries who fear that if the United States refuses, once again, in aid our closest neighbors, we may refuse when others need us. Although I do not think we would abandon any country who needed our assistance, I can certainly understand their fear in light of our struggle to provide aid to Nicaragua. The world is watching our action on this matter.

While the Nicaraguan Government has been claiming to seek peaceful solutions to the problems in their country, they have been militarizing Nicaragua to the extent that the military presence has been increased to 62,000 active duty personnel. These troops are supplemented by approximately 60,000 members of reserve and militia units. Huge amounts of hardware, including at least 340 tanks and armored vehicles, artillery pieces and rocket launchers, patrol boats, dozens of helicopters, including several MI-24's, the Soviets' top-of-the-line attack gunship, are in Nicaragua. The fact is that the Sandinista military now exceeds all legitimate defensive needs and has openly stated that they wish to export their revolution to neighboring countries. I find this to be very disturbing.

Mr. President, to highlight the way the Nicaraguan Government operates, I want to bring out something that my colleagues have not, and that is a recent example of repression that has been exhibited by the Government of Nicaragua just this last week in an incident with one of my constituents. Mr. Larry Jones, president of the organization called Feed the Children, was told by the Nicaraguan Government that he could deliver food, clothing, Bibles, and religious tracts to the people of Nicaragua. However, last week, the Government confiscated 228,000 pounds of food, 25,000 pounds of clothing, 5,000 Bibles, 50,000 religious tracts, and 10,000 sermons written in Spanish. A private citizen attempted to deliver goods to the people of Nicaragua only to have his help thwarted by the Government of Nicaragua. At a time when Nicaragua is being promoted as a free and peace-loving nation, this is hardly the response that one would expect to an offer of goodwill.

In addition to this, the refugee situation in Nicaragua is already increasing to unacceptable levels. More than a quarter of a million refugees have fled Nicaragua since the Sandinistas took control. This number will continue to increase as people fight for their lives in Nicaragua.

The time is now. We cannot continue to sit by and watch the Soviet and Cuban influence and domination increase in Nicaragua while we withhold aid which could be useful to the people who are fighting for democracy and against communism. It is not only the freedom of Nicaragua that is at stake here.

We have heard many state that we do not want to have the United States trying to exert power and influence in this region in the world but totally ignoring the fact that the Soviet Union and their Cuban surrogates have very much been trying to exert their power and influence and domination throughout this region.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I think we should not turn our backs on the fight for democracy in Nicaragua. If we do, I fear that the Nicaragua Marxist government will continue as another Cuba in spreading repression and stifling human freedoms with military power and eventually their efforts could reach our own borders.

Let us vote today to provide Nicaragua with $14 million in aid. If we do not, it may be a vote that we will regret for a long time to come.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, what is the definition of "terrorism"? Terrorism means the suppressing, pushing, the changing of a government policy through acts of violence and acts of murder.

This is exactly what the Contras are practicing in Nicaragua.

The definition of "terrorist" as opposed to "freedom fighter" is that a terrorist is a man who goes after an indiscriminate target, including men, women, and children—civilian, nonmilitary objectives.

The freedom fighter usually aims for the military opponent in his country, not across the border against nonmilitary targets as do the Contras.

We are against terrorism. We all say what a dreadful thing it is. It is dreadful. Yet at the same time we are asked to support our terrorists, the Contras, in their operations in Nicaragua.

I would hope that we would see with clear eyes that although we say we oppose terrorism in some parts of the world, if we pass this resolution, we would be supporting terrorism in another part of the world.

Mr. President, today, the Senate will vote on whether American policy in Central America will be one of war or peace. We should recognize that whether this measure passes or not, the Senate is being asked to adopt a resolution giving the President a blank check to expend funds "for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua."

This month marks the 10th anniversary of the end of the Vietnam war, a war that began in earnest when the Senate adopted a resolution very similar to the one before us today. In 1964, the Congress adopted the Tonkin Gulf Resolution which I remember as if it were yesterday, empowering the President "to take all necessary steps, including the use of armed forces," to counter communism in Southeast Asia. Many of us who voted for that resolution later came to regret it, for we saw it lead us, step by step, deeper into a conflict whose burdens the American people were ultimately unwilling to bear.

Today, we are being asked to vote again on another resolution of that kind. We are being asked to forge another link in a chain that, I believe, will shackle America to a commitment leading to direct U.S. military involvement in a misguided effort to bring down the present Government of Nicaragua. In Vietnam, the first steps were small; but soon the stride lengthened, and we sank deeper into the morass of war. In Vietnam, the rationale for U.S. involvement constantly changed until it reached the absurdity of our having to stay in order not to undercut the validity of our security commitments around the world.

We are asked to take a small step today, but most assuredly we will be asked to take another step later, and it will be a bigger one. Already, we have been given several rationales for aiding the Contras—first, interdiction of arms to El Salvador; then giving the Sandinistas a taste of their own medicine; and, most recently, to make the Sandinistas cry "uncle." Soon, I fear, we will be told that the Contras cannot do the job alone and that direct U.S. involvement will be necessary in order to head off a defeat for U.S. policy.

The resolution before us is clothed in the garments of peace, but it actually conceals the gauntlet of war. The so-called peace proposal is really an ultimatum to the Sandinistas to accept essentially the same proposal that the Contras made on March 1. The Sandinistas rejected the Contra proposal then, and under certain circumstances, they will not agree to deal with a force led militarily by officers of the hated Somoza dictatorship, responsible for the deaths and maiming of thousands of innocent men, women, and children.

My concerns about the President's peace plan were reinforced by revelations, in the New York Times of April 17, of the President's determination on Nicaragua. According to the article, the administration is planning to significantly increase the size of the Contra forces and would seek the necessary funding for this purpose. Furthermore, it was reported that the administration had for now ruled out "direct application of U.S. military force" but warned that this course "must realistically be recognized as an eventual option, given our stakes in the region, if other policy alternatives fail." This should be evidence enough that the administration's policy is merely the tip of a very large and dangerous iceberg.

The President's Contra policy, despite what administration officials are saying, is not supported by the Contadora presidents and other leaders in Latin America; you are all aware by now of the Vatican's response to the contention by the President that the Pope supports all elements of U.S. policy in Central America. Yes, most of the Latin American presidents spoke in positive terms about the aspects of negotiation and peaceful settlement, but representing that as an endorsement of U.S. military support for the Contras is stretching a point, to say the least.

President Betancur of Colombia, one of the Contadora nations, said after his visit to the United States earlier this month that the President's plan is "no longer a peace proposal, but a preparation for war." President Betancur said that while parts of the President's initiative were "positive and constructive," other parts were in direct conflict with the goals of the Contadora process.

And that brings me to this message. The Contadora countries have worked tirelessly and diligently for over 2 years to produce a plan for real peace in the region. The President's plan totally ignores the Contadora peace process. What is really needed is a U.S. policy that totally and enthusiastically supports the Contadora peace process. Reports from the most recent Contadora meetings are very positive regarding the difficult issues of verification and the withdrawal of foreign military advisers. The Contadora nations are working on a real peace plan. U.S. policy should be supporting the efforts of the nations of the region to achieve a peaceful resolution before the conflict erupts into a full-scale war in Central America, directly involving U.S. troops.

The President has said that a vote against this resolution would be "a vote against peace." I say that it would be a vote for peace, because it would cause us to turn with earnest back to the Contadora process, which is the only genuine road to peace. Let us not, by passing this resolution, forge the shackles that will impress us into the chain gang of war. Let us refuse to take the first step, however small it is made to seem, that could soon become the march time to a war that the American people do not want and will not support.

Let us also not exaggerate the threat from Nicaragua or diminish the prospects, through creative diplomacy in concert with our allies in the region, of bringing about constructive change in Nicaragua. I hold no brief for what the Sandinistas have done with their revolution, but Nicaragua is not the Communist monolith that it is often portrayed to be. One-third of the seats in the Nicaraguan parliament are held by opposition parties, private business remains active, and the Catholic Church continues to speak its mind about the regime. I only wish that the real Communist monoliths of the world tolerated such a state of affairs.

We cannot bring about our brand of democracy, but if we tolerate less than perfect systems in Chile, Paraguay and Haiti, we can tolerate it in Nicaragua. But Nicaragua cannot be rendered benign by crude throwbacks to the bad neighbor policy of the 1920's and 1930's. Our watchword should be: Contradora, si; Contras, no.

I urge my colleagues to vote no on this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alaska has someone to yield time to over there, we have been going back and forth, and I do not want to interrupt if there is someone on that side who wishes to speak.

Mr. MATHIAS addressed the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS. I do yield 5 minutes to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield the floor?

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield with the unanimous-consent request that I be recognized immediately after the next speaker on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr STEVENS. No. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina. We are going back and forth. And the Senator from South Carolina is recognized for how many minutes?

Mr. THURMOND. Five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Six minutes.

Mr. President, I rise to voice my support for providing financial aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters. The vote that we are about to cast is not about left or right; it is about the willingness of this Nation to support democratic forces in their fight against tyranny. It is not only a choice of whether or not we will oppose Communist expansion with the resulting horrors it brings. It is a decision of whether we will support or abandon men and women who are fighting for true self-determination and a return to the democratic principles originally espoused by the Sandinista revolution.

Mr. President, it is important to note that the Contras do not demand power sharing in the Nicaraguan Government as do the Marxist guerrillas in El Salvador. The Contras merely want the Sandinista government to fulfill the promises made to the Organization of American States that included nonalignment, pluralism, freedom of religion, freedom of elections, freedom of the press, and free speech. None of these promises have been kept. That is why the opponents of the Sandinistas turned to the United States for assistance, and that is why we should continue to support them.

Critics of our support for the Contras accuse them of atrocities. They do not, however, criticize the Sandinista massacre of the Miskito Indians. The Contras have tried and executed members of the resistance who have been found guilty of committing atrocities. Has the Sandinista regime tried anyone for the genocide committed against the Miskito Indians? The answer is no, and the reason is simple. When such acts are committed by the Contras, it is aberrant behavior that is not sanctioned by the leadership of the resistance. As for the Sandinista regime, genocide is an instrument of convenience that is fully sanctioned by the leadership. In this they are comparable to other totalitarian regimes such as the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and Nazi Germany. Murder as an instrument of state policy is rarely ever punished.

Mr. President, we cannot afford another Soviet ally in this hemisphere. To say that such a situation would pose no threat to our national interests is shortsighted and unwise. We should recall that the Nicaraguan regime has offered to let the Soviets station missiles in Nicaragua and has advocated the spread of Marxist revolution throughout Central America. In addition, they have invited into their country Cubans, East Germans, Soviets, Bulgarians, Vietnamese, and members of the Palestine Liberation Organization, for the purpose of training their secret police and their military and for assisting them in spreading revolution in this hemisphere. These are certainly not the actions of a non-aligned nation that supports freedoms common in democratic societies.

Unfortunately, the Congress has a very poor record of supporting democratic forces in their battles against Marxist forces. The U.S. Congress cut off funds to the struggling Government of South Vietnam in the face of an invasion of North Vietnamese forces which was completely in violation of the Paris peace accords that the North Vietnamese had signed. The results have been well known for a decade. The Congress also vouchsafed the Communist takeover of Angola by prohibiting any material support for the democratic forces led by the courageous Jonas Savimbi. Fortunately for the free world, there is hope that Mr. Savimbi may yet prevail without our help. Now, we are faced with the choice again much closer to home. The U.S. Congress can choose to support people who are fighting for their freedom, or we can encourage the success of Marxist dictatorships by our inaction. Opposition to communism cannot consist of words alone. The words must be backed by actions, actions which at times may not be politically popular here at home, but actions which are necessary if we are to avoid even more costly repercussions in the future.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues this request for much-needed assistance.

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, many of my colleagues have been to Nicaragua, and in the region. I certainly defer to their expertise on this subject. I do not profess to be an expert on this very knotty problem. I do profess to have some understanding of the history of similar situations and this country's history in those situations. And here is a historical fact. For 35 years this country backed Somoza while he committed the most unspeakable crimes and atrocities against the people of Nicaragua. I have never heard anybody in this body refute that. History records it very dutifully and very accurately.

So now we have a group of people we call Contras who are not satisfied with the revolution that took place to overthrow Somoza. There are people who are indeed disenchanted with the revolution, the Sandinistas, and the way they are ruling the country. But that disenchantment with the Sandinistas so far as I have been able to tell has not translated into popular support for the Contras. And why would it when a goodly number of the top military officers of the Contras are former officers in the National Guard of the Somoza regime?

It may be that you could argue in this body and you could argue in the press that the people of Nicaragua are worse off now than they were under Somoza, but you have not yet been able to make the people of Nicaragua believe that. Insofar as I know, no revolution has ever occurred nor has any government ever been overthrown without the popular support of the people. So after 4 years, the Contras have not been able to take one single village, one yard of ground and hold onto it, and the reason they have not is because there is no popular support for them.

Since there is no popular support the Contras have been engaging in what rebels always do when they do not have popular support. They begin to engage in unspeakable atrocities against the villagers. I saw those horrendous unbelievable pictures in today's Newsweek magazine taken by a young 21-year-old student from Northwestern University. Those of us who have lived in the last few years have seen that sort of picture from Vietnam and El Salvador, and now Nicaragua. You would think we would get used to it. But I pray to God we never do.

So now we in this country have supported the Battistas, we have supported Diems, the Thieus, the Shah of Iran, the Somozas, and I tell you where the next one is going to be. It is going to be in the Philippines because everybody knows exactly what has happened in the Philippines for the past several years. I read in a book recently that somebody told Robert Kennedy, do not predict gloom because the people will turn. When the predictions of gloom come true, the people will turn against the one who predicted it. But it is just as certain as the night following the day that either before Marcos dies or shortly after he dies you are going to see a repeat of what is happening in Nicaragua right now. The existing government is going to be overthrown, there is going to be a group of rebels who try to overthrow that resolution, and we are going to be right back where we always are—on the wrong side.

I think the strongest yearning of man is for freedom. People cry all over the world for freedom and liberty and as the list I just gave you a moment ago shows, the United States always seems to be on the side that resists change. I am telling you when people are oppressed they cry for change. And when change occurs we always seem to be on the wrong side.

So far as I know, virtually nobody in all of Latin America supports us on Nicaragua. So far as I know nobody much in the world supports us in this effort to send military aid to the Contras. The President said Betancur of Colombia did. The New York Times quoted Betancur as saying the President misconstrued what he said. And somebody argued with the New York Times. So I had my staff call the Colombian Embassy and they said no, the Times was right, we are unalterably opposed to military aid to the Contras. And then there was the suggestion that Pope John supported our position, and it took the Vatican Ambassador about 10 minutes to call a press conference and say no. Military assistance in this case is both immoral and illegal. I believe that we have a security interest in Central America, and to my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Virginia, who said where are those Democrats who believe in a strong America, I tell you here is one Senator that believes that when our national security is threatened we ought to act, act decisively, and if our national security is threatened because of Nicaragua we ought to invade Nicaragua. We do have security interests there. But there is not anybody in this body that really believes our national security is at stake or there would be a cry in this body for an invasion of Nicaragua. Incidentally if we did invade, it would be the fifth time in this century.

We have security interests there in making sure that Central America is a nuclear-free zone. We have an interest in trying to get all foreign personnel out of Central America, making sure that there are no Cuban or Soviet military bases in Central America. And we ought to encourage the Contadora process, we ought to stay in touch with our closest friends in Latin America, and do everything we can in a legitimate foreign policy effort to accomplish those interests.

I heard the President say last week something about restoring democracy to Nicaragua. When has Nicaragua ever had a democracy to restore? That is just a little vignette of history. You will recall that the Cubans tried to overthrow Bolivia. Do you remember that shortly after Castro came to power? He sent Che Guevara down there.

Cuba wanted to overthrow the Colombian Government. It failed abysmally and the reason it failed was because there was no popular support for it. We just generally forget those things, like that miserable failure on the part of Castro.

Mr. President, every time we violate the rules of international law and the rules of international conduct, we erode others' respect for the law. I suppose there is a time when every country has to ignore international law where its national security interests are involved. But I will tell you one thing: when the Iranians took our hostages and expropriated American property, we did not hesitate to go to the International Court and ask for relief.

We pride ourselves on being a nation of laws and not of men. I know that international law is not very popular. But you cannot just use it when it suits your purpose and ignore it when it does not.

I hope the President will reconsider and be a little more tractable and a little more flexible on this proposal that we tried to work out at the White House. I think it has possibilities. This all or nothing does not serve his purpose and it does not serve ours.

Let me tell you something: The people on this side of the aisle have been staunch bipartisan supporters of our policy in El Salvador, and we all happen to be reasonably optimistic about what is going on in El Salvador. There is not any reason why people cannot get together and utilize their best minds. Nobody has a lock on what we ought to be doing in Nicaragua, not the President, not me, not anybody else. We are all troubled by this, tripping lightly through a mine field because we are not quite sure what we ought to do. But I can tell you one thing: it ought to be bipartisan and the President ought to get off his high-horse and say, "Come, let us reason together."

It is the same old story. Robert E. Lee did not want the Civil War and did not want a State in the South to secede. When 350,000 men lay dead and he saw the South in utter desolation and devastation, he said, "The politicians caused this." He was dead right. He said they kept breeding the animosity and bigotry between people until war became inevitable. Then he said, "All we needed were a few men of courage and intelligence and forbearance."

All we need now are a few men and women to sit down and reason together and try to figure out how we can best address what we all admit are our legitimate security interests in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD). Does the Senator from Alaska seek recognition?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the other day Mrs. Mathias came across some advice that Gen. Maxwell Taylor had for our Nation about our involvement in Vietnam, which both she and I believe is appropriate for the current situation in Nicaragua. As reported in a USA Today interview with Stanley Karnow, General Taylor's assessment of our mistakes of that era was as follows:

> First, we didn't know ourselves. Secondly, we didn't know our South Vietnamese allies, and we knew even less about North Vietnam. So until we know the ally and our enemies and ourselves, we better keep out of this dirty kind of business. It's very dangerous.

Today, we are uncertain about the Contras. While their ideals of democracy and free enterprise are noble, their tactics have been costly. They plan to defeat the current government in Nicaragua by weakening the economy and destroying the rural agricultural base. The evidence indicates that, in some cases, innocent farmers have been killed by the Contras as part of this effort. Such tactics should not be supported by the United States and, in fact, we condemn similar efforts by the rebels in El Salvador.

Neither do we know the "enemy." The Sandinistas are pictured alternately as Soviet/Cuban puppets and as social reformers who overthrew a vile dictatorship. In truth, the Sandinistas appear to be ruthless in their suppression of civil liberties and vigorous social reformers. Newspapers are censored and opponents are jailed, but social indicators, such as child mortality rates and standards of living, are all moving in the right direction. There is not yet a black and white answer to the question of who the Sandinistas are.

And finally we do not know ourselves on this issue. We began to support the Contras as a means of interdicting arms to El Salvador, which was a justifiable reason for support. Over time, however, our policy shifted to one of placing pressure on the Sandinistas to reform their government. Indeed, some in the United States have come close to advocating the overthrow of the current Nicaraguan government by force of arms. Our Nation is already deeply divided on this issue. We certainly do not have the national consensus that most agree is needed to sustain this kind of a foreign policy.

I have consulted with the representatives of many of the governments in the region to gain their views on the outlines of a prudent and positive policy for the area. The four other countries in Central America generally support President Reagan's overall efforts in the region. The Contadora countries also support President Reagan's efforts to promote a dialog, but they do not appear to favor covert military aid to the Contras, which they consider to be intervention in the domestic affairs of a Latin American country. Most other countries of Latin America appear to share the view of the four Contadora countries and stress the principle of nonintervention.

It is, therefore, to the theory of nonintervention that we must return to judge the long-term implications of our action. We must look to where we want to be in relation to our neighbors in the year 1990 or 1995. We must return to the principles of the Charter of the Organization of American States in which the principle of nonintervention is given pride of place. If the United States appears oblivious to this strongly held sentiment, it can color our relations with our neighbors for years to come.

There are large stakes for the United States in Latin America. Argentina and Brazil together have a population larger than that of the United States. Their governments are fragile and their relations with the United States are increasingly important. Mexico, our neighbor to the south, also faces severe economic and social problems, and the conflict in Central America affects them more directly than it affects us. It is with such nations that we should be consulting to develop a more acceptable strategy for Latin America.

Our previous policy toward Nicaragua was clear. It was to stop the Sandinistas from destabilizing El Salvador. That objective has in large measure been attained, and the current Contra operation is not critical to reducing the flow of arms to El Salvador's insurgents. We should not pick a new fight for a new cause that violates the three lessons put forward by Maxwell Taylor and also violates the Latin American principle of nonintervention.

For these reasons, barring last minute developments I shall vote against Senate Joint Resolution 106. I am hopeful that a compromise may yet be worked out that could use this money instead to create economic incentives for a cease-fire and negotiations. I will continue to work toward that end, and I am heartened by the fact that other Senators and the President himself are doing likewise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt to ask how much time he would like to have?

Mr. COHEN. At least 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator be recognized for 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I intend to support this request, and I would like to take a few moments to explain why.

First, I would like to express a few comments concerning remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS, while he is still in the Chamber. I think his remarks really did characterize the sense of anguish and ambiguity which has existed for some time in this body as it pertains to Nicaragua.

I, for one, am not prepared to endorse the goals of the Contras. I am also not prepared to hand Mr. Ortega a victory on this day in this Chamber.

Why is the debate on Nicaragua filled with so much anguish and ambiguity, as expressed by Senator BUMPERS?

We know that the Sandinistas are committed to maintaining and expanding their Marxist state. We know they have restricted freedom of speech, of the press, of religion, and violated the human rights of their citizens. We know they have broken, if, indeed, they ever intended to keep, the promises of the revolution. We know that they have been supplying weapons to the rebels in El Salvador in order to undermine that Government's efforts to establish a democratic pluralism. We know that there are more than 7,000 Cubans in Nicaragua; most, if not all, of them are military advisers and personnel.

We know that the Sandinistas will not be content to confine their revolutionary ideology to Nicaragua, and that the entire region fears it might come under their military threat.

We know that there are Nicaraguans who do not want to live under the totalitarian rule of the Sandinistas, who are willing to take up arms and fight and die in the cause of overthrowing Daniel Ortega and the existing government. We know these people need American help if they are going to succeed. Why then is there so much doubt? So much hesitancy in this Chamber?

I suggest our doubt reflects the ambiguous, ill-defined, and indeed, inconsistent policies that we have maintained toward the Sandinistas on the political, diplomatic, commercial, and military levels. We recognize the Sandinistas and carry on normal diplomatic relations through our Embassy in Managua even as Congress votes each year to fund the group that has as its goal the overthrow of the government. We deplore the regional destablizing activities of the Sandinistas but remain one of their major trading partners. We buy their coffee, their beef, sugar and bananas. They use the hard currency to purchase Soviet guns instead of butter.

Our policies toward Nicaragua, almost from the beginning, have been a collective exercise in self-deception. We have not been honest enough, or courageous enough, to confront the truth about the Sandinistas, or about ourselves.

First, we said that we need to support the Contras in order to stop the flow of weapons running from Moscow-Havana-Managua to San Salvador. We just wanted to conduct interdictive missions, perhaps a little harassment on the fringes of Marxist life, just on the perimeters to let the Ortega brothers know that they do not have a sanctuary from which they can spread their revolutions.

A number of people asked several years ago, "Is it our policy to overthrow the Sandinistas? Does the very existence of the Sandinistas pose an unacceptable threat to the region?" Overthrow is not our policy, was the answer. Five thousand Contras do not an army make. They cannot overthrow the government. They may have that goal in mind even if we do not share or support it. In any event, their goal, however impossible, serves our more limited objectives.

Many were not satisfied with the answer. What happens when the 5,000 Contrtas become 10,000 or 15,000? What happens when their goal becomes our goal? The rebels are not dying to save El Salvador. What happens when they start attacking civilian targets, when the war goes beyond disrupting supply lines?

The answer we were given is that we are in charge. We are in control. We are supervising.

The rest, of course, is history.

I think I recognize that diplomacy must necessarily involve subtlety, nuance, calculated ambiguity, perhaps even a degree of disingenuousness. But what it cannot rest upon in the short or long term is deception—the deception of others, and most assuredly, the deception of ourselves.

Today we are asked for $14 million for nonmilitary aid, to see if we cannot buy some time and during that time, persuade the Sandinistas to negotiate seriously and put an end to their revolutionary expansionism.

Again, we are afraid to confront the Congress and the American people with the truth—about the realistic prospects of our stated objectives. Continuing to hide behind fig leaf phrases will only make the end result of our efforts more disastrous.

We have to agree on some basic and I believe immutable facts:

First the Sandinistas are not dewy eyed romantics who want to live in splendid isolataion pursuing their dream of an egalitarian society. They are dedicated Marxists and they have no intention of confining their policies to a noble domestic experiment.

Second, if, in fact, they are Marxists operating under the Cuban or Soviet thumb then it is fatuous for us to believe that they will negotiate away the very means they have for maintaining and consolidating their control. A free press, a free people participating in a democratic society at peace with their neighbors is not found in the bound volumes of Marx or Lenin.

Third, the notion that if the Contras swell in numbers to a 20,000 or 25,000 man force fully funded by the United States, the Sandinistas will agree to the equivalent of suicide by dismantling their totalitarian state is lacking in logic and experience.

Fourth, assuming the Contras were able to bring such pressure to bear that Mr. Ortega expressed willingness to negotiate, it is unlikely that the Contras would stop at the city limits of Managua.

Fifth, the Contras do not want our dollars. They want our endorsement. It is the seal of approval that they want and need. They can raise $14 million with a couple of fundraisers in Florida, Texas, or California.

And so, for me, the fundamental issue is whether we are going to endorse the Contras, to encourage them to keep up the fight, to continue to die for a cause that we believe is worthy. As I indicated before, I am not prepared to endorse fully the goals of the Contras but I am not prepared to cut off non-military aid from them. Before we endorse their efforts, it seems to me that we have to be very clear about what our goals are and whether we are prepared to accept the full consequences of supporting their growing army.

We have to ask some fundamental questions about what kind of aid we are going to give. Not this time, but the next time. Is it military or paramilitary? How do you distinguish between the two?

Are economic or civilian targets, including oil refineries, harbors, crops, hydro stations, airports within the scope of the pressure that we hope they will bring? If not, what are the restrictions? How will they be supervised and enforced?

How long should we expect the war of attrition to last? How much can we reasonably tell the American people we will have to expend?

If the Cuban presence is increased, and the size of the Sandinista army doubled again, would we contemplate sending our own troops as advisers or combatants?

These are but a few of the many questions that I think can and should be asked and answered before a decision to endorse the efforts of the Contras is made—in fairness to the American people, but equally important, in fairness to the Contras who are doing the fighting and the dying.

We are living in a fool's paradise if we continue to hang onto the soothing deception that all we are supporting is a little behavior modification program.

This is not Afghanistan. The Iron Curtain will not slam down on the international press in Nicaragua. When civilians are killed, as inevitably they will be in a prolonged guerrilla war, we will not be able to hide behind diplomatic phrases of deniability.

I do not want to have to tell my constituents, well, we did not know they were going to bomb the Managua Civic Center or airport, or depots, or harbors, or whatever. We were just trying to put a little pressure on the Sandinistas, a little harassment.

If I am going to support the Contras, it is because their goals and ours are mutual, so that their acts become our responsibility as well. If we are to use an instrument of force on our behalf, then we should at a minimum be willing to be held accountable for deeds that are done. It is for this reason that I will not support further military aid at this time.

As of this date, the administration has been unable or unwilling to make an unqualified commitment to the Contras—for reasons that include not wanting to cause discomfort to Nicaragua's neighbors. Our goals must be limited, our means covert it is argued. Perhaps this had validity at one point. But time and events had stripped this diplomacy of all pretense.

I think the worst possible thing we can do would be to encourage the expansion of the Contra forces, leading them to believe that the American people are fully behind their cause when the American people are still divided and confused, and not yet persuaded that we should be hiring them to carry out their efforts under the banner of freedom. This would be an act of monstrous deception and shame that would rival the dishonor of having to kick terrified civilians off our helicopters in Vietnam.

What we need is clarity. No more mirrors. No more double speak. No more deception.

The President has to come to Congress, he has to go to the American people and explain why the Sandinistas cannot be tolerated in our hemisphere, and he has to ask the American people to support those who want to remove that government.

Unless the American people are persuaded that such a course is supportable, then we will be caught vote after vote in a briar patch of lies and contradictions, leading to a bloody rout of the Contras and the ruin of America's honor.

We do a great disservice to the Contras by leading them down a path which has no exit except failure and defeat. Although I come to a different conclusion than the Senator from Arkansas, I share his frustration with our policies to date and with this vote. This request today provides some breathing space that will allow us to pursue diplomatic and economic pressure, but unless we can formulate a policy that is very clear in its objective, that has full responsibility and accountability, then I think we are only deferring disaster.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The VICE PRESIDENT. 123 minutes remain.

Mr. STEVENS. On my side. How much time on the other side?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent I may yield the following amount of time to these Senators when they are recognized: Senator WILSON, 5 minutes; Senator DANFORTH, 5 minutes; Senator HATFIELD, the chairman of the committee, 10 minutes; myself, 5 minutes; and the distinguished majority leader 15 minutes. I will state that it is the intention, as I understand it, of the majority leader to yield back the remainder of his time following his comments.

Does the Senator from California wish to make a similar allocation of time?

Mr. CRANSTON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield.

Mr. CRANSTON. May I ask, how much time do we have left on this side?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the next Democrat to be recognized on this side of the aisle be the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], who would have 6 minutes; following that, it be Senator GORE, who would have 4 minutes; following that, Senator BINGAMAN, who would have 4 minutes. I will reserve more time, but I do want to also include in the unanimous-consent agreement that Senator BYRD be the last Democrat recognized just before the majority leader is recognized at the very end, Senator DOLE.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there is no objection to that. There is an understanding between the two leaders, as I understand it, that Senator BYRD would be next to last; that Senator DOLE would like to be last. It would be my request that the unanimous-consent agreement include the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER], to be allocated 5 minutes of our time prior to the time the majority leader speaks, and I add 2 minutes for the Senator from Indiana also.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would also like to inform all Senators on this side that there is very little time left if anyone wishes to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, we should try to forge a national policy that will help the countries of Central America achieve self-determination, democracy, economic development, and security—security based in part, at least, on the popular support of the people for their governments. The achievement of that goal is in the United States' national security interests. It is also in our interest as a free people to see the world free of political, religious, and economic oppression and tyranny.

All of us in this Chamber share these goals. We are each motivated to find a course that will successfully achieve them. Mr. President, our disagreement and contention today is not about our shared objectives, but the best way to reach them.

And yet, this disagreement reaches to the very core of what defines us as a people and a nation. In an often difficult, troubled, and unpleasant world, we must work to achieve our purposes without abandoning our ideals and principles—those ideals and principles that define us as a good and free people.

When facing opponents, it is our challenge and obligation to prevail, and to prevail recognizing, respecting, and being true to the best traditions of our history. We are the heirs to a great trust—the belief that justice and freedom can prevail, and that it can be achieved through just means.

Sometimes, regrettably, this means military might. Sometimes this means diplomacy. Sometimes this means economic sanctions. Sometimes this means aid and assistance. Sometimes this means a combination of these. Always it means understanding—clearly—our purposes and goals.

In Central America, it also requires us to understand the history of the region, and our role in that history.

Further, it requires us to understand the nature of the challenges.

The challenges are many. For the United States, it is more than a government in Nicaragua we have differences with. It is also the challenge of the despair, anger, frustration, and urgency caused by a long, sad history of poverty and economic injustice.

The struggle to free the Nicaraguan people of the oppressive and unjust dictatorship of Somoza was a just struggle. For too long, our country had not always been able to see, or quickly enough understand, that it is sometimes in our national interest to support people trying to free themselves from repressive leaders or governments. Mistakes of the past, however, need not impair our judgment or wise choices for the present and future.

The reality we now face is that we have decisions to make regarding our conduct toward—and our relations with—the Sandinista government. The Sandinista government has not conducted itself as it should. It has denied freedoms at home, and supported itself as it should It has denied freedoms at home, and supported revolutions against its neighbors.

The issue today isn't whether we like the Sandinistas. The issue is whether we believe the course we're on in changing their policies is an effective one. The issue is whether we are going to support a war with a country with which we have full diplomatic relations.

Senators LEAHY, BINGAMAN, and I visted Nicaragua and Honduras last week. When we were there, we met with the Nicaraguan President and Foreign Minister, the Archbishop of Managua, representatives of the democratic opposition within Nicaragua, Government leaders of Honduras, and representatives of the Contras in Honduras. When we returned, it was my conviction that the President should withdraw his pending request for the $14 million for the Contras, and seek a bipartisan alternative.

The President should have done this because simply sending $14 million to the Contras increases the likelihood that the United States will move deeper into a military quagmire in Central America. The Contras are convinced we will march with them against the Sandinistas. Sending this $14 million without conditions will encourage them further in such a belief.

I participated in the past few days in the effort to find a bipartisan alternative that would seek to keep pressure on the Sandinista government by means other than supporting their military overthrow—that is, by economic and diplomatic pressures and incentives aimed at halting unwanted Nicaraguan interference in the affairs of others.

Such an alternative should also provide support for countries in the region against outside aggression, and protection for their democratic processes.

Such an alternative would reflect a policy that is consistent with our democratic principles, that makes clear our dissatisfaction with the policies of the Sandinista government, but does not involve us in military efforts to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government.

Rejecting the President's ill-advised course would not end this debate. We must strive to find a way to facilitate talks—talks between the United States and Nicaragua, talks leading to the continuation and success of the Contadora process, and talks leading to reconciliation of all Nicaraguans. A vote against the President's proposal today should not be viewed by anyone or any government as a willingness to tolerate unwanted Nicaraguan intervention in other countries' affairs. We should seek an alternative to deeper U.S. military intervention—an alternative to our support of the overthrow of a government with which we have full diplomatic relations.

We should reject the pending proposal and adopt, instead, a bipartisan alternative involving some basic points, including:

First, support for monitored humanitarian aid to the Contras if they accept a mutual cease-fire;

Second, support for economic and diplomatic sanctions against the Sandinistas if they reject a mutual cease-fire;

Third, support for the Contadora peace process;

Fourth, support for efforts of Nicaragua's neighbors to defend themselves against Nicaraguan-based insurgents;

Fifth, support for economic and development aid to Central America to facilitate the growth and strengthening of democracy and economic development throughout the region;

This alternative would put pressure on the Sandinistas to discourage their support of insurgencies against their neighbors. This act would promote security and democracy in the region—and without the United States intervening militarily.

If the United States acts to unilaterally impose our will, we will not succeed. Our efforts will backfire, and play into the propaganda line of those we oppose. History should teach us the lesson that moving down the unilateral interventionist road will be counterproductive in the long run. We can meet the challenge of Nicaragua, and should, in the alternative ways proposed to the administration. The President's approach doesn't meet that challenge effectively, so I will vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, yesterday I was visited in my office by two constituents who were strongly opposed to U.S. aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. I stated my view during that visit that they had won the argument; that whatever specific steps were taken on the floor of the Senate today, they essentially had won because the President originally asked for military aid for the Contras. Then he began backing off of that request in the face of certain defeat in the Congress, first going to a 60-day use of the aid for humanitarian purposes, now humanitarian aid exclusively, and this, I understand, is going to be made clear in a letter which will be released sometime between now and the vote.

Mr. President, I think the issue we should be voting on is a very simple one. The issue we should be voting on is whether the United States is going to help those who resist Marxist expansionism in our own hemisphere.

That to me is the very simple issue. I think that it is beyond doubt that Nicaragua is a Marxist regime; that it has armed itself to the teeth, and that it is ideologically committed, and has so stated, to fomenting revolution beyond its own borders and has physically participated in that effort.

To me that question—whether or not the United States should provide aid to those who are resisting Marxism in our hemisphere—should be the issue.

In fact, what has happened is that Congress has gotten itself into the business of making foreign policy. Congress through a lengthy process of interjecting itself into this decision has, as it usually does, attempted to obscure the issue, so we have had what in my opinion is the quite bizarre spectacle of groups of Senators appointed by who knows whom going to the White House for the purpose of negotiating the most minute nuances of a humanitarian aid package. What we are left with today, Mr. President—and I think it is unfortunate—is a very, very fine distinction between two, I would say, almost indistinguishable humanitarian aid proposals.

I think this is too bad, for a couple of reasons. First, I believe that the No. 1 question should be faced up to eventually, and that is whether we are going to aid those who resist Marxism in our hemisphere. If the answer to that is no—and I believe that a strong case can be made that the answer will be no—no matter what we vote on today, then I think that is going to have obvious consequences for the future of Central America and the future of the interests of the United States.

I believe that a second concern has to do with the role of Congress in the making of foreign policy. It seems to me that we have gone so far in taking foreign policy from the hands of the President of the United States that we have pretty much immobilized the President.

I cannot understand how we can have a purposeful foreign policy if we are constantly getting into the position, in the U.S. Senate and in Congress, of finetuning it.

Foreign policy with respect to Central America has all the qualities of a "Pink Panther" movie, in my opinion. We are the Inspector Clouseaus of foreign policy. We are to foreign policy what Inspector Clouseau was to law enforcement.

I am concerned that we have not given a clear answer to what I believe to be the question at hand. I think this is a mistake. I think that the weakness that is going to be demonstrated today, regardless of how we vote on the issue at hand, is going to come back to haunt us and that at some point in our history we are going to point to what we have done today on the floor of the Senate as a turning point in the history of Central America.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, my vote this evening against further support for the Contra military effort will be no vote of confidence in the leaders of Nicaragua. Perhaps we see them in the reflected light of our own hostility, as some critics of America's record in Latin America claim. I think, however, that one may deeply suspect the Government of Nicaragua, and yet conclude that nurturing civil war in that country is not the right course of action for the United States.

Surely, no one can believe that we can deal with the Nicaraguan problem for the price of $14 million. The sum we are debating today is not the price tag for a package deal; it is a mere deposit on something that must inevitably grow not only in financial, but political costs. If we allow this measure to pass, the administration will take it as a signal to scale up the level of violence in Nicaragua. It will do this in preference to any other kind of sanctions, and certainly in preference to diplomacy. And the reason the administration will do this is because it is convinced that there is only one right outcome to this problem: to drive the present Government of Nicaragua from power.

I have no case to make for the Sandinistas, but I am convinced that it would be folly to go down this road, for in so doing we would leave behind the support of the American people. That support is manifestly absent, because the President's case has not been proven; because his zeal for military response is so plain to see. The President has been ready to mine harbors, but not to interrupt U.S. trade running through them. He has been ready to raise an insurrection against a foreign government, but not to break diplomatic relations with that government. He toys with diplomacy, but only as he requires the appearance, rather than the substance of negotiations.

Now, insofar as our Government has helped bring the Contra movement into existence, there is a case that we ought not to cast them off utterly, but to provide food, medical supplies and other reasonable kinds of aid for sustenance. And, insofar as we have no reason to be sure that our restraint will be reciprocated by the Government of Nicaragua, there is also a rather hard-eyed argument that if humanitarian aid holds the Contra movement immobile but intact, that too, may be useful.

But due to the breakdown of negotiations at the White House, the moment is at hand for Congress to unambiguously bring U.S. support for covert military activity in Nicaragua to an end. In these circumstances, we must insist that this is a time for the administration to make primary use of the tools of diplomacy. If we do not insist on this effort, but allow the administration to move on to what I fear will be an irrevocable commitment to higher levels of violence, we shall put at risk the decade of national healing and reconciliation experienced since the end of the Vietnam war. Better to deal with Nicaragua as a problem of containment, than as a project for counter-revolution. One way lies the possibility of an effective strategy capable of support from the American public over the long term. The other way leads to an inevitable moment of repudiation by the American people.

Mr. HATFIELD and Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this debate represents, I believe, a classic and historic collision between what might be called short-term and long-term foreign policy considerations. Unfortunately, in some respects it seems as though the short-term considerations are presently winning. I see the policy dilemma revolving around the following factors:

First, if we judge the character of the Nicaraguan revolution precipitately and formulate our policies on that basis, are we going to be prepared to bear the consequences later if we are wrong now? Do we defer our historic commitment to the sanctity of the rule of international law to sustain the momentum of this policy, of which the $14 million has become but a symbol? Do we work from the premise that peace is possible or that war, in all likelihood, is necessary?

If we render a judgment now that the Sandinistas are beyond the point of no return, we invite a self-fulfilling prophecy.

If we convince ourselves and the American public that Nicaragua is in fact a certifiable arm of the Soviet Union's foreign policy apparatus and a threat to vital U.S. interests, we had better know exactly what we are talking about, because under that assumption, if a military defeat of the Contras becomes inevitable, our obligatory response will also be inevitable.

What we do or do not do today affects the unfolding caricature of the Nicaraguan regime. Make no mistake about it. Our responsibility is immense, because the mark we make on that caricature through our actions today will go far in determining whether it will be necessary to send American troops to war tomorrow. No society could sustain, without paying a price in judgment, the siege mentality which the Nicaraguan people have been forced to bear under the present circumstances—fighting a war against a dictatorship one day, only to defend themselves against attack the next.

Mr. President, there are many valid arguments that point to danger in the Sandanista regime, their immense military buildup being one of them. And I concur in the viewpoint that we should be concerned and act accordingly. But I speak now only of the psychological impact that uninterrupted war has on a society and a people. We may never have the opportunity to help the Nicaraguan people if they become so used to war that they are rendered incapable of functioning any other way.

To the extent that this caricature of a society is still unfolding, opportunities to change it which we fail to embrace, opportunities that are before us today, ready to be tested, virtually guarantee that our most sinister suspicions will be validated.

So everyone here who talks of a "totalitarian Marxist Leninist Soviet beachhead" in Nicaragua had better know exactly what he or she is talking about, because if a majority of us are convinced of that now and act accordingly, we are going to have it, as sure as we are going to have to stop it one day in order to save face.

I am not saying people are right or wrong on this assumption. I am only saying that we had better be careful before we cross that xenophobic threshold. We are all cynical to some degree, and I suppose we have a right to be. But there are untested opportunities which exist right now—they are out there—opportunities which are not receiving the attention they deserve. We are not taking them seriously and yet we have no idea whether they deserve to be taken seriously or not because we have not really explored the possibilities.

The Nicaraguan Government is talking today about lifting press censorship. They are talking about amnesty. They have already announced a qualitative freeze on the importation of arms.

I have no illusions, but I do have fear, fear that we have become so jaded already, liberal and conservative, Democrat and Republican, so obsessed with the symbolism and the question of who will win and who will be the victor and who will be the loser in this situation that the political smoke will clear tonight and those opportunities for forward movement will have gone up in smoke right along with it.

Finally, the Sandinistas may at times seem like petty thugs but we are surely becoming world class outlaws ourselves. And as long as we stand in defiance of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, and the Charter of the United Nations, glaring omissions in this debate, we deserve what we get according to the law of the jungle.

We have embraced the law of the jungle to the disgrace of our ideals and the delight of our enemies as a preferred method of operation.

Congress sent a clear message that it will not finance the mining of harbors but it has not made clear during this important juncture in the formulation of policy that the rule of the international law is every bit as relevant to determining the parameters of our policy as our refusal to tolerate another Cuba in Central America.

When we boycott international jurisprudence over the mining of a harbor because the verdict is predictable, we invite the Ayatollah Khomeini to mine the Strait of Hormuz, and when we do not recognize the U.N. Charter, we invite the Soviet Union to stay in Afghanistan and roll into Poland.

And when we fail to correct this disregard for the sanctity of law in the context of this debate we are challenging the form of this policy but we are acquiescing in its substance.

This is an immensely important decision we are making. I am only hopeful that we can see beyond the day and beyond the question of who wins and who loses on this vote.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have yielded 5 minutes to the Senator from California but I wish to add to my request to yield to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] 15 minutes to be allocated among themselves however they wish to do so and I so ask unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I begin by commending the junior Senator from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, for stating the case with painful clarity. He has chastised those of us in this Chamber who mistake our role and who exceed it, whatever our good intentions are, and seek to usurp the proper role reserved by the Constitution to the President of the United States, the conduct of foreign policy.

But if in fact we are going to usurp his role, then at the very least we owe to one another and more importantly to the American people a clear and objective analysis of the facts that bear on this decision.

Mr. President, any clear analysis would yield up the following facts, facts which are painful, even dangerous facts which even Inspector Clouseau could not avoid.

Mr. President, the first of these is the Sandinista regime seeks to export its revolution beyond the borders of Nicaragua by terrorism, by violence, by subversion.

This has been made explicit by the leaders of the Sandinista revolution.

Most recently I am told that it appeared in a special MacNeil-Lehrer report on Central America.

But there is no shortage of these explicit statements that admit the ambition of the Sandinista regime to dominate its neighbors.

Far more eloquently than any admission, any explicit statement by a Sandinista commandante, is the unhappy fact, the pain, the depth, the suffering that has been inflicted by this regime upon the people of El Salvador.

Not only has this effort brought incredible suffering, not only has it sought to disrupt the free process of elections in that country, but it is quite clear that from an abundance of evidence these efforts, not of rebels, but of terrorists are armed and directed from Managua.

Anyone who is in any doubt I would refer to the Intelligence Committee where they can hear the abundant evidence of captured arms, captured communications, of defectors' statements. There is no doubt certainly within the region, if there is in this Chamber, no doubt whatever that this insurgency in El Salvador is armed and directed from Managua as are the efforts of the Sandinistas to undermine and subvert Honduras and Guatemala and small and defenseless Costa Rica.

The second painful fact, Mr. President, is that the Sandinistas will never give up power. They have made their intentions abundantly clear again through explicit statements. In response to a pointed question in a conversation which I had with him in August 1983, then Commandante Ortega said not by free election nor any other process would the Sandinistas ever give up the power that they had won through revolution.

The third painful fact is that like most Marxists they are patient and will wait out not just this administration but any other which poses a threat to thwart their ambitions to dominate their neighbors. It is the purpose of their massive military buildup either to actually employ force against their neighbors or fearing the response that would be expected under the Rio Treaty obligations they will simply use it to extort.

Mr. President, the fourth fact is that imposing a threat to their neighbors in Central America and ultimately to Mexico, the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua, acting as a surrogate for the Soviets and the Cubans, poses a threat to the United States itself not just to our sealanes in communication in the Gulf of Mexico but along an 1,800-mile-long undefended land border across which massive illegal immigration, including literally three-quarters of 1 million Salvadorans, perhaps as many as a quarter of 1 million other refugees from other countries have fled.

Obviously, the consequence of this threat is that one day the American people might awaken and might plausibly demand that we bring home American troops from other theaters, from NATO, from Korea, to engage in a defense of that Mexican-United States border.

And another plausible defense is that one day, because of the temerity of this body and because of our inability to see and deal with reality, American boys, some now 16 and 17 years old, may one day have to shed blood.

Mr. President, that would be a tragedy unspeakable because of the needlessness of it.

I would suggest that the resolution before us gives us the opportunity to act responsibly to people who are seeking freedom, people who are placing pressure upon that Sandinista regime, pressure of a kind that alone has brought about some responsiveness.

We are asked by the spokesman for the archdiocese of Managua to keep pressure upon this kind of Sandinista adventurism.

There are two things on the side of the Sandinista regime, Mr. President. One is time. They are typically Marxist and patient to a fault. They will outwait us, outlast us if we let them.

The second flowing from the first is the fact of the inadequacy of the U.S. response to this clear threat. There is no doubt, Mr. President, there is no doubt of the wish of the Nicaraguan neighbors to resist Sandinistas. But their will to resist depends directly and proportionately on their perception of the U.S. will to assist them. If we are seen to be uncertain, vascillating, totally lacking the clear resolve to properly assist not only President Duarte but the other neighbors of Nicaragua while Soviet-Cuban assistance continues unabated then, Mr. President, I will conclude sadly that for them to continue to resist will seem foodhardy.

We will find one day, as Churchill warned, that those who will not face the threat and fight it, when there is hope of overcoming it, will find the threat return to them grown much larger at a time when perhaps the fight will be unavoidable and the hope of winning is miniscule.

Mr. President, that is the threat that we face. It is not exaggerated.

This resolution should be supported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, there has been discussion here tonight of a letter that the President is preparing to distribute to the Senate this evening before we vote on this matter.

Let me just state for the RECORD that I have received no letter. I have been here on the floor for approximately the last half hour and I am not aware that any such letter is presently available.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield for a clarification?

Mr. BINGAMAN. I certainly will.

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate that the letter is on the way. We have had a number of drafts, and we have made available to the minority leader about 5 o'clock the latest draft the Senator from Kansas had. I am sorry the final version is not here. But there have been some changes made that have delayed its delivery. The moment it is here I will come to the floor and read it in its entirety. I would indicate that I believe the letter will address nearly every concern.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that that time not come out of the time of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Let me continue with my comments, Mr. President. I am sorry I will probably complete my remarks without having seen the President's letter.

Mr. President, I rise to join my distinguished colleagues who seek to prohibit the release of funds to support the military activities of the Nicarguan rebels.

I visited Nicaragua 16 months ago with my respected colleague from Rhode Island Senator CHAFEE. I returned to Washington convinced that the expenditure of millions of taxpayers' dollars to wage an undeclared war against the Government of Nicaragua served neither the historic ideals of the United States nor our interests in Central America. Since then I have risen on frequent occasion in this Chamber to argue that our continued support of the Contras betrays the democratic ideals of our Founding Fathers and weakens our political position in an area that is vital to our national security.

Just 1 week ago, Mr. President, I revisited Nicaragua with my distinguished colleagues from Vermont and Michigan, Senators LEAHY and LEVIN. Today I stand before my friends and colleagues ever more certain that futher funding of the Contras will gradually, tortuously, but ineluctably draw us into the abyss of war in Central America either by proxy or by direct military intervention.

This is not the conclusion, Mr. President, of one who is oblivious to our security interests in Central America. It does not require great imagination to visualize a state of affairs in the region that could prompt U.S. intervention. Nor is this the conclusion of one who naively embraces the Sandinistas as a force of democratic emancipation in Nicaragua. The continuing economic and military ties between the Sandinistas and the Soviet Union, the substantial presence of Cuban military advisers in Nicaragua, and the Nicaraguan Government's persisting assistance to the Salvadoran insurgency do not augur well for regional stabilization.

But is it not morally indefensible and politically reckless for the United States to brandish its sabre at the Nicaraguan Government? Great powers, and the statesmen who guide their destinies, exercise military means to resolve international disputes as a last resort, not as the first, and certainly not as the only.

Considering that we maintain diplomatic relations with Nicaragua, the administration's undeclared war against the Sandinistas borders on the surrealistic. Worst yet, Mr. President, its approach is self-defeating. First, the administration's strident rhetoric and military intimidation make it difficult for the Sandinistas to sever ties with the Soviet Union as the President has fairly demanded of them, and to adhere instead to the nonaligned policy enshrined in their revolutionary rhetoric. In my view, the Soviets would be only too happy to see the United States mired in a protracted military involvement in Central America.

Second, our aggressive posture and military support to the Contras do not encourage the goal of democracy in Central America. Rather, the administration's approach legitimizes the Sandinistas' probable objective of political aggrandizement and strengthens the dictatorship the President seeks to dislodge.

Finally, prepared neither to declare a state of war against Nicaragua nor to coexist with the Sandinistas, the administration's policy risks alienating other countries in Central America at the expense of the very security interests it is ostensibly intended to preserve.

Mr. President, it is time for us to come to our senses with respect to our policy toward Nicaragua and the entire Central American region. We violate the public trust by using tax dollars to finance a guerrilla war that is neither legal nor wise. The American public will not support such a course. If we are to be responsive to the desires of our electorates, we must give diplomacy a chance by backing the Contadora process as the only peaceful way of reconciling differences in Nicaragua. Reviving the spirit of the "Good Neighbor" policy and the Alliance for Progress is a sign of strength, not of weakness. It does not detract from our military might; it complements it and makes it more credible.

As we concentrate our energies in search of a negotiated settlement of the Nicaraguan crisis, we should continue the prohibition of funds "for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua," as expressed in the Boland amendment of December 1982.

Mr. President, the diplomatic alternative that my colleagues in this distinguished body and I advocate can only be effectively pursued if the administration alters its goal of forceably removing the Sandinistas from power. Continuation of that policy portends a military involvement that will squander our human and economic resources and contribute to the erosion of our political influence in Central America and the world beyond.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would like to have this time charged to us. But we are pleased to have enter the Chamber at this point our distinguished friend, the man from space, Senator JAKE GARN.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask that the interruption follow the remarks of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, and that the time used be charged to this side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator fom New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I certainly am not offended by being interrupted. I think we should interrupt a speaker whenever a Senator returns from space.

[Applause, laughter.]

Mr. BENTSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, what you have heard today and tonight are very eloquent statements that demonstrate why we have had so much difficulty in resolving our differences and in deciding what can and should be done in Nicaragua. I have no doubt that Nicaragua is in our sphere of influence and that we ought to be concerned about what is going on there; that the buildup of the army in Nicaragua to a size far greater than that of any other Central American country is a threat to that area; that the problem of censorship of the free press in Nicaragua should be of concern to us; and that the thousand political prisoners is certainly not something that we should countenance or that we should support.

Mr. President, the U.S. Senate has been wrestling with our Government's policy toward Nicaragua for some time now, and it is evident that this body is severely divided as to what that policy should be. Should we give further aid to the Contras? If we should, what form should it take? It we should not, where does that leave us in Nicaragua and the other countries of Central America? Can we really afford another Soviet satellite state in this hemisphere?

Throughout the debate, which has stretched over many months since the covert military program in Nicaragua came into the light, it has become obvious to me that the Sandinista government is not simply a misunderstood group of revolutionaries whose presence in Central America poses no threat to the interests of our friends in the region.

I believe, in fact, that the Sandinistas, in their present way of behaving, pose an active threat to peace in Central America, and that we cannot abandon our friends in the region in the light of these threats.

We cannot abandon our friends because there is evidence—credible evidence—that many of the arms and much of the ammunition that is used by the FMLN guerrillas in El Salvador is supplied through Nicaragua by the Governments of Cuba and the Soviet Union. There is credible evidence that the Government of Nicaragua is providing training bases for guerrillas from El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and the Dominican Republic. There is credible evidence—there is in fact an admission by the Sandinistas—that the command and control headquarters for the five FMLN groups are in Nicaragua; that the Government of Nicaragua knows they are there; and that the Government of Nicaragua does absolutely nothing to disturb them. I believe the Sandinistas must end their support of the insurgents in El Salvador and the other countries in Central America, and they must diminish the threat that their own military strength poses to their neighbors.

The Sandinistas are a threat to their neighbors because of a military buildup that has made them far and away the greatest military power in Central America. They have an army that is half again larger than any other in the region, and the Soviet Union and her allies have supplied to them over $500 million in armaments since 1981.

The tangible results of this Soviet largesse are visible in the form of tanks and armored personnel carriers and artillery pieces that give the Nicaraguan Armed Forces an awesome capability. The tangible results are visible in the high-performance helicopters that have been given to the Nicaraguan Air Force. And the Soviet and Cuban and Eastern bloc largesse is visible in the form of the military and security advisers who roam so freely through the streets of Managua.

We have a total of 55 U.S. Army advisers in El Salvador, and I know there are Members of this body who think that 55 is too many. If that is the case, what about Nicaragua, where there are at least 2,500 Cuban military advisers, and 50 Soviet military advisers, and 60 Bulgarian military advisers, and 70 East German military advisers? I am disturbed by their presence in Nicaragua, and I believe that we ought to use every peaceful means to convince the Sandinistas to send these military and security advisers home.

We have been discussing the particulars of Contra aid for months, and I confess that there are aspects of the program that trouble me. I would never for 1 minute say that the Contra program has been run with the level of control that I would have liked to see. But I will tell you one thing: I have never for 1 minute doubted that it is in our best interests to convince the Sandinistas to mend their ways and stop trying to undermine their neighbors; to back off from their embrace of the Soviets and the Cubans; and to reduce the military buildup that is so intimidating in the regional context.

On April 4, the President sent to us a proposal as to how he would use the $14 million that is contained in the continuing resolution for this fiscal year. After days of discussions with congressional leaders of both parties, from both sides of the Hill, he has modified his proposal. He has agreed that he will expend the $14 million for food, clothing, and medicine only, and not for arms and ammunition and that is a major concession. We ought to recognize it as such.

He has agreed to resume bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua and indicates that he will use these talks to support the Contadora process. He has stated that he will report to the Congress by September 1, 1985, as to progress toward achieving a verifiable peace and reconciliation in Nicaragua based upon democratic principles.

Finally, he has accepted my recommendation to favorably consider economic sanctions against the Government of Nicaragua and to undertake multilateral consultations with other Central American states in this regard.

I will support the President in his efforts to achieve peace in Nicaragua without abandoning the hopes and aspirations of those who feel betrayed by a revolution whose initial promise was so great.

I happen to be one of those Senators who voted for the original sum of about $75 million we sent to Nicaragua in hopes they were going to have a pluralistic form of government. It did not turn out to be that way. No sooner had Daniel Ortega and his group obtained control than they changed things and stacked their little Parliament down there and took total control of the situation.

I think they have evidenced the fact that they do not keep their commitments.

The President has moved a substantial distance toward meeting the Government of Nicaragua half way. He has placed his full support behind the Contadora process and has eliminated military support for the Contra forces in Nicaragua, while continuing humanitarian assistance to them.

When I talk about economic sanctions, I am fully aware that, by itself, they will not cause a change in the Sandinistas in their attitude toward their neighbors. But I do think the imposition of economic sanctions will send a loud and clear signal to the Government of Nicaragua that we do not countenance the kinds of actions they have taken.

It is now up to the Government of Nicaragua to demonstrate their willingness to negotiate in good faith to resolve the conflict that is slowly destroying their country.

I yield to my good friend and distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], who shares many of these same views and who has succeeded during the negotiation process with the President in finding a common ground on which we could join together, one which would limit this to humanitarian aid and bring the Contadora process into the forefront in trying to arrive at a just peace.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Texas and others in expressing my enthusiastic support concerning the recent letter delivered to us from the President in the last few minutes with the President's request for $14 million for humanitarian aid for the Contras fighting to bring about change in Nicaragua.

As the Senator from Texas has said, I think the President has gone far more than halfway toward meeting the subjects raised by those of us in negotiations in the last several days on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, we are not here debating a political issue, a partisan political issue.

We are not here to decide whether or not aid is going to be given to one political party or leader.

We are here debating the national security interests of the United States of America. Our responsibility as U.S. Senators on matters affecting the security of this country is to lay aside partisan politics and do what we believe is right for all the American people.

There are those, I know, in this body who sincerely feel that the way we should bring about peace and stability in Central America is to take pressure off the Sandinista government, to stop aiding the Contras, to stop in some way, or impair, their ability to disrupt the present Government of Nicaragua.

We have tried the approach of cooperation with the Sandinista government.

I do not question the integrity or the patriotism on those who believe that we should not be aiding the Contras. I question their judgment. I question the wisdom of the policy that they are outlining.

Before we cut off aid in 1981 we had sent $118 million of aid to the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. We have tried the cooperative approach. We are here discussing whether or not we are going to send 12 percent of the amount of money that we have previously given to the Sandinista government to those who have taken up arms in trying to bring about a free and pluralistic society in that country, and have tried to aid in the effort to prevent that government from exporting arms and terrorist activities to neighboring nations.

After we expended $118 million helping the Sandinista government, what did we get? Of course, the freedom of the press has been diminished by that government, even after we gave them aid. The church has been interfered with in terms of its free activity, as the Archbishop of Nicaragua has so often stated. An internal security apparatus has been established. Increasing numbers of outside troops from Cuba and the Soviet bloc have been brought into that country.

It is clear to me that the only way we can bring about a peaceful solution, the only way we can bring about an improved chance for a pluralistic society, the only way we can get the Nicaraguan Government to enter into negotiations with us to try to stop subversion of their neighbors is to keep the pressure on.

One thing is certain: if we want to make sure that there are no negotiations on a meaningful basis between Nicaragua and the United States, if we want to make sure that the Sandinista government does not enter into good-faith negotiations with the Contras, if we want to make sure that they do not continue to take some actions that might liberalize freedom of the church and freedom of the press in their country, there is one way we can do that: remove all American pressure, remove it now, send a message to them that we will not support the Contras, send a message to them that we give them a free hand.

That is a guaranteed way to torpedo negotiations, to torpedo any movement toward freedom in Nicaragua, to stop any constraint on Nicaragua from exporting subversion to their neighbors.

I am not ready to do that. For those who are so naive as to believe that this government on its own, without any pressure from the United States, would act, I would ask them to look at the example of the Reverend Larry Jones from Oklahoma who attempted, after promises from Ortega, to deliver 225,000 pounds of food, 25,000 pounds of clothing, and a supply of medicine to the people of Nicaragua. He got that food into Nicaragua, but it has been confiscated by the government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enter into the RECORD a statement by the Reverend Jones and a news article about it.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE REVEREND LARRY JONES

I was assured by President Ortega—in an interview that I have on videotape—that I would be able to take food and clothing to local evangelical pastors in the Managua area and they, in turn, would be able to distribute it to the needy.

We had 228,000 pounds of beans and rice and 25,000 pounds of clothing which arrived on March 25th. I never saw any of it. The government confiscated it all, after I had received assurances from President Ortega that we would be able to distribute these goods.

I was also assured by a committee there that there would be no problem getting me a stadium to preach in. Thursday evening at 6:15 p.m. I was finally given access to a stadium with no lights, no sound system and I was told I could preach at 7 p.m. that same night. This gave me no opportunity to publicize the services. Later, I preached three consecutive nights in a church yard. I was also told I could broadcast on the radio but, conveniently the station, a small Christian station, was off the air. We were kept off-balance the entire time I was there. I never knew from one day to the next what was going to happen. The government did not keep any of the promises that they made to me.

I was a guest invited by the agency that the government in Nicaragua told me to work through. Actually, I was invited by three different organizations. If this is the way the government treats their invited guests, then how do they treat other people?

I was in Nicaragua five days this past week and four days over the Easter holidays . . . so altogether about 9 days in the last two weeks.

I want people to know that we went in as a relief organization to help the people of Nicaragua and the government confiscated our food, clothing, etc. and told us it was theirs.

I can only answer for what happened to me, not what might happen to other aid. But I want people to know what happened to me.

I was also told I could film the distribution of the food and clothing and, of course, was not so allowed because there was no distribution.

I plan to ask Congressional leaders to send a cable to the government to try and help me get my food and my clothing back.

I would like to go back to Nicaragua at a time when I would be allowed to distribute the food and clothing to the evangelical pastors as I had been promised.

[From the Daily Oklahoman/Times, Apr. 22, 1984]

JONES CLAIMS FOOD, BIBLES CONFISCATED

(By Allan Cremley)

WASHINGTON.—The Nicaraguan government confiscated 288,000 pounds of food that Oklahoma City Evangelist Larry Jones had been assured he could distribute through evangelical churches without interference, Jones told The Oklahoman Sunday night.

The pro-communist Sandinistas in Managua also confiscated a truckload of clothing, 600 Bibles, 50,000 religious tracts and 10,000 sermons in Spanish.

"A great part of the food" had been donated by Oklahoma farmers, Jones said.

He said he was allowed by the Sandinistas to preach in a Managua churchyard, but the seven truckloads of goods were confiscated.

Jones left the country hurriedly, "greatly concerned" that he would be detained.

"With all the promises they had broken, we didn't know what they would do," he said, upon arriving in Washington Sunday night.

Jones recently had a meeting with Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega, who promised, Jones said, to allow him total freedom to bring in food and to preach in Nicaraguan churches, providing Jones stayed away from political controversy.

"We worked with the agency that their government had instructed us to work with," the evangelist said.

The food was to be delivered to a stadium, but "they kept telling me they had more than one stadium."

Jones said that Carlos Gallo, a province director, told him he was going to give the food to "displaced people."

Jones said Gallo told him that "when the food crosses the line (into Managua) it is ours (the government's)."

"They turned us over to an agency, then to another agency, and then another," Jones said.

He said trucks from the ocean-shipped cargo arrived in Managua on March 25, "but I've never seen any of it, and they knew from day one we needed it."

The goods were supposed to have been distributed by 1,337 evangelical pastors in Nicaragua.

When Jones finally discovered what had happened, he went to the American embassy in Managua Friday night and called his wife in Oklahoma City. The State Department was immediately notified.

Jones' foreign aid ministry is conducted through Feed the Children, an Oklahoma City-based organization.

Jones flew to Washington Sunday and sought a meeting today with the Oklahoma congressional delegation.

The action by the Sandinistas came only two days before Congress is scheduled to vote on the administration's requested release of $14 million in military aid to the anti-Sandinista rebels, known as the Contras.

I can't believe they (the Nicaraguans) are doing this to us on the eve of this vote," Jones said.

However, the administration request is thought to have no chance in Congress.

Jones was attempting to reach U.S. Sen. David Boren, a member of the Intelligence Committee who has expressed support for the Contra movement.

Boren, D-Seminole county, was instrumental in organizing a bi-partisan meeting at the White House Sunday to seek a compromise on Contra aid, but it was canceled.

Richard Halwell, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs, said Sunday night, the State Department is looking into the Jones matter.

He called the apparent doublecross "part of a continuing pattern—they have done it on a smaller scale with groups from Germany and Japan."

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, there are those who say this is only a letter from the President. I would only say this: It implements everything we have asked for, Mr. President, humanitarian aid, a ceasefire, bilateral talks, economic sanctions, and things all of us feel should be done.

I would only say as one Senator, one American Senator, I hope I never see the day when any of us stand up and say we cannot accept the word of the President of the United States no matter what party we belong to. He is my President as an American, and I am willing to accept his word in writing in a letter. I expect him to stand by it. On that basis, I enthusiastically support his request.

I yield any remaining time to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Chair notify me when I have 3 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I share the sentiments expressed by my friend from Texas and my friend from Oklahoma. I think if you look back a couple of years you will see we had a raging debate about El Salvador. At that time there were many in this body, the House, and in the country who felt there was no hope in El Salvador.

We devised a policy there between both parties. That policy basically encouraged those who believed in democracy and democracy in El Salvador. That policy demanded an end to human rights abuses there. That policy provided for a dialog with all factions in El Salvador. We encouraged that. That policy also encouraged free elections there.

All of those things, including participation in the church in this endeavor, have now begun to be realized.

We are a long way from closing the chapter in El Salvador. We are a long way from ending human rights abuses. But at least we have a bipartisan policy in that part of the world in an important country.

I suggest we have to do the same thing regarding Nicaragua.

The President has taken at least three steps backwards here in terms of his policy. He has agreed to humanitarian aid; he has agreed not to have the military option on the front burner; he has agreed as late as this afternoon to begin to look at economic options rather than simply military options, as alluded to by the Senator from Oklahoma.

He has also agreed late this afternoon, to include a provision in the draft of the letter, which I saw, that says we will vigorously pursue the end of human rights abuses in that important country by our allies and by others.

I think we have come a long way. I think this letter represents the beginning of a possible approach in Nicaragua that can enjoy a centrist-type bipartisan following.

That remains to be seen, but I hope that we will support this aid at this point in time. I think it would be very, very poor foreign policy if we decided after all of these assurances from the President to terminate all aid to the Contras.

Mr. President, I know the Senator from Illinois has a few comments he would like to make. I yield to him whatever time remains.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has nearly 3 minutes remaining.

The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, there have not been many issues recently as controversial as the question of what to do about Nicaragua. Layers upon layers of problems have beset U.S. policy with respect to Nicaragua for decades, not just for the past few years, but for decades.

Some would argue, and I think correctly to a certain degree, that U.S. involvement in Nicaragua since the turn of the century has not necessarily served the best interests of the people of Nicaragua. The United States dispatched the Marines to Nicaragua too many times to count and propped up oppressive regimes through the years. I submit that may be the case, Mr. President, but I would also suggest that the United States was very generous in its aid to the Nicaraguans after the fall of Somoza. This Nation helped Nicaragua get back on its feet in the late 1970's.

What did the Sandinistas do in response, Mr. President? They walked openly into the arms of the Cubans and the Soviets. We did not force them to take those steps. The Sandinistas did it on their own.

The history of American involvement in Nicaragua may be the first layer of controversy surrounding American policy, but the truly problematic issues which are of concern to Members of Congress today are to be found in the so-called Contra aid program.

Much of the current problem, I would suggest, is the fault of the administration itself. As the program has evolved since 1981, the White House has shifted its rationale for American support of the Contras on numerous occasions. In the process, I think it is fair to state, the administration slowly but surely squandered support for the program both in Congress and with the American people. To make matters worse, reports surfaced that the CIA was involved in the mining of Nicaraguan harbors—a move I condemned—and that the Senate Intelligence Committee was not notified beforehand, in apparent violation of a commitment made to the committee.

Then, there was the CIA-produced booklet instructing Nicaraguans on terror tactics. The list goes on and on, Mr. President, but I think the point is clear: The administration keeps shooting itself in the foot, draining little by little any American resolve to protect our interests in the area.

The next layer of controversy concerns the Contras, or freedom fighters as President Reagan puts it. Who are they? Are they would-be founders of a truly democratic society in Nicaragua, or former national guardmen under Somoza who would turn the clock back to pre-revolutionary Nicaragua? The answer, in my mind at least, is clear—they are both. Some opponents of the Sandinistas are committed to the path of democracy, such as Arturo Cruz, whose recent peace proposals struck a responsive chord in many peoples' minds. Others, unfortunately, are committed to a path of destruction and terror, intent upon military strikes against civilian targets and innumerable human rights violations in the process.

Yes, Mr. President; the United States is involved in a messy, very messy affair. Yet, against this backdrop of controversy, there remains one central fact which cannot be effectively refuted, at least as far as this Senator is concerned: The Sandinistas have voluntarily moved into the Soviet-Cuban camp, and the Contras are involved in an effort to prevent Nicaragua from becoming another Cuba in America's backyard. All of us are well aware of what happened to Cuba under Castro. It would be a tragic error to ignore now the lesson we painfully learned from the Cuban experience.

If I am correct, then I believe it is in this Nation's interest to prevent that occurrence by the most effective means available. All of us in Congress would prefer to witness democratic change by peaceful, diplomatic processes. I strongly agree with my distinguished colleagues, notably Senator SAM NUNN, that President Reagan was correct to embrace the democratic resistance proposal for an immediate cease-fire and commencement of a national dialog with Nicaragua. Thus, I think it is imperative that serious diplomatic and economic options be brought to the forefront of American policy.

At the same time, I also believe that the United States has a solemn commitment to the democratic forces, led by Arturo Cruz and others. That includes resumption of humanitarian aid to the democratic opposition for the near future, at the very least.

Too much is at stake, Mr. President, to just walk away from Nicaragua. If we do, I am convinced that the United States will regret its decisions a few years down the road. After more than 3 years of false starts and missteps in that area, it is now time to piece together an effective foreign policy for Nicaragua which will be sustainable in Congress and with the American public for years to come. If we have learned anything since Vietnam, it is that a foreign policy cannot be sustained without the support of the American people. Today's effort is, I hope, a step in the right direction.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my remarks given on this subject last week be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COALITION FOR A DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY

Thank you, Harriet. I appreciate your generous remarks. Those of us from Georgia, along with many others from around the country, know that the Democratic Party has no greater friend, no more energetic supporter and no more effective leader than Harriet Zimmerman.

Helen Jackson, Chairman Wattenberg, President Rosenblatt, Penn Kembell, Congressman Fascell, Congressman Aspin, ladies and gentlemen:

My election to the United States Senate twelve years ago brought me many opportunities, but among the greatest opportunities was the privilege of working with and being a colleague of Scoop Jackson. From the day I arrived in Washington, Scoop was my friend, he was my teacher, he was my colleague, and he was my mentor.

This award is well named. Scoop Jackson was truly a friend of freedom.

I am honored to be placed in the company of Dante Fascell, who received the first Henry M. Jackson Award last year, and Les Aspin, with whom I share this recognition tonight. Both of these outstanding legislators serve this nation in the finest tradition of Scoop Jackson.

Scoop's leadership and voice are missed today in the Democratic Party and in the nation. It is altogether fitting that the Coalition for a Democratic Majority gives its highest honor in the name of Scoop Jackson. I am deeply grateful to the CDM for this award.

To honor Henry Jackson, we must remember the noble vision of America's role in the world constitutes his indelible legacy.

Scoop understood that the struggle of our time is between freedom and totalitarianism. He knew that only a strong America, willing to assert its leadership in the world community in defense of democratic values, can ensure that free people will triumph in the end.

For more than a decade, your organization has exemplified the best of the Democratic Party—our traditional support for a strong national defense, for a foreign policy that promotes freedom and opportunity around the world and for a dynamic and equitable economic policy that enjoy the support of a majority of the American people.

A quarter of a century ago, John F. Kennedy wrote that our nation reeled:

"From crisis to crisis for two reasons: First, because we have not developed a strategy for peace that is relevant to the new world in which we live; and secondly, because we have not been paying the price which that strategy demands—a price measured not merely in money and military preparedness, but in social inventiveness, in moral stamina, in physical courage."

Your Council kept our gaze fixed on these goals—the preparedness, the innovations, the stamina, the courage that are essential for Democrats if we are to return to our traditional role as the majority party and for our nation if we are to meet the challenges of the coming years.

One of the most important—and most difficult—of these challenges is the dilemma we face in Central America.

No one should have any illusions about what the struggle in Central America is about. It is a struggle between brave men and women fighting for democracy and a better life on one side and on the other side, the enemies of freedom, both on the left and on the right. And no one should have any doubt where America should stand in that conflict. We should stand with the forces of democracy.

We stand with the democratic center in El Salvador: we oppose both death squads on the right and the Marxist guerrillas on the left.

The outpouring of popular support in El Salvador for President Duarte as expressed at the ballot box is a moving example of the power and appeal of democracy.

This success demonstrates the wisdom of a U.S. foreign policy when it is centrist and when it enjoys broad bipartisan support.

Unfortunately, no one is claiming "victory" in El Salvador. The war goes on. Human rights abuses, by both the right and left, continue, though diminished. There has been inadequate investigation and prosecution of the murderers of American citizens. And democracy, while growing, remains fragile and vulnerable. But we are beginning to build a sustainable policy towards that nation, a policy that has increasing bipartisan support.

But that is not the case in Nicaragua. Our policy there is in a muddle. It does not command the support of the American people and the Congress—and until it does it is not likely to succeed. Some of the Administration's critics, appear content simply to defeat the President's proposal for additional aid to the contras. I believe the Democratic Party has the responsibility to offer an alternative course.

As I see it, U.S. interests in the region can be reduced to two simple objectives: one, we must foster genuine democratic principles as well as economic and social growth, and two, we must prevent the Soviets or the Cubans or their surrogates from making Central America a base for the projection of their power. If we support dialogue, democracy, and national reconciliation in El Salvador as we do, we should also support those goals in Nicaragua.

Next week, the Congress faces a difficult yes or no vote on whether to release $14 million already appropriated for continued covert aid for the contras in Nicaragua. An increasing number in Congress are uncomfortable with either a yes or a no vote.

A "no" vote would be perceived as:

The end of all aid for the Contras; a victory for the Sandinistas; withdrawal of the United States from further active involvement concerning Nicaragua.

I feel these results are unacceptable.

On the other hand—as economists are fond of saying—a yes vote under the present policies of the Reagan Administration is not likely to result in significant leverage vis a vis the Sandinistas or a change in their behavior.

First, even if the President wins the vote in the Senate and the House (which is possible but not probable) the victory will be very narrow and not reflect any lasting consensus or any long-term sustainable approach.

Second, the $14 million will last only a few months, and the entire battle must be fought again prior to the first of October, the beginning of the next Fiscal Year.

Third, if the President wins and if his peace plan is accepted but if there is no agreement after 60 days of peace talks, the President proposes to pull the trigger for more military aid. The catch is there won't be much money left. Thus, the President's trigger which converts humanitarian to military aid is merely a symbol. Without further Congressional approval of substantially more money for FY 1986, if the President pulls the trigger for military aid, the gun will simply not be loaded.

Our dilemma is clear, but the answers are much more complex. Our challenge as a nation is to chart a course toward Nicaragua that enjoys bipartisan support and is also sustainable.

We must avoid the "Lebanon syndrome" in which the President and Congress establish arbitrary and unrealistic time limits to complex foreign policy goals.

I am hopeful that the President and the Congress will consider an alternate, long-range approach.

In my judgment we must design a policy that continues pressure on the Sandinistas while moving American promotion of military action in that region to the back burner.

The American people must believe that all avenues of diplomatic, economic and political pressure have been exhausted if there is to be any lasting support for military related options. This is not the case today. Right or wrong, the perception is that the military option through the contras has been on the front burner and is the President's course of first resort.

The challenge is to move the military option to the back burner while keeping it on the stove and honoring our commitment to the democratic forces in Nicaragua. This means resuming an adequate amount of humanitarian aid both now and for the foreseeable future with no arbitrary termination dates. America would not furnish lethal aid and equipment, but the contra movement would be assisted with food, clothes, supplies, medical support and other necessary support.

While resuming humanitarian aid, I suggest that the diplomatic and economic options be moved to the front burner.

I agree with President Reagan's call on the Nicaraguan government to accept the recent proposal of the democratic resistance to agree to an immediate cease-fire and commencement of a national dialogue.

Further, I believe the United States should call on the Sandinistas to suspend their state of emergency, thereby lifting press restrictions and allowing for full freedom of association and assembly. If the Sandinistas agree to a cease-fire, if they open a dialogue and if they suspend the state of emergency, the United States should suspend military maneuvers in Honduras and off Nicaragua's coasts.

The United States should further call on the Nicaraguan armed opposition to purge from its ranks of all those responsible for serious human rights abuses. Congress and the American people must be convinced that we are supporting the true democrats, men like Arturo Cruz.

I do not believe this diplomatic approach will work without some form of pressure on the Sandinistas. While the military option remains in the background the President should make every effort to enlist the nations of the region in a coordinated effort to bring maximum economic pressure on the Sandinista government. One option which should be considered immediately is an economic embargo, enlisting our allies in the region and other allies throughout the world to the extent possible.

There is no guarantee that this approach will accomplish our goals. There is no perfect policy.

The responsibility of those of us who hold political office is not to seek an illusive and impossible purity, but to craft the best and most sustainable foreign policy to advance American interests and ideas.

If these political, diplomatic and economic steps do not work, the President could come back to Congress and request resumption of military aid. At that point, a request for military aid would be on a very different foundation. I would support and I am certain that many others would support an expedited procedure in both the House and Senate for the consideration of such Presidential request.

I am hopeful that the President will consider these suggestions before the vote next week.

With the President's support, I believe this concept could enjoy a consensus in Congress and provide a foundation for a sustainable, long-term policy regarding Nicaragua. If the President insists on voting on his present proposal, there is a good chance he will lose, and even if he wins I believe he will simply be postponing for a few short months the inevitable termination of all aid both military and humanitarian to the Contras.

The Democratic Party of Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, John Kennedy, Hubert Humphrey and Scoop Jackson was a party that knew how to be both tough-minded and idealistic. Those men knew that successful foreign policy requires strong military power but also requires skilful use of diplomatic and economic tools. It begins with America's best values—human dignity, liberty, freedom, and democracy and its best accomplished through cooperation with our allies. Such a foreign policy must be sustained by national will and a recognition by the American people that we are pursuing a cause that is just.

That is what I am calling for tonight—a just course, that can be sustained by the good judgment of the American people that we are pursuing a policy in Central America that is built upon the cherished values of democracy.

As Scoop Jackson said of Central America: "There are no quick fixes. Piecemeal proposals and frantic, ad hoc programs are inadequate. The United States faces a profound, long-term challenge in Central America and must devise a set of long-term policies to match it."

I suggest that we pursue the goals together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair, and I thank the whip of the minority.

I am delighted that a compromise has finally been reached, Mr. President. I have been one of those appealing for reason and understanding. I do not know why it has taken so long to come up with what seems to be more or less accepted by those of us who wanted to not send the wrong signal internationally through the request from the President of the United States.

I attended two meetings last week, and I was kept advised of the meetings that went on at the White House over the weekend, so I am delighted now that some of the main participants are happy it happened and would generally agree. The question I have, Mr. President, is this is supposed to be the most deliberative body in the world. If we are all for this that the President has incorporated in his letter, then why do we not take down the matter before us and do things right?

Some very learned Members of this body, including lawyers, which I am not, have stood up and applauded this effort. On what are we voting, Mr. President? If we are about to vote, let me quote what we are voting:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

That is the law. That is going to be the law if we pass it. It is true that the President now comes along in his letter and says, "However, my intentions are founded on a different approach," is that the way the most deliberative body in the world passes laws—laws that say one thing very clearly but a letter from the President of the United States says something else?

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield on my time?

Mr. EXON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I should like to point out that Public Law 98-473 passed October 12, 1984, provides specifically—and this is a matter of law already—that the only matter that can be before this body now shall state that "the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua."

There is no leeway. That is the law. We could not change this by rule of the Senate, nor change it by unanimous consent of the Senate. It is not subject to amendment, point of order, or any other motion.

So my good friend misleads the Senate by indicating that somehow or other these words were intended to carry purpose far beyond what was in the law we adopted last year.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator be good enough to yield 2 minutes on my time to reply to what he just said? I am out of time over here.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, I yield 2 minutes.

Mr. EXON. I think the Senator from Alaska knows full well there has been a concerted effort to get a unanimous-consent agreement to make changes in this law. Is the Senator from Alaska saying that if we could get a unanimous consent we could not do this correctly rather than the way we are doing it? I think the Senator from Alaska knows.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I will speak to that when I am recognized, but the answer is it could not be done by unanimous consent and still bind the House because, if you look at the law which was passed last year, the only matter that can be before both Houses is that precise language, in order to be fast tracked and to release the $14 million which was already been made available by the continuing resolution adopted by the Congress last December.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, back on my time, just let me finish by saying there must be some way under our Constitution that we can make a change in the law by unanimous consent, and I was advised that we could, efforts were being made. Several Senators indicated that they wanted to so move.

In any event, Mr. President, I think this is a bad way to enact a law, but I am happy at least that an arrangement has been made that I think solves the basic objections I had to Senate Joint Resolution 106 when it was introduced, but I object to this process.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise to voice my objection to Senate Joint Resolution 106 which is currently before us. As my colleagues should be well aware, the resolved clause of that resolution states "That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua." Not across the border, not anyplace else but in Nicaragua.

Now, the President and the supporters of this say it means a lot of other things, but that is not what we are voting, Mr. President. We are not voting on letters. We are not voting on stated intentions. We are not voting on negotiations at the White House. We are voting on whether we send money down there that can be used for food and so on, and release other money that can be used for arms. So this is an "ammo" vote as I see it.

I am unalterably opposed to this open-ended authorization given to the President. I hope my colleagues, whether they support the present policy or not, reject this gross abdication of Senate responsibility. The resolution pertains specifically to the 1985 money, but this unlimited authority I disagree with, giving the President, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operational authority in Nicaragua. I do not know what you need in a declaration of war.

I might ask, where has the great American free press been all through this? I challenge the gallery. Ninety percent of the writing we have seen on this has stressed the confrontation between Congress and the White House. How many people have literally read that what we are doing is giving the President support, directly or indirectly, for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. That is an advance Gulf of Tonkin resolution if I ever heard it. The President has put forth a peace plan in which there may be a few new things worthy of consideration, yet at the same time talks about people down there being the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers.

Well, I am not apologizing for the Sandinistas. Our difficulties with them are well-known. We object to their denial of basic rights, freedom at home, support of revolution abroad, and I want to do what we can to make sure we change that regime. But I am not as the U.S. Senator from the State of Ohio going to stand here and vote for something that gives the President a blank check for a Tonkin Gulf resolution, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, a nation with which we have diplomatic relations.

So what I hope we do, Mr. President, is we defeat this, and defeat it badly, then get on with putting a compromise before us that I can support. I will not abdicate my responsibility, and I will probably support it. But it will not be Senate Joint Resolution 106 saying that the President can actually go into these nations with our blessing in advance, do whatever he wants to do, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary, in a nation with which we have diplomatic relations.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this. Then let us get on with a compromise that all of us can support which shows how much we dislike this regime in Nicaragua.

Mr. DURENBERGER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield time to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, unlike my colleague from Ohio, I would suggest that the people in the gallery have done a pretty good job. I think they have done a pretty good job of letting us know that we are not debating foreign policy here tonight and, on the half-dozen other occasions on which we have addressed the subject, we have not debated foreign policy, either.

Mr. President, for 6 long years we in this body have been struggling with the issue of Central America. Repeatedly, we have attempted to reduce a large and complex problem to a series of fragments that conveniently fit into our legislative frame of reference. We have surrendered our role as a deliberative body designed to deal with the largest conceptual issues, and have resorted instead to the methods of a cost accountant. Procedure consistently has overtaken substance, and the result has been that our foreign policy has lacked any sense of long-term vision.

Clearly, we are not alone in this approach, for the Congress is supposed to oversee and debate the policy suggestions put forward by the executive branch. For as long as I have been here, we have not seen a long-term, comprehensive, and affirmative policy. Instead, we have seen a few program elements and a lot of rhetoric. So it is perhaps understandable that Congress has tried to create a policy by default through the adoption of various joint resolutions, reporting procedures, certification requirements, and fencing restrictions around funding. But if this approach is understandable, it is not appropriate. It both inhibits the adoption of a genuine policy and enmires Congress in procedural rather than substantive debates.

There is no better illustration of the limits to our past approach than the situation we face today. We are offered, thanks to our own handiwork last fall, a poor and artificial choice: Whether or not to vote for Senate Joint Resolution 106, which releases $14 million for the Nicaraguan opposition.

If we adopt Senate Joint Resolution 106, we release some money. But we will still lack the comprehensive and affirmative policy we have needed for so many years. So we risk spending money in support of a policy which has yet to emerge.

But if we vote against Senate Joint Resolution 106, we will make such a policy impossible, for we will virtually abandon any role in the region and we will embolden a Sandinista leadership which all of us agree is engaged in destabilizing and repressive actions.

Mr. President, this is not the kind of a choice I welcome, and it is not the kind of choice I want to face again. I would prefer that we spend our time looking at a policy, not flipping a coin to choose between a fragmented policy and no policy at all.

So, I hope that we will have learned the futility of congressional conditions on programs in place of overall policy. I hope we will remember how our experiment with the artificial box-checking exercise of certification for aid to El Salvador led us nowhere.

I hope we will remember as well the fallacy of the approach we took in section 8066 of last year's continuing resolution—the procedure under which we are operating today. We challenged the President to file a report. He did so. We did not challenge the President to develop a long-term policy, so he has not done so.

The Senator from Missouri earlier reminded us of Inspector Clouzot from "The Pink Panther" and asked that Congress stop trying to make foreign policy. He is probably right. But the reality is that we are going to continue to do it and we have done it in Central America with our box-checking exercises in El Salvador. We did it last fall on section 8066, which is what brought this simple little one-line statement that the Senator from Nebraska quoted before us today. He read it right; it is a one liner. At the end, you check the box that says "yes" or you check the box that says "no" and it does not tell you anything.

Over the past few weeks, as many of us prepared for the debate today, we sought a third alternative to the narrow choice given to us by section 8066. Ideally, we would today be discussing the passage of an alternate resolution which expresses support for the Nicaraguan opposition, eliminates covert lethal military aid, and frees us from the artificial constraints on debate imposed by section 8066. Finally, of course, we would be discussing binding congressional legislation. In other words, ideally we would today be acting as legislators who are commenting on policy, not as simple cost accountants who determine whether or not a piece of paper has been filed.

Unfortunately, our own procedures made the adoption of this alternative resolution—or any other alternative resolution—impossible. Under the procedures with which we saddled ourselves, we cannot even consider, much less vote upon, an alternative resolution without the consent of two-thirds of the Senate. In other words, we have imposed upon ourselves a deliberate weakness, which prohibits us from acting as Senators who share responsibility for foreign policy. We have given ourselves no exit from the untenable choice I mentioned at the start of my remarks.

The danger of this procedural refinement became clear to me over the past few days as I discussed with many of my colleagues the possibility of creating a third alternative. All were enthusiastic in principle, even if they disagreed with the particulars of my suggestion. But we all discovered that adopting an alternative would simply not be feasible, given the requirement for a two-thirds vote.

This came to a head yesterday at the White House, when several of us from both sides of the aisle and all sides of the Central America issue spent 9 hours negotiating with the administration to try to break out of the logjam. We did succeed in significantly altering the President's plans. But we did not succeed in gaining a new legislative vehicle with which to sharpen that agreement. So we face today a simple yes-no proposition on Senate Joint Resolution 106, and we must recognize that our debate is artificially limited as a result.

So what are the poor folks in the press gallery to tell the people of this country that we are doing?

Senate Joint Resolution 106, which I support, simply provides $14 million for support of the Nicaraguan opposition. It says nothing at all about the conditions attached to that support. It says nothing at all about the objectives of U.S. policy, says nothing about the limitations on the expenditure of money. The reason it is that way is that we do not have a policy from which to operate.

You do not build a policy on peripheral issues like $14 million worth of either lethal aid or nonlethal aid or food, medicine, clothing, or whatever. You do not build a policy on that. And we ought to.

You do not build a policy around inconsistencies or credibility. You do not claim on the one hand that people who do not want Soviet communism in their hemisphere ought to rise up and vote $14 million in humanitarian aid when, on the other hand, we have, as others have pointed out, absolutely free trade with Nicaragua and diplomatic recognition. And we swear we will never send an Army, Navy, Marines, Coast Guard, whatever, to defend our country.

You do not have a policy if you cannot even get something really significant like the Jackson plan through this body. Now, there is a policy, but you cannot even get it through this body.

You do not have a policy when you do not know exactly what it is that "democratic revolution" means.

You do not have a policy when the people of the countries of Central America can vote, as the Panamanian legislature did, "Go ahead, United States, put some lethal aid in there, but if we catch you doing it and it is embarrassing to us, we will be against you."

You do not have a policy in the absence of larger goals. So, today, we are not debating some kind of comprehensive policy; we are debating a simple one-line statement of fact. And with it, after some period of negotiations, in which I participated, we will have conditions on the implementation of that one-liner from the President of the United States, who is responsible for policy.

But that statement will not give us any policy, either. So I am going to urge my colleagues to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read the speech the Senator from Georgia put in on his own. I wish I had put it in for him, because he gave a great speech last week on policy. I liked it because a lot of it was like a speech I gave 2 weeks ago at the National Press Club on the same subject, which was also put in the RECORD.

I concluded that we needed to guide any policy with six principles. I cautioned that in the absence of such principles, the United States would prove ineffective in its quest for regional stability and democratization.

First, I urged that we avoid building our policy on such peripheral issues as a $14 million lethal covert aid program. Policy requires the support of the public, and the previous formula for covert assistance has long since reached a dead end. Yet the administration persisted in trying to make this the centerpiece of its regional policy.

Second, I said that we must try to gain some credibility in our policy by balancing our rhetoric and our will. Yet no one has yet suggested either scaling back the rhetoric or upgrading that action.

Third, I urged that we rely more heavily upon economic tools like the Jackson plan, a 5-year program for stabilization and revitalization of Central America. Yet Congress and the administration continue to parcel out aid in small doses.

I could go on, but I shall not. The point would still be the same. The President is not offering and we are not proposing a comprehensive policy. If we do not soon do so, we can simply forget any prospect for a positive U.S. role in Central America. Instead, we will find ourselves, as we have too often found ourselves in the past, reacting to events rather than helping to shape them.

Therefore, we face one fundamental challenge today. We must buy the time for the President and for this body and our colleagues in the House to develop a policy. If we walk away from the problem, we will never see such a policy. But we cannot buy time at the cost of a lethal covert aid program which no one supports and which can no longer masquerade as a policy. We must buy time, but we must do so carefully.

Under the circumstances, those of us who met yesterday at the White House obtained a number of significant concessions from the Presdient with respect to today's vote. These concessions are backed up in a letter, and compliance with them will be measured and monitored through extensive auditing procedures and reporting to the Congress.

When President Reagan first proposed the appropriation of $14 million on April 2, he couched his plans in terms which were simply unacceptable. While his endorsement of the UNIR offer to engage in church-sponsored negotiations was a positive move, the plan contained what I referred to as a "razor blade in an apple": It permitted the President, after 60 days and without congressional assent, to convert the $14 million from humanitarian to military assistance. The decision to provide lethal aid would rest exclusively with the President, and Congress was in essence being asked to abrogate its responsibilities.

Those of us who met at the White House yesterday made very clear to the President that his proposal was out of the question, and that if he intended to use the $14 million to do in the future what we had tried in the past, Congress would prohibit an expenditures. Moreover, a number of Senators made clear their view that the UNIR negotiations were not enough. They insisted upon United States-Nicaraguan negotiations.

After 9 hours of negotiations, the President agreed to go back to the drawing board and rewrite his plan. He has done so, in a letter. Let me note a few of the highlights.

First, if we vote for Senate Joint Resolution 106, and free up the $14 million appropriated last year, every penny of that money will go for nonlethal assistance to the Nicaraguan opposition. Not 1 cent will go for arms and ammunition.

Second, the lethal triger on this aid—the razor blade in the apple—has been removed. The President cannot unilaterally decide to switch the funding from humanitarian to military goods.

Third, the administration will at all times fully consult with Congress concerning the provision of this nonlethal aid.

Fourth, bilateral talks with Managua will be resumed.

Finally, in the event of a cease-fire between the opposition and the Sandinista government, all assistance will be terminated if the opposition violates the cease-fire.

Mr. President, I think we have come a long way since the time when we were talking about lethal assistance under the guise of a covert program. We have come a long way since the time when our policy seemed to be summarized in the phrase "make them cry uncle." We have tempered the U.S. approach, and we have bought the time needed for the development of a genuine policy.

Under the circumstances, therefore, I feel confident that most Senators can and should support the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 106. A failure to do so will make any future policy impossible, and it will signal what very few of us believe: that we are acquiescent about the Sandinista government.

But while we have made a significant gain in tactics, we must commit ourselves to go farther over the next 5 months.

The President must not believe that our willingness to keep our word to the FDN and to show our resolve to the Sandinistas means that we will be patient with a nonpolicy. He must begin to move in the direction that many of us have called for, whether in my speech at the Press Club or in Senator NUNN's speech a few nights ago.

Equally, the Sandinistas must recognize that while we have had some tactical disputes with the President, we are firm in our resolve to oppose subversion abroad and repression at home by the FSLN minority. We will meet our obligations.

Finally, Congress must come to recognize that it is better to have a debate on policy than a narrow yes-no vote on tactics. It is better that 100 Senators discuss this issue than that a handful go to the White House at the last minute. We can move in this direction only by avoiding in the future the approach which has thus far limited rather than liberated this body as a major institution in foreign policy.

I urge my colleagues, between now and next fall, when we will undoubtedly address this issue again, to make ourselves more familiar than I think this administration is with the larger goals of the United States of America in this hemisphere.

Mr. PRYOR. Will the Senator yield for a quick question?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I am not sure I have any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has just expired.

Mr. PRYOR. Will the manager of the bill yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have a considerable number of requests for time. I shall be happy to yield once I have exhausted those times.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, today's vote on aid to the Contra freedom fighters is critical not only to America's national security, but to our continued credibility as a nation that has long dedicated itself to supporting democracy in this hemisphere.

Make no mistake about it, Nicaragua's current Sandinista Marxist dominated government is a threat to such democracy. Both by action and deed, the Sandinistas have made this clear. Certainly, there no longer is any question about the totalitarian character of Sandinistas rule. The Sandinistas have publicly announced themselves as Marxist-Leninists and have willfully excluded all other political elements from government rule—in most cases forcing these elements into the active opposition, which now supports Contra activity.

Nor can there be any doubt about Sandinista expansionist motives outside of Nicaragua. Indeed, less than 1 year after establishing Sandinista rule, the party's leadership declared "This Revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist from the moment Sandino fought in La Segovia." Clarifying this statement, Nicaragua Foreign Minister De'Escoto in 1980 explained:

> You [the U.S.] may look at us as five countries, six now with Panama, but we regard ourselves as six different states of a single nation, the process of reunification.

Finally, when asked recently if the Sandinista revolution would be exported to "El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico," Tomas Borge, Nicaraguas Interior Minister responded "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that's absolutely true."

Beyond Sandinista intentions, however, are Sandinista actions. In 1979, just prior to their successful overthrow of the Somoza, the Sandinista forces consisted of approximately 5,000 men. Somoza's National Guard had no more than 14,000 men. In all of Nicaragua, there were only three operational World War II vintage tanks and 25 antiquated armored cars.

Having no external enemies, and having been entirely victorious over Somoza's National Guard, the Sandinistas had no cause to increase their military unless they had aspirations beyond their borders. The buildup started almost immediately. The results: Sandinistas now have 62,000 military on active duty with an additional 57,000 available at any time to bolster Nicaragua's forces to 119,000—a figure larger than the military forces of Costa Rica, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras combined. In addition to these forces, over 9,000 Cuban advisers are now in Nicaragua—3,000 of which are attached to Nicaraguan intelligence or military agencies—along with advisers from the Soviet Union and East Germany.

Over 340 tanks and armored vehicles geared for offensive action on Nicaragua's north Atlantic border with Honduras have been shipped into Nicaragua from the Eastern bloc along with scores of advanced long-range artillery pieces, tactical barrage rocket launchers, fuel tanker trucks, tank bridging equipment, chemical warfare equipment, advanced attack helicopters, military transport planes, torpedo boats, and command and control facilities. Finally, with Cuban help, the Sandinistas have constructed a major air base with a 5-foot thick, 10,000 foot-long runway capable of taking any air transport or jet bomber in the Soviet inventory.

Secure in the knowledge that none of its neighbors would risk countering its interference in their affairs by actually invading Nicaraguan territory, the Sandinistas have attempted to overthrow or destabilize each of its neighbors. Arms shipments to El Salvadoran Communist rebels from Nicaragua increased immediately and dramatically after the Sandinistas came to power.

These shipments are made by sea, air, and land transport. In addition to making Vietnamese and Soviet Bloc and deliveries to Salvadoran rebels, the Sandinistas, continue to train Salvadoran rebels in three major military camps operated within Nicaragua and operate a command and control center dedicated to rebel operations.

Sandinista coordinated operations against Hondurans began in earnest in 1981 with the channeling of Honduran rebel forces to Cuba for training and their reinfiltration through Nicaragua. Air drops of supplies were planned for these infiltrating forces from Nicaragua, but most of these advance forces have been captured before they could establish their network. Similar efforts to train and infiltrate rebel forces into Honduras have been repeated and continue today.

In Costa Rica, leftist kidnapings, bombings, and assignations, coordinated and aided by Sandinista cooperatives, have increased and use of Costa Rica as an arms transit point into El Salvador continues.

This, then, brings us to what we ought to do. Early on when the Sandinistas took power, we had hoped the revolution would remain pluralistic and that the non-Communists who were central to the revolution would remain central to the revolutionary government. This was not be be. Key non-Communist members of the revolutionary government—Alfonso Roberts, an original member of the five-man ruling Sandinista junta; Arturu Cruz, member of the junta and Ambassador to the United States; Alfredo Cesar, Executive Director of the Banking Superior Council; Eden Pastora, Vice Minister of Interior and Defense—all joined or became supporters of the Contras.

What is America's best hope for bringing pluralistic democracy back to Nicaragua? We have a choice. The Contra forces, which now numbers over 15,000 have joined the Nicaraguan Episcopal Conference and the members of the Coordinadora group of non-Communist democratic political organizations remaining in Nicaragua in calling for fair elections. Unlike the Communist rebels in El Salvador, the Contras have made it clear that they do not expect an immediate place in the existing government. All they demand is the lifting of the state of emergency, general amnesty for political crimes and prisoners and dialog leading to observed elections.

Support of the Contras means support of this agenda and the political leverage and pressure to see it realized. That is what today's vote is about.

If we fail to join the Contras to give them the support they need, we should be clear on what the consequences are likely to be. First the agenda above will be jeopardized. Certainly, the Sandanistas have no reason to become pluralistic or more liberal without Contra pressure. Their officials have already candidly admitted that their recent elections were held and rigged only because of the pressures their opponents and the United States placed upon them to live up to their pledge to the Organization of American States to hold elections.

With a clear denial of aid to the Contras, the Sandinistas' only armed organized resistance, Nicaragua and the region will understand that we will be retreating to reliance on Nicaragua's goodwill. The exodus of people out of Nicaragua will continue—over 10 percent of its population have already left presenting destabilizing refugee problems on Honduras and Costa Rica's doorstep—the subversion will continue, and the arms buildup in Nicaragua will increase. There will be talk of negotiations but the message to all will be clear: Heed Nicaragua's will on any agreement or solution, Contadoran or otherwise, or face immediate or prompt danger.

Mr. President, the United States has always stood for the maintenance of democracy, particularly in Latin America. We have understood that we risk our own national security when we allow totalitarian revolutions to breed at our doorstep.

The Sandinista revolutions is just such a revolution. We have already paid dearly for Cuba—we have had to spend billions to check the military threat it poses ot our shipping and our ability to resupply our NATO allies in war. If Nicaragua should go firmly into the Soviet camp we will certainly have to pay dearly again. Morality, faith, and support of pluralism, and our own national security, then, suggests the expediency of continued support of the Contras. Indeed, if we are unable to see the merit of spending $14 millions for a cause so clearly in our interest, confidence that we might sacrifice for any less a cause is lost.

Mr. President, the issue before us is not whether the Sandinista government is a Marxist government. It is not whether it is a fact that the Sandinistas are helping the insurgents in El Salvador. The issue is not whether this government has in fact stated its intentions are to expand beyond its border. Both of those questions are answered in the affirmative that they are in fact doing that in El Salvador. They do have ambitions beyond the borders. Their leaders state so.

The question before us is what are we going to do about it? That is the issue. The answer to that question, according to the administration and the effort that they want to make, is to have some sort of containment. They want to support the freedom fighters, support the Contras in Nicaragua.

Is there anything wrong with supporting freedom fighters? Is there anything wrong with supporting freedom? Was it wrong for the French to support the freedom fighters in America during the Revolution? I say not.

Was it wrong for our Government to support the freedom fighters in 1947 in Greece and Turkey? I dare to say it was not wrong.

Is it wrong to support the freedom fighters in Afghanistan? I say it is not. Therefore, I do not think it is wrong for us to support the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

I have heard a lot of discussion about ambiguity. This issue is not clear. Now we have a letter that is supposedly on its way that has been signed that is perhaps going to clear it up. I am not so sure it is going to clear it up. Perhaps our stated policy may be more ambiguous tonight than it was before. But I am hopeful that we can all at some time get together and figure out whether we are in fact going to support freedom in Nicaragua and elsewhere in the world or we are not.

I would say that is certainly the issue before us and this Nation that is steeped in freedom, the last bastion of hope for many countries around the world, that we cannot turn our backs on the freedom that is trying to be provided in Nicaragua or elsewhere in the world. It is a worthy cause and I think it is what the administration seeks to do.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the manager yield me time?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE].

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the attached article be printed in the RECORD. It describes the consequences of a negative Senate vote on aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters—they will be defeated, killed, and driven from their homeland if we fail to restore aid to them.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SANDINISTAS SAID TO READY OFFENSIVE AGAINST CONTRAS

(By Tom Diaz)

The Nicaraguan army will launch a major offensive within the next few weeks that will drive Nicaraguan resistance forces back into Honduras, a retired U.S. Army officer who recently returned from Nicaragua predicted yesterday.

"It's just a matter of time until you're going to find an awful lot of dead Contras in Nicaragua and a lot of other ones back in Honduras," said Lt. Col. Edward L. King.

Col. King served during the 1960s as a liaison officer with the Inter-American Defense Board, and as defense policy adviser to formers Sen. George L. McGovern during the latter's 1972 presidential campaign. He is a well-known opponent of the Reagan administration's policy in Central America.

He returned last month from a visit to Nicaragua, made as paid consultant to the Unitarian Universalist Service Committee, during which he visited Sandinsita military units and observed fighting in northern provinces.

Speaking at a press conference sponsored by Foreign Policy magazine, Col King released a report he wrote for the committee, aimed at rebutting points made in several background papers jointly released by the departments of State and Defense on Soviet and Cuban influence in Nicaragua.

"I think that within a few weeks the elite Sandinista forces will begin an all-out offensive that will drive the FDN [the main resistance force] military forces out of Nicaragua and back into Honduras," he said in his report.

"There has been a clearing of the zones in Jinotega and Chinandega border areas where the Contras have been operating," Col. King said at the press conference.

He said he observed combat in the Jinotega area during February and saw Sandinsita operations to move civilians out of the area.

"The idea being that anything that moves up in that area will either be Sandinista or Contra," he said.

Such a situation would allow the Sandinistas to make maximum use of their artillery and eight Soviet Mi-24 Hind gunship helicopters. The Hinds—which U.S. military men describe as "awesome" in their firepower and "flying tanks"—are not yet known to have been used in combat operations by the Sandinistas.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article in the Washington Times of April 18, 1985, entitled "Soviets Seen In Combat With Sandinistas," be printed in the RECORD. President Reagan himself has confirmed the presence of Soviet military advisers in combat with the Marxist Sandinistas against the Nicaraguan freedom fighters. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed an article by Jim Guirard, Jr., from the Washington Times of April 19, 1985, entitled "Contras, Who Are They?" This is an excellent article by a prominent Democrat, arguing that the Contras, or Nicaraguan freedom fighters, are most democratic leaders who were anti-Somoza.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIETS SEEN IN COMBAT WITH SANDINISTAS

(By Jeremiah O'Leary)

Soviet military officers have been spotted serving with Sandinista combat troops fighting against the resistance forces in the Ocotal region on Nicaragua's northern frontier, according to U.S intelligence reports.

Administration officials have long known that the Sandinista army has Soviet advisers, along with others from Cuba, Libya and the Palestine Liberation Organization. But this is the first time any foreign troops have been detected serving with front-line Nicaraguan units in the combat zone along the border with Honduras.

Ocotal is in Nueva Segovia province about 60 miles from Tegucigalpa, a region where there has been considerable fighting between the Nicaraguan resistance and Sandinista armed forces.

The official sources said they did not have a head count on the number of Soviets with Sandinista combat units near Ocotal. They could not say with certainty whether the Soviets are acting as commanders, advisers or observers.

Meanwhile, the Nicaraguan army is expected to launch a major offensive within the next few weeks that will drive the resistance forces back into Honduras, a retired U.S. Army officer who recently returned from Nicaragua predicted.

"It's just a matter of time until you're going to find an awful lot of dead Contras in Nicagagua and a lot of other ones back in Honduras," said Lt. Col. Edward L. King, who served during the 1960s as a liaison officer with the Inter-American Defense Board and as defense policy adviser to former Sen. George L. McGovern during the latter's 1972 presidential campaign.

He is a well-known opponent of the Reagan administration's policy in Central America.

"I think that within a few weeks the elite Sandinista forces will begin an all-out offensive that will drive the FDN [the main resistance group] military forces out of Nicaragua and back into Honduras," he said in his report.

"There has been a clearing of the zones in Jinotega and Chinandega border areas where the Contras have been operating," Col. King said at the press conferece.

He said he observed combat in the Jinotega area during February and saw Sandinista operations to move civilians out of the area. "The idea being that anything that moves up in that area will either be Sandinista or Contra," he said.

Such a situation would allow the Sandinistas to make maximum use of their artillery and eight Soviet Mi-24 Hind gunship helicopters. The Hinds—which U.S. military men describe as "awesome" in their firepower and like "flying tands"—are not yet known to have been used in combat operations by the Sandinistas. However, they have been used with devastation effect by the Soviet Army against resistance forces in Afghanistan.

Normally, the Soviet bloc training cadres remain in rear areas and do not enter the combat zone on the long Honduran frontier. U.S. forces now are conducting a large training exercise with Honduran troops on the other side of the frontier as part of the Big Pine series of maneuvers.

The presence of Soviet military personnel in the combat zone raises the possiblity that the Soviet advisers could be injured or captured, a contingency that would raise the stakes for the superpowers in Central America.

In his report to Congress, President Reagen said there were about 200 Soviet and other bloc advisers serving with the Sandinista military establishment along with up to 3,500 Cuban military advisers and 4,000 Cuban civilian advisers. The Sandinista army has 62,000 men on active duty with another 57,000 serving as militia and reservists.

Of Nicaragua's immediate neighbors. Honduras has an 18,000-man army and Costa Rica has no army at all Soviet bloc military deliveries to Nicaragua have risen to $115 million in 1983 and $250 million in 1984. The Sandinistas' Soviet weaponry includes 110 Soviet T-55 tanks, 30 PT-76 light amphibious tanks, multiple rocket launchers, heavy artillery, Mi-24 Hind assault helicopters, radar and air defense equipment.

Mr. Reagan has demanded that the Sandinistas accept by June 1 the 21-point San Jose peace initiative of the resistance forces, which would require a return to democracy, expulsion of all foreign forces from the region and adherence to the original tenets of the Sandinista revolution against the former Somoza regime in Managua.

In return, Mr. Reagan has pledged that the $14 million he seeks in covert aid for the resistance forces would be used only for non-lethal and humanitarian purposes.

Yesterday, the president spent a large part of his day meeting Republican and Democratic senators and representatives to seek their votes when both houses take up the $14 million aid resolution April 23.

Press spokesman Larry Speakes characterized the legislators appearing at the White House yesterday as among the "undecideds." He refused to give the names of those who visited the president.

"We hope there will be a settlement by June 1, and there would be no providing arms for the growing democratic forces," said Mr. Speakes.

The resistance forces are now estimated to be about 15,000 strong. U.S. officials said no American funds were being used to finance the war against the Sandinistas.

Mr. Speakes said no decision has been made as to whether President Reagan will make a public appeal on national television before Congress votes on the $14 million resolution.

He said the decision of House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, D-Mass., and the Democratic leadership to conduct the House vote on the same day as the Senate was a "legislative tactic to defeat the president."

"We've always known we've got some distance to go in the House. It's going to be tough," Mr. Speakes said. Minority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill., has said the administration is 70 votes short of victory on the resolution in the House.

Another informed administration official said: "This vote is not about $14 million. It is a vote about whether Congress is for President Reagan or Comandante Ortega."

The administration does not plan any compromise on the language of the resolution. Rep. Michel said he might seek some language to include President Reagan's peace offer to Managua but the White House prefers to wait until the battle lines are more firmly drawn.

Mr. Speakes also said Pope John Paul II's message to President Reagan was an endorsement of the president's efforts to obtain a peaceful resolution of the fighting in Central America—not of the $14 million in covert aid to the anti-Sandinista forces. Mr. Reagan said yesterday the Pope "has been most supportive of all of our activities in Central America."

When reporters asked Mr. Reagan if the pope also supported U.S. aid to the Nicaraguan resistance, the president said, "I'm not going to get into that."

CONTRAS—WHO ARE THEY?

(By Jim Guirard, Jr.)

On Tuesday both the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives will vote on whether to restore—after a year's suspension—aid to the resistance forces, or contras, in Nicaragua. Many congressional Democrats seem ready to vote "nay." Along with a handful of Republicans, they seem intent on abandoning these anti-Communist forces to the not-so-tender mercies of the Cuban-backed regime of the Sandinistas.

Leading the opposition to the contras are House Speaker "Tip" O'Neill and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd. They and their cohorts call the contras "murderers, thugs, thieves, and Somocistas"—former supporters of the dictator Somoza. In this assessment, they are supported by most rank-and-file "liberals," who seem to feel that the only good contra is a dead contra, or at least a disarmed and subjugated one.

Their principal adversary is, of course, President Reagan—who fervently contends that the contras are mostly anti-Somoza "revolutionaries" who had their domocratic revolution of 1978-79 stolen from them, from within, by a Cuban and Soviet-backed Communist clique.

The U.S. opposition's principal ally (and eventual beneficiary, if they prevail) is Comandante Daniel Ortega, chief of the Sandinista junta against whom the new revolution is being waged. Mr. Ortega contends: "The leaders of the contras fought to sustain the Somoza dictatorship . . . and when they failed in that effort they fled the country and were organized, trained, and financed by the CIA."

As proof positive that Mr. Reagan is correct, that Mr. Ortega is lying, and that the O'Neill-Dodd forces are sadly dis-informed, the State Department has just released a document which settles the issue—period. It presents biographical sketches of the top 17 resistance leaders, all but one of whom was anti-Somoza during the earlier revolution! Here are summaries of about half those entries.

Eden Pastora—military hero of the anti-Somoza revolution and ex-deputy minister of defense;

Alfonso Robello—leader of the earlier revolution and member of the first Sandinista junta;

Adolfo Calero—head of the anti-Somoza Nicaraguan Conservative Party; twice jailed by Mr. Somoza;

Wycliffe Diago—Miskito Indian leader and Moravian pastor; jailed by the Somoza regime for allegedly being a Communist;

Indalecio Rodriguez—anti-Somoza president of the University of Central America and early Sandinista supporter;

Zacarias Hernandez—independent labor union leader, many times arrested by the Somoza regime;

Roberto Ferrey—founder of the anti-Somoza student group CDF, later legal counsel to the Sandinista ministry of justice; and Enrique Bermudez—professional soldier and military diplomat who spent much of his career abroad.

Among these and other prominent resistance leaders, Mr. Bermudez was the only highranking member, a colonel, of Somoza's National Guard. But the fact that he spent much of his career outside Nicaragua and the fact that he is now accepted by so many anti-Somoza democrats is convincing evidence that he was never a true Somocista. As military commander of the contras, he counts a dwindling number of former National Guardsmen among his forces—now less than 2 percent of the total, and falling.

An eminently fair assessment of the main contra organization—the Nicaraguan Democratic Force—was given in Feb. 28 article by The Washington Post's principal writer on Central America, Edward Cody: "The group, known as FDN by its Spanish-language initials, has expanded from a band of ex-National Guard officers into a mainly peasant army, backed by a political organization headed by Calero and other civilian opponents of the late dictator Anastasio Somoza." (Emphasis added.)

More recently, in its March 17 lead editorial, The Post referred broadly to the Contras as " . . . democratic people who fought the Somoza dictatorship, whose leaders served the Sandinistas in the early period and who turned against (them) only when they found the Democratic promise of the revolution being denied."

Actually, this shift in perception by The Post is even more directly influenced by still another list of Nicaraguan democrats. Although not Contras per se, these people support the new revolution and charge that the present tyranny is even worse than Mr. Somoza's. Many of them were so prominent in the earlier revolution that they became high officials in the Sandinistas government—before its Castroite clique seized control from within. For example, Arturo Cruz—ex-member of the junta and ex-Sandinista ambassador to the United States.

Jose Esteban Gonzales—anti-Somoza head of the Nicaraguan Permanent Commission on Human Rights;

Edgard Macias—anti-Somoza militant and head of the Popular Socialist Christian Party; ex-Sandinista vice minister of labor;

Violetta Chamorro—ex-member of the original Sandinista junta;

Pedro Joachim Chamorro Jr.—anti-Somoza publisher (like his father before him) of La Prensa;

Humberto Belli—former Marxist intellectual and anti-Somoza editor of La Prensa; author of a recent book of Sandinista subversion of the church;

Jose Francisco Cardenal—ex-vice president of the Sandinistas' Council of State;

Carlos Coronel—ex-Sandinista minister of fisheries;

Francisco Fiallos—ex-Sandinista ambassador to Switzerland; and Archbishop Obando y Bravo—anti-Somoza leader of the Nicaraguan Catholic Church and former Sandinista supporter.

American "liberals" and "progressives" have long yearned to be on the "right side" of a popular revolution in Latin America—one in which the United States is not obliged, in the name of anticommunism, to prop up the repressive regime under attack.

Now, these long-suffering Nicaraguan democrats and thousands of their countrymen are waging just such a revolution and are, quite literally, begging for our help. Not much help. Only $14 million, which is only a minuscule fraction of the flood of military assistance the Sandinistas are receiving from Messrs. Castro, Gorbachev, Qaddafi, et al.

The question is whether the present mindset and partisan bias of so many House and Senate Democrats against such good people is as impregnable as it appears. If so, there will be no restoration of aid to the resistance.

In its place, there will be great rejoicing among the Cubans, Soviets, Bulgarians, Czechs, East Germans, Libyans, Vietnamese, Iranians, North Koreans, and assorted other "liberators" of the Nicaraguan people—forces which will have taken one more solid step toward liberating us, too, from our liberties.

CUBA MAINTAINS AID TO COMMUNIST REBELS IN SALVADOR

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from today's Washington Times national edition be printed in the RECORD. This article is entitled "Cuba Firm on Aid to Insurgents," and it was written by former Reagan NSC staff member Roger Fontaine. Its main point is that at this time, when American aid to Nicaraguan freedom fighters is in question, Castro is maintaining or even increasing aid to the Sandinistas and the Marxist-Leninist rebels in El Salvador.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUBA FIRM ON AID TO INSURGENTS

(By Roger Fontaine)

Fidel Castro's top intelligence operations officer recently made clear Cuba would not slacken its aid to the Salvadoran Marxist rebels and other insurgent forces in Latin America, according to U.S. intelligence sources.

Continued support of anti-Western insurgencies comes at a time when Cuba's growing economic problems forced it recently to make conciliatory statements to U.S., West European and Latin American officials, according to the same sources.

In a report made available to The Washington Times, Manuel Pinero, chief of subversive activities in the Western Hemisphere for the Castro regime is quoted as telling a U.S. official two months ago that Cuba will continue to support guerrillas and terrorists in El Salvador, Chile and Guatemala with arms, equipment and training.

U.S. intelligence analysts have concluded that Cuba will do nothing to undercut either the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua or the Marxist rebels in El Salvador despite some conciliatory gestures from Havana.

The analysts also believe that Mr. Castro's recent interest in negotiations is a tactic designed to preserve a Salvadoran insurgency now on the defensive and to buy time for the Sandinista rulers in Managua.

They also believe it gives the Cuban dictator a "veneer of statesmanship" which provides him the "self-assumed right" to judge which governments in Central America are legitimate.

Cuba's growing economic problems, however, have driven Mr. Castro to soften his regime's image in recent months, according to the same analysts.

Havana's economy, which last year showed signs of life after two years of austerity, was thrown in reverse again when Fidel Castro last December called for more exports, and fewer imports, and held out the prospect for another 15 years of economic hardship for the Cuban people.

A major reason for the Cuban dictator's switch was because of heavy pressure from the Soviet Union.

Analysts believe, however, that the new measures while reducing economic growth will not achieve Mr. Castro's ambitious new targets, especially greatly increased exports to Western countries.

Moreover, Cuban officials, according to U.S. analysts, have already abandoned one key goal, harvesting a record 10 million tons of sugar for this year.

Analysts blame last year's extended canecutting season, unseasonable rainfall, and a lack of herbicides for the shortfall.

Sugar, currently at record low world prices, is Cuba's mainstay export. Cuba has heavy sugar commitments to the Soviet bloc with remaining production slated for Western countries.

Mr. Castro's prescription of more austerity occurs when a Cuban government poll shows sharp discontent with the quality and availability of housing, transportation, restaurants and other services, the analysts said.

According to an intelligence report, Soviet officials attacked Cuban economic policy last summer as wasteful and unrealistic. In a litany of complaints, they said that 20 years of food rationing was an embarrassment to the socialist cause, and criticized Cuban hard-currency purchases of machinery from the West rather than from the Soviet bloc.

Soviet officials are reported to have been particularly incensed at Havana's continued waste of imported, and increasingly expensive, Russian oil. Cuba is almost entirely dependent on imported energy sources, 95 percent of which is petroleum supplied by the Soviets at below-market prices.

But Mr. Castro's hopes for higher and sustained growth were dashed when it became apparent that the prices for principal Cuban exports—sugar and nickel in particular—were not improving. Moreover, domestic bottlenecks continued to plague the efficient use of available resources.

U.S. intelligence estimates that real growth in Cuba was only 3 percent in 1984, in contrast to Havana's official figure of 7.4.

American intelligence also indicates the Soviet Union has in recent years backed its displeasure over Cuban economic performance with a leveling off of aid from $4.7 billion in 1982, to $3.8 billion in 1984.

As a consequence, the Cuban dictator ordered a large increase in exports to the West, especially in nontraditional products, mandated strong austerity measures at home and signaled a desire for better relations with the United States.

At the same time, analysts point out, Cuba's new economic problems have impelled Mr. Castro to adopt a new diplomatic strategy that is designed to lessen his isolation in Latin America.

Intelligence sources believe he can break out of that isolation since prospects are favorable for improved relations with Argentina, Brazil, Peru, and Uruguay.

Mr. Castro has also met recently with a stream of high-level Western visitors convincing each in turn of his willingness to negotiate all differences between Washington and Havana, according to the same sources.

Analysts believe the Cuban dictator has fed them, "unrealistic hopes of weaning him away from the USSR," while "perpetuating the myth that Cuban-U.S. frictions are solely the result of Washington's intransigent hostility," with some success.

He is also reported to have convinced in January three foreign ministers from the so-called Contadora group—Colombia, Panama, Mexico, Venezuela—That he had upbraided the Nicaraguan comandantes for being too intransigent in settling Central America's problems.

Mr. Castro is also said to have informed Guillermo Ungo, chief of the political arm of the Salvadoran rebels, to form an "alliance" with President Jose Napolean Duarte.

Analysts also believe Mr. Castro may try less orthodox diplomatic measures such as trying again to settle the 5-year old Iran-Iraq war in the hope that peace will bring construction contracts providing jobs for Cuban workers in both countries, and add to his international stature.

They also believe the Cuban leader will continue his diplomatic offensive by issuing more invitations for leaders to visit Havana, and doing more traveling abroad himself.

U.S. analysts warn, however, that they see no evidence that the Castro regime would make any concessions that would prevent the Sandinistas from assuming unchallengeable power in Nicaragua or would undercut the political and military strength of El Salvador's guerrillas.

U.S. analysts believe that while Mr. Castro pushes his diplomatic offensive, he will also be more "judicious" in launching new insurgencies beyond the ones already supported. Other forms of meddling, including the training of trade union officials, and backing favored politicans with cash, however, is not ruled out under any circumstances by analysts in Washington.

Analysts, however, are concerned that the Cuban dictator's tactic at apparent reconciliation with the U.S. will help him to improve rapidly relations with other Latin American countries—many of whom have had nonexistent or strained relations with Havana since the late 1970s.

According to the report, the Cubans will attempt to stampede Latin American leaders into full relations with Cuba by playing on their fear that U.S. reconciliation with the Cuban regime will leave them behind facing left-wing opinion at home.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI].

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am going to support the resolution. There is plenty of blame to go around for the mess we are in tonight in Managua, in Miami, and at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Activities of the type we must involve ourselves in when we have a Communist regime in this hemisphere—and there is no question about that in Nicaragua—is very difficult for a democracy. Surely, it is going to be even more difficult in the future.

I cannot believe that we fail to act, considering what we know today about what the leaders of Nicaragua are doing—that is, that marvelous group of nine revolutionaries who, 6 years ago, were going to give Nicaragua freedom of religion, freedom to have labor unions, a pluralistic society, some free enterprise. Nicaraguans have little of those and admit it. These are the same leaders that send the leader of their regime to Moscow every time they have an international Marxist event.

Yet, we sit around and wonder what they are up to. I know what they are up to. They know it, and brag about it. Still, some American leaders don't, or won't, realize these are hardcore Marxists.

It will be hard to get the Sandinista Nine to the negotiating table with their fellow Nicaraguans in the democratic opposition. There is no question about it.

I hope that today we vote for this resolution. The President specifies that the $14 million will be for nonlethal activities. We will have a few months' time to think this through. Further delay in supporting the democratic opposition and in pushing negotiations could be a death blow to millions of people in Central America who look to the United States for leadership and support.

In closing, I am reminded of Arturo Cruz, a good friend of mine, and an inspiring democratic leader of the Nicaraguan revolution. I met him and talked to him many times before he left his most recent exile in the United States to return and test the Sandinista Nine's commitment to free elections last year. Some of you heard me talk about him at our lunch today. Arturo Cruz was not only a revolutionary against Somoza going back to 1947, he helped set up the Sandinista junta that in 1979 was proposing a new kind of freedom for Nicaragua. He had been put in jail by the previous dictator at the peak of his life, and there he missed seeing his children when they were young. Yet, as an older man with a good job and children in college he was again willing to be part of a revolution. He was one of the 12 who opposed Somoza before he fell from power.

Arturo thought he was providing freedom and opportunity. He negotiated Nicaragua's foreign debt as head of the Central Bank. He served in the junta. He was Ambassador to the United States. By 1982, Cruz left his post as Ambassador because the junta betrayed everything they promised in 1979. After resuming his old job with the Inter-American Development Bank in Washington, he left to go back, to be a revolutionary for the third time, to establish what the Sandinistas started out to do.

Last fall, Arturo left my office with a handshake, saying, "Perhaps, I won't be back, but I feel confident that I am going to give my life to the cause I helped start more than 35 years ago." He is down there in Central America most of the time now. The Sandinistas won't let him in. If we withhold moral and humanitarian support, what a signal we will send to Cruz and to the other Nicaraguans who are leading this revolution and all surrounding countries.

Most Central Americans say, "Welcome, America." I have been there and talked to them. They are not afraid of America in the 1980's. They are afraid of the Sandinistas and the Cubans.

As many have said today, "We have to do some more thinking; this is a difficult problem." Surely, the Congress of the United States, in particular the Senate, should not be prepared at this juncture to say that we are going to abandon them all of the genuine Nicaraguan resistance and, on behalf of the greatest freedom-loving Nation of Earth, say, "Good luck."

I think we are going to vote for this resolution tonight, and I will be proud to be a part of it, as we develop a more comprehensive policy toward the unfriendly rulers of Managua. That is very difficult in a free society, but we have no choice if we are to keep faith with the hopes and expectations of our neighbors in these small Central American countries.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I find it hard to believe some of the things I have heard on the floor of the Senate today. I have heard our Nation being termed "a world-class outlaw." I have heard comments about our not abiding by international law.

I would raise the question of whether adherence to "international law" prohibits opposition to Marxism and Communist advances around the world. I think we can cite examples where international law has been invoked to protect Marxists and other tyrants who have terrorized civilized people and democracies around the world.

I believe that there is a danger that those who have always enjoyed freedom and individual liberty lose sight of how valuable those blessings are and how easily they can be lost. Those of us who have the fortune to live with such benefits have a special responsibility to those who don't. We cannot ignore the lessons of history anymore than we can ignore current events.

Policy is not just sitting around watching and observing. There has recently been published a very good book by Jean Ravel entitled "How Democracies Perish." Read it. You can see what happened to other countries around this globe that ignored events and took no action. What we have to do here is take action. That is what this resolution is about, and that is why an "aye" vote for this resolution is merited.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, after days of negotiation among various Senators and members of the administration, it seems we are back where we started with Senate Joint Resolution 106. And that is the simple question of whether we shall vote to remove the restriction on $14 million in assistance this fiscal year to the democratic resistance movement in Nicaragua. There is one change since the Appropriations Committee took up this measure last week. The President has now agreed in writing to restrict this assistance to humanitarian aid; that is, none of the funds will be spent for munitions or arms but only for clothing, food, medical assistance, and other nonlethal support.

There are those in the Senate who would like to impose a great many more restrictions on that assistance and there are proposals pending in the House for even more restrictions. But the question before us now is the one we voted last year to take up in the form of a joint resolution, and it is a resolution that is not subject to amendment or other changes or delays. We are talking about an up or down vote on releasing these funds which the President now says will be spent only for humanitarian assistance.

Mr. President, the Appropriations Committee conducted a necessarily brief hearing last week on this issue, and the committee subsequently voted 15 to 13 to approve the resolution.

I recognize, Mr. President, that there are some Senators who are concerned over the apparent broad wording of the resolution. They fear it might be construed as open-ended authority for all kinds of military mischief in Central America. This is simply not the case if we look at the legislative history of this resolution. Section 8066 of the 1985 Defense appropriations bill that established the procedure we are now undertaking clearly limits the effect of Senate Joint Resolution 106 to the $14 million appropriated last year. Additionally, we have the President's written pledge, as I have mentioned, that this assistance will be humanitarian in nature. I would like to change the wording of the resolution to make it fit the situation, but the text is mandated by the 1985 act and cannot be modified.

In summary, Mr. President, we are talking about a specific amount of money—not to exceed $14 million—for the very specific purpose of supplying nonlethal aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua.

Now, Mr. President, we are down to a very basic and vital decision, and that it whether to support the President's and our Government's current policy in Central America. I believe quite strongly that the Senate must not rebuke the President in his continuing policy to bring peace and democracy to our neighbors in Central America. And I must add, quite frankly, that I think our own President's policies make a lot more sense than those of Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega.

A negative vote in Congress, I feel certain, will simply tell the Sandinistas they can continue to ignore their own promises for democratic reform in Nicaragua and that they can continue to work with the Soviet, Cuban, and Communist bloc to build a threatening military force in Central America designed to spread Communist revolution and to coerce their peaceful neighbors.

There are those who tell us the United States should not be providing assistance to insurgents in another country. Let me remind you that this program began as covert assistance, and covert assistance is a legitimate foreign policy tool of not only this country but other major powers in the world. That this assistance is no longer covert is not the fault of the administration but of the Congress, which chose to make this a public issue through a prohibition in a public law. Every Senator knows there are other covert assistance programs and that it is essential that they remain covert if they are to be effective. One way to destroy any covert aid program is to go public with it. That is what is going on now.

Are the critics of our assistance to Nicaragua suggesting that we abandon all forms of covert assistance throughout the world? I hardly think they would make that choice because it would clearly undermine important foreign policy initiatives of our Government throughout the world.

If the Sandinistas want to end this turmoil within their own country they need only live up to their own promises for democratic reforms and agree to church-mediated talks with the democratic resistance designed, among other things, to institute internationally supervised and free elections.

The alternative, it seems to me, is to play the Sandinistas' game and wait for this Marxist regime to abandon its own obvious goal of a totalitarian state supported by Soviet and Cuban military power. Without the incentives of continuing pressure from the democratic resistance, this just won't happen.

I urge the Senate to support the President and remove the current restrictions on this relatively small amount of humanitarian support for the democratic movement in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I want to focus on the procedural issue before the Senate.

In the last part of the last session of Congress, we passed a continuing resolution, and section 8066(a) provided:

> During fiscal year 1985, no funds available to the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, or any other agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities may be obligated or expended for the purpose or which would have the effect of supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual.

Subsection (b) went on to say that the prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall cease to apply if, after February 28—then it outlined that the President should send a report to Congress.

As I said before, it specifically then said that the joint resolution approving assistance for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua is enacted. That meant, according to subsection (c) of that section, that this specific language states that Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, on March 14, 1984, the Senate received a request from the Appropriations Committee for these funds. On April 5, 1985, the Senate voted those funds. That came out of an urgent supplemental.

Later, the entire defense appropriations bill was included in the continuing resolution, which again put the Senate on record approving these funds. Then the funds were approved in the final version of the conference report, subject to the limitation language of which I just advised the Senate.

In other words, three times the Senate has voted these funds for military or paramilitary purposes. The issue before the Senate now, in view of the letter from the President, so far as this Senator is concerned, is not military or paramilitary money, although that is what the language purports to say.

In my judgment, the President of the United States has entered into a compact with Congress that if the money is approved, it will be used for a nonlethal purpose, as stated in the letter. I leave that to the Senator from Kansas to articulate. But I just want to make sure that everyone understands that this is money we have approved three times for military purposes, and the request of the President of the United States tonight is to have money for nonmilitary purposes.

I cannot see how any Member of the Senate can deny the President these funds now for nonmilitary purposes, when the Senate three times previously approved them for military purposes.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield to me for one question?

I appreciate his discourse on the military versus nonmilitary funding. My question is this: If Congress approves the obligation and the expenditure of these funds available in fiscal 1984 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, where does the President derive his power to say or exercise an option to say, "I am not going to use that for military purposes; I am going to use that for humanitarian purposes"? I do not think that power exists.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say to my friend from Arkansas that the limitation was put on use of the funds that were otherwise available for any purpose and Congress said, "You cannot use these funds for military or paramilitary operations."

But it said, "If you want to take off that limitation on the use of those discretionary funds, you must pass this resolution in the form stated in subsection (c)(1) of that law of section 8066.

In other words, the funds were there in covert means. That was a black area. That was an intelligence operation not specified.

The amendment said "those funds which you have cannot be used for the purpose of military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua," but it says "if you want to remove that limitation here is how you do it: you pass a resolution in this language."

Now, the President has come to us and said, notwithstanding all this, "because of the negotiations we have had, if you pass this resolution and unfence that money that is available for my discretionary use, I state to you that I will limit it as stated in this letter and I am prepared to accept that."

I hope that that answers the Senator's question.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, this Senate resolution is dangerous and susceptable to the same grievious misinterpretation as the Gulf of Tonkin resolution that lead America into the Vietnam war. I am strongly opposed to it.

As to the President's last second letter to Senator DOLE, if it is to have the weight and meaning suggested, then why aren't its apparent guarantees contained in the legal language of the resolution?

It is my hope that the House will reject this resolution, as the Senate should properly have done.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today's vote on aid to Nicaraguan Contras is far more important than just whether or not this Nation should spend $14 million. The real issues involved in this vote are many and diverse.

First, should the United States take action to defend its own security, a security that could well be threatened by the growth of another Communist state in Central America bent on exporting revolution? I say yes.

It is absolutely vital to the security interests of the United States that the forces that control Nicaragua be contained. Since the days of the Monroe Doctrine, Central America has been deemed vital to the interests of this country. Nothing has changed. In fact, in view of the spreading global tentacles of the Soviet Union, that region of the world has taken on new and even more critical significance.

Yet do we hear debate from the other side about this basic question—whether in fact Central America is vital, and should be defended? No. Instead, they have sought to define the debate in terms of peripheral issues which, although important in their own right, mask the basic decision this Nation must make; namely, will we or will we not support democracy in Central America?

There is strong evidence that the Government of Nicaragua seeks to dominate militarily their democratic neighbors. Since they took power 6 years ago, the Sandinistas have built an armed force far out of all proportion to their need for defense, forces I might add which have been paid for at the expense of the Nicaraguan people.

Let me just mention a few figures to illustrate the magnitude of the Sandinista military threat to its neighbors. The full-time army has over 30,000 troops and 27,000 reserves on active duty. They have an armored force of 140 tanks and 200 other armored vehicles—enough for 5 mechanized battalions—supported by the necessary support vehicles and bridging equipment.

These forces are backed up by long-range artillery and an air force with troop transport helicopters and assault helicopters. Their air defense forces now consist of a variety of short- and long-range antiaircraft guns and SA-7 surface-to-air missiles.

Finally, I would note the construction of the large, jet-capable airfield outside Managua, and the training of Nicaraguan pilots by the Cubans and Soviets. The trend suggests that the completion of that airfield will be accompanied by the introduction of sophisticated Mig aircraft.

In tanks and armor, Nicaragua now surpasses all other countries of Central America combined. Costa Rica has no army. Honduras has an 18,000 man military and its only armor is a small force of armored reconnaissance vehicles. Nicaragua has an offensive army, not a defensive force, bent on threatening democratic governments throughout the region.

I should remind my colleagues that Nicaragua is closer to Texas than Texas is to Washington. We cannot tolerate the development of another Cuba-style dictatorship exporting revolution throughout the hemisphere, particularly at a time when democracy is flowering in Central America.

This country supports freedom fighters in Afghanistan, as well as anti-Communist forces in such diverse places as Angola and Cambodia. Can we fail to do any less for the Contras, particularly when their fight goes on in our own backyard?

And what signal do we give to the many democratic nations of the region if we leave the Contras to twist slowly in the wind? What kind of commitment will they perceive us making to the concept of democracy? Could we really question them if we find them seeking closer ties to the Sandinistas for their own protection, given our willingness to "cut and run" in the face of aggression?

The second issue that must be considered is, are the Contras worthy of our support? Again, I say yes.

The Contras are not saints. They operate in a violent part of the world, and in a viciously fought war on both sides. Supporting the cause of the Contras does not mean condoning their every action.

But the Contras are the only hope for democratic change in Nicaragua. I don't know if the Contras can win, nor does anyone else in this body. What I do know is that without the pressures of the Contras and the United States, the Sandinistas would consolidate their totalitarian regime and begin to export revolution throughout the region.

Some opponents of aid have argued that our support of the Contras increases the chance for U.S. military involvement. But by allowing the Contras to fail, we increase substantially the chances that Nicaragua will become a major Soviet-Cuban base of operations. If that base is established, it will be too late for limited action. Then, our only military alternative would be use American forces.

Mr. President, for two centuries this country has stood for freedom throughout the world. Today, the Contras fight for democracy in Nicaragua. They deserve our support not only because of their cause, but also because they fight for America's interests, too.

The Sandinista regime is part and parcel of the world alliance of terrorists and revolutionaries arrayed against the United States. I take Libya's Colonel Qadhafi at his word when he says, as he did to the New York Times of September 2, 1984, that—

> Libyan fighters, arms and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground.

I take the Sandinistas at their word when they say, in the 1969 FSLN declaration of goals, that they will—

> Struggle for a "true union of the Central American peoples within one country," beginning with the support for national liberation movements in neighboring states.

Their challenges to the United States will not go away if Contras fail. Instead, those challenges will increase. We must support the Contras today in their fight, because they are the best hope to preserve and strengthen democracy in the area.

I urge support of this package.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, after considerable debate and discussion the Senate must now vote on Senate Joint Resolution 106, a resolution that provides funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. I had hoped that the attempts to forge a compromise similar to the one propounded earlier today by the Senator from Louisiana would have been successful. I would have cast my vote for a resolution that specifically incorporated the provisions of such a compromise to include the limitation to humanitarian aid, the call for a ceasefire, followed by negotiations among the warring parties. Unfortunately those efforts failed and we are left to vote up or down on this resolution coupled with a letter of understanding from the President.

I have decided to vote no on this resolution because it is far too open-ended, providing as it does authority for funding which may be made available in fiscal 1985 for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. Some of my colleagues have stood on this floor today and argued that it is not the proper function of the Congress to usurp the President in his responsibility to execute American foreign policy. I agree. However, I also insist that neither is it a proper function for the Congress to abrogate its responsibilities as a partner in these efforts. No foreign policy will be successful without congressional involvement and support. It is our proper function, indeed it is our duty to examine foreign policy and to express our will through legislation such as this on the crucial issues of the day. Had an earlier Congress in an earlier time been more critical of a resolution, not entirely unlike this one before us, perhaps an entire generation of Americans might have been spared the agony and turmoil of involvement in Vietnam.

The issue before us is not support for or against communism in our hemisphere. Not a single Member of this body would ever condone communism in any form in this or any other hemisphere. Nor is the issue before us one involving a willingness to employ U.S. power abroad or not. While there may be some in the Congress who would withhold a U.S. response to a threat to our security until it had actually reached our own borders, most of us, including this Senator, favor strong and effective U.S. response to threats to our national security. That is why I supported the President when he ordered the invasion of Grenada and would do so again if the circumstances warranted it.

The issue before us today, however, is whether we favor the forcible overthrow of the Sandinista government. That is what we are voting for in this resolution. Proponents of this assistance to the Contras contend that such aid will continue to pressure the Sandinistas into a more moderate course. However, if the Sandinistas are the Marxist-Leninists that the President tells us they are—and I do not doubt his assessment—then such pressure is of dubious merit. No Marxist-Leninist regime, by definition, can yield to such pressure. I do not believe that the policies we wish to influence will be changed by an armed attempt to overthrow the regime.

The United States does have a deep and abiding interest in Central America. That is not in dispute here. If you believe that continued funding of the Contras will achieve the objectives of our Government than vote for Senate Joint Resolution 106. I have come to the conclusion that it will not.

I believe that we have legitimate interests with respect to Nicaragua but the overthrow of the present government is not among them. We have a right, and an overriding interest to prohibit any establishment of a Soviet or Cuban base on Nicaraguan soil. We have an interest in seeing the removal of all Soviet and Cuban military advisers from Nicaragua. We have an interest in securing a regional agreement in Central America that pledges all of the countries in the region—including Nicaragua—to refrain from intereference in the internal affairs of their neighbors and to abjure any support for armed insurrection in the region. Those are our primary interests in the region. In addition, we have an interest to nudge, cajole, and to pressure the Nicaraguans to adopt a democratic pluralism that they have hitherto never known. I do not believe, however, that this will do it.

In the final analysis therefore, I must oppose this resolution because of its broad scope. I am prepared to support a resolution that specifically incorporates the details of the compromise discussed on this floor earlier today, and I earnestly hope such an opportunity may yet be made available to the Senate later this week.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I rise to vote against the measure before us, a resolution to approve the expenditure of funds for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. I previously indicated to the administration that I could not support the President's original proposal—the proposal which is before us now. This should not be interpreted to mean that I do not support a change in the totalitarian Nicaraguan Government or that I do not support the cause of those trying to make the Government of Nicaragua more democratic or pluralistic. Rather my vote reflects my concern for the process which we are being asked to accept.

The administration is asking us to reinstate funding for military and paramilitary operations against the Government of Nicaragua. But the administration has not prepared or presented to this body its long-term objectives or policies for Central America. Last year, in his letter seeking funding, the President told us the funds would be used to interdict arms flowing from Nicaragua to other countries in the region. These arms were being used to threaten other, more pluralistic governments and destabilize the region. However, in the end, these funds were used for much more extensive purposes. This year, we received a request from the administration for funds to be used to bring the Nicaraguan Government to the negotiating table. These are very different objectives. And yet the administration has provided no rationale, no explanation for this change.

We are left with a dilemma. The administration asserts that the Marxist/Leninist regime in Nicaragua, as the Nicaraguan Government characterizes itself, is unacceptable. But the administration is asking us to support funds to bring this totalitarian regime to the negotiating table and change their behavior. Yet I cannot accept the notion that we can somehow influence the Sandinistas to come to the negotiating table. In fact, I know of no case where a totalitiarian government has voluntarily relinquished a share of its power.

So where does this leave us? The administration tells us we won't use direct force to bring about a change in the Government of Nicaragua but rather, we will try to use influence. Yet the administration acknowledges that influence alone is not likely to cause the Sandinistas to allow a more pluralistic government. This leaves us with one of two conclusions: Either the present Government in Nicaragua is unacceptable, is a threat to U.S. interests, and must be destroyed by whatever means or we must accept that it is a totalitarian regime that we must somehow deal with.

We have repeatedly expressed our support for the Contadora process. The Contadora process is worth our support and we should reaffirm it. The countries involved in the Contadora process have clear and important interest in a peaceful resolution to the conflict. And they clearly have a significant interest in their own security; they have no desire to have a threatening neighbor exporting revolution and discontent.

The President has once again sent us a letter explaining the purposes for which he intends to use the funds. The President purposes to use the funding for humanitarian assistance and not military purposes. But the resolution which we are being asked to approve, and which will be law if approved, says something quite different. The President and the Congress should not be put in the position of voting on language that says one thing but is to be interpreted to mean something else. This is not the way this body should legislate. We need, the President needs, to find a way to encompass the President's proposal, as outlined in his letter to the majority leader, in a resolution that the Senate can vote on. That way the law will be absolutely clear and there will be no doubt of the intentions of the Senate with respect to the use of these funds.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 106 to release $14 million in military aid to the Contras.

All Americans share a desire for peace, democracy, and political pluralism in Nicaragua and throughout Central America. We want Nicaragua to cease its reliance on the Soviet Union, to stop exporting its revolution, and to move toward full recognition of the political and civil rights of its citizens.

The question before the Senate tonight is whether continued military aid to the Nicaraguan Contras is the best way to achieve that goal. I do not believe that it is.

The situation in Central America is difficult and potentially dangerous. The United States must protect its legitimate security interests in the region. The Soviets would like to exploit regional unrest to increase their influence in the area. But the central question remains: Do we continue to provide covert aid to the Contras, forcing the Sandinistas to rely more heavily on the Soviets? Or do we use economic and diplomatic means available to us to pressure the Sandinistas to sit down at the negotiating table and hammer out an agreement that protects our interests?

Mr. President, I say it is time to set aside military aid, at least for now, and embrace a diplomatic alternative. We must use all of our diplomatic, economic, and political leverage to seek a negotiated settlement to this conflict.

To continue aid to the Contras would provide no incentives for them to negotiate their differences with the Nicaraguan Government. In turn, it would push the Sandinistas closer to the Soviet Union, and provide no incentives to that Government to undertake domestic political reforms.

To achieve our goals, we must fashion a policy that provides incentives to both sides to talk. It should be fair and tough—to both sides. The Sandinistas need to know that our patience is not endless. If we stop the aid, if we provide a so-called cooling off period, we expect results.

Today's vote provides a real opportunity for the Congress to redirect our Central American policies. Nicaragua's President Ortega has stated that if the United States ends its support for the Contras and reopens negotiations with the Sandinistas, Nicaragua will immediately call for a cease fire and move toward freedom of the press, political pluralism, and fundamental freedoms. Such a step would be strongly supported by our Contadora allies and friends in Europe.

To the Nicaraguas, we should say: Make good on your promise. Stop exporting your revolution and establish human and civil rights within your country. To the Contras we should say: Lay down your arms and negotiate.

The decisions Congress makes this week will affect our national security, and could determine whether our sons are sent to fight on foreign shores again. The establishment of friendly and democratic governments in Central America is important for our national interest. We must seize this opportunity to redirect our policies to achieve this goal.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to oppose this resolution and work toward an alternative, constructive regional policy that can achieve our goals.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, at this moment, few issues which face the Senate are more important than that of assistance to the Nicaraguan resistance. Since the Vietnam conflict, the citizens of the United States have scrutinized the minute details of our foreign economic and military aid. We, as a nation, have not taken our foreign military commitments lightly. I have attempted to analyze not only the need, but the justification for U.S. involvement. The situation in Central America demands this type of discussion, however, it is necessary for us to separate this policy to whatever extent possible from politics. The United States has an obligation to take a stand; and in the case of Nicaragua the United States has an opportunity to take a stand for freedom.

The United States joined with the Organization of American States [OAS] in discontinuing recognition of the Somoza Government and in recognizing the Sandinistas. Our recognition was predicated upon the Sandinista government's respect for pluralism and human rights, a nonalined foreign policy, and a mixed economy. The leaders of the Sandinista National Liberation Front [FSLN] have failed to honor these promises to the OAS and the people of Nicaragua. The Sandinistas have betrayed the principles of the anti-Somoza revolution.

The United States originally sought friendly relations with the Nicaraguan Government. Between 1979 and 1981, the United States authorized $118 million in economic assistance. In addition, the United States sought to squelch the aggressive acts by the Sandinistas through quiet diplomacy. However, it became clear that the Sandinistas would not alter their destructive course.

The resistance in Nicaragua was born out of Sandinista belligerence. This opposition developed as a result of Sandinista repression and growing ties with Communist countries. The opponents of the Sandinistas are indigenous Nicaraguans who are fighting for democratic objectives. The leadership of the resistance is comprised of disillusioned Sandinistas, former National Guardsmen and Campesinos—small farmers. The recent State Department report on the Nicaraguan Democratic Resistance [FDN] noted that, "the overwhelming number of the reported 15,000 FDN troops are peasants, workers, shopkeepers, businessmen, and others with no previous ties to Somoza." The goals of the Nicaraguan resistance are consistent with those of the United States.

The Sandinistas have continued to bolster their military and their armed forces have grown far beyond the size needed to meet any conceived threat. The military intentions of the Sandinistas were voiced long before the United States started aiding the Contra forces. In 1980, the Defense Minister of Nicaragua announced the goal of having 200,000 Nicaraguans in the armed services. This goal, aimed at building an army over 14 times the size of Somoza's National Guard, was announced while aid was still pouring in from the United States.

Nicaragua is less democratic in 1985 and more closely tied to the Soviet bloc. The number of Cuban military and security advisers in Nicaragua increased from approximately 200 in 1979, to 10,000 Cuban military and security personnel in 1985. In addition, about 2,000 Soviet and other bloc advisers are currently in Nicaragua, according to Under Secretary of State, Langhorn Motley.

The Sandinista military has continued to grow not only in quantity, but the quality of weapons, as well. This includes sophisticated tanks, military trucks, multiple rocket launchers, heavy artillery, helicopters, patrol boats, radar, and air defense equipment. The cumulative amount of Soviet bloc military deliveries from 1979 to the present is estimated at over $500 million.

The Sandinistas are supporting armed insurrection in countries throughout the region. El Salvador has been the principle target of Nicaragua's destabilization efforts. While materiel support for the Salvadoran guerrillas has decreased, there is still evidence of materiel and communications support throughout 1984. Nicaragua still provides military training for the insurgents.

Though to a lesser degree, Nicaragua provides support for revolutions elsewhere in the region. The Sandinistas are involved in subversive efforts aimed against Honduras. Managua also provides support for the guerrillas in Guatemala and Costa Rica.

Almost 6 years after the Sandinistas came to power in Nicaragua, the promise made to the OAS still ring empty. The Sandinistas have tried to manipulate public opinion with events, such as the November elections. These elections were not fair to opposition parties and should not legitimize the Sandinista government. We should not reward the Sandinistas for paying lip service to democratic ideals.

The decision by the United States in 1979 to recognize the Sandinistas sent a clear signal to the world; the United States was committed to democratic reform in Central America. As a nation, we have a deep and historic interest in the promotion and preservation of democracy. We cannot deny this commitment to fairness, simply because we are faced with difficult decisions. The moral obligation of the United States toward our neighbors in Nicaragua must remain the same today as it was in 1979.

The policy of the United States regarding Central America, as a whole and Nicaragua in particular, must be two-fold. First, we must encourage economic and political growth. This is the only way to alleviate the cause of the crises; poverty, injustice, and closed political systems. Second, we must encourage efforts to advance democratic internal stability through diplomatic channels and, when necessary, through security assistance.

The centerpiece of diplomacy has been the Contadora process and I strongly support these on-going efforts. Several drafts of a final regional settlement have been prepared and progress is being made. In hopes of facilitating the Contadora process, bilateral negotiations occurred between the United States and Nicaragua. Diplomatic channels, such as these should remain necessary components of a regional peace settlement.

The vote today, whether it be for economic or security assistance, is an indication of our commitment to freedom fighters the world over. The massive buildup of the Sandinistas is not likely to be countered by $14 million. However, failure to aid the freedom fighters would send a message to our friends and allies. The United States was committed to the Nicaraguan people in 1979, but we refuse to protect them from this greater tyranny in 1985.

Robert Hutchins wrote in his book, "Democracy and Human Nature"

> The death of democracy is not likely to be assassination from ambush. It will be a slow extinction from apathy, indifference, and undernourishment.

The Sandinistas have failed to keep their promises to the OAS and the Nicaraguan people. Today, I stand resolved to defend freedom and democracy in Central America.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the immediate issue before us today is whether to continue to provide funds to the anti-government guerrillas in Central America to assist them in military and paramilitary operations against the Government of Nicaragua.

More importantly, we are being asked to determine the future tenor of American foreign policy in this region—the basis of our strategy, our objectives, our values. This issue cannot be reduced to a simplistic question of whether or not one supports one or another transitory administration policy. This vote is a referendum on fundamental questions concerning our beliefs and hopes about how we project American power and American leadership.

Mr. President, I believe there is consensus in Congress and in the American public that there are certain fundamental principles required for a constructive approach to Central America—principles—against which we can measure this request.

First, I think we all agree that the United States must pursue a course which decreases the influence of the Soviet Union and its surrogates in a region where, by reasons of geography and mutual interest, we as Americans must exert forceful leadership and provide for the common security.

We must act to influence any trends toward totalitarian rule in Nicaragua and elsewhere to advance peaceful, democratic opposition, and promote basic human rights for all of the people of Central America, including Nicaragua.

Second, our policy must discourage trends which would lead deliberately or by default to a perceived need for the introduction of American combat troops in the region.

Third, we must have a policy that supports the strong, credible regional efforts at peace being undertaken in the region, as pursued by the Contadora nations. Such efforts represent the best hope for restoring lasting regional stability and providing a foundation upon which durable democracy can be used.

Finally, we must conduct our foreign policy in a manner which enhances U.S. influence and prestige, not only to our neighbors, but as seen through the eyes of our friends and allies throughout the world.

Ultimately, our decision must be based of a careful assessment of the contribution funding the Contras makes to U.S. security. For regardless of our concern about the behavior of Sandinistas, a policy which does not forward our aims in the region, nor promote democratic principles, is a policy which must not be pursued—covertly or overtly—by the United States.

Mr. President, in my view funding to the Contras not only fails to accomplish any of these objectives, but is in fact, inimical to our fundamental goals.

Instead of reducing Cuban and Soviet influence, American support for covert undeclared war, veiled threats of potential direct U.S. military intervention, the declaration of intent to overthrow a constituent government, and the continuing highly visible military maneuvers in neighboring areas such as Honduras, have pushed Nicaragua ever forward toward increasing military reliance on the Soviet bloc—thereby undoubtedly strengthening the hand or our adversaries in the region.

By the administration's own figures, instead of decreasing Nicaragua's reliance on its Communist benefactors, there has been a twentyfold increase in Soviet bloc military deliveries to the Sandinistas since we began covert activities over 4 years ago.

Mr. President, our current policy has been equally ineffectual in influencing human rights progress in Nicaragua.

We all share concerns about the subversion of the democratic ideals which guided the Sandinista revolution in its early phase. No one in this Chamber is an apologist for the Sandinistas—we all share the goal of moving that society toward economic and political pluralism and away from political repression and persecution.

But we must recognize that instead of having moved the Sandinistas closer to those goals, the continuing war with the Contras has helped fuel a heightened climate of state of siege in Nicaragua, accompanied by such policies as harrassment by the Sandinistas of political opposition, censorship of the press, and repression of the church.

Instead of advancing the fundamental goals in the region, our policies seem to be having precisely the opposite effect.

Perhaps most disturbing, Mr. President, is the fact that current U.S. policy seem to be bringing the United States inexorably closer to direct military involvement in Central America.

Mr. President, the public version of the administration's recent report on funding for the Contra guerrillas states explicitly that the money Congress is being asked to release today is no more than a down payment on a far vaster military support effort, laying the foundation for much expanded military activities in the region which no one can dispute is of highly dubious potential effectiveness.

There is a haunting sense of deja vu for some of us on this 10th anniversary of the end of the Vietnam debacle as we read of the administration's assessment of the need for massive increases in military personnel to fight the Sandinistas—accompanied by thousands of American forces along the Nicaraguan-Honduran border.

This American people will not support a strategy which promises another failed military adventure—in any region of the world. They do not want this Congress to fund the guerrilla forces simply to provide the President a mandate for continued military escalation. And they will not support a policy which increases the likelihood of American military intervention. Is there anyone in this Chamber who will state now, for the public record, their explicit support for the commitment of young Americans to fight a war in Central America?

Once more, the administration has put myopic militaristic options ahead of carefully crafted diplomatic and political strategy. They themselves cannot even justify how a policy leading to military intervention could ever be prosecuted successfully and effectively in the absence of clear objectives, supported by the American public.

Mr. President, the Contadora nation's efforts at negotiations represent our best hope for lasting peace in the region. But administration policy—including funding the Contras—has not made a tangible contribution to this process.

For 2 years the administration's requests for increased military assistance to the Contras has gone hand-in-hand with apparent indifference to the Contadora process. Where dynamic and creative support have been required, the U.S. position toward negotiations has been anemic and rigid, frozen in place, and President Reagan has apparently been unwilling to recognize that real progress has been made in an effort to address U.S. concerns and forge a truly equitable pact.

The administration's policy has tried to be all stick and no carrot. But even the stick—which is not credible—has failed.

Finally, Mr. President, aiding the Contras has literally damaged the long-term effectiveness of American foreign policy by subverting American influence and prestige worldwide. The administration's determination to fund the Contras has forced the United States to stoop to the level of international outlaw and reject the jurisdiction of the World Court. Our current policies have undercut one of this nation's greatest assets—its ability to serve as an example to the rest of the world. We have made hollow our protests of Soviet contempt for any recognized code of international conduct—for we cannot preach what we do not practice. This administration's decision to suspend compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court for 2 years reflects a foreign policy driven by expedience and devoid of principle.

President Reagan has tried to recapture a moral posture for the United States by portraying the Contras as the equivalent of our revolutionary heroes and our aid for the rebels as a patriotic act. But while the notion that the Contras are the "moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers" as the President has said, is alluring—it is unfortunately absolutely wrong.

The image this description conjures of our greatest Americans fighting for their freedom vanishes when we are forced to consider who the rebels actually are and how they have pursued their goals. The military leadership of the Contras are far from modern day George Washingtons. Many of them are Somositas—remnants of the repressive national guard which terrorized the Nicaraguan people for decades.

Mr. President, there is no question that a policy of funding the Contras fails to meet any of the criteria for a constructive approach to the problems the United States faces in Central America. As a result, I believe Congress will today reject that funding.

President Reagan has made an effort to stave off this defeat by offering a last-minute peace initiative. He has attempted to repeat the strategy he used successfully on the battle over the MX—using negotiations as bargaining chip to justify military spending which cannot stand on its own merits.

But this time, it is clear that the President's peace plan is nothing of the sort. The administration's approach to Nicaragua is based on a plan for war, not for peace. One need only look to the administration's own report to Congress on Contra funding to see the low priority placed on negotiation, and the absolute priority placed on an increasing reliance on military might to solve the problems in Central America.

The President has tried to portray his new plan as a real peace initiative by encouraging the support of leaders who have been intimately involved in the Contadora peace process. But the initial enthusiasm of leaders like Colombian President Belisario Betancur has turned to skepticism as they have learned that a cease fire may serve as a pretext for continued and expanded U.S. military assistance to the Contras.

If the President has in mind a true peace initiative, one that commands congressional and public approval action—let him bring it forward as such. Mr. President, today we have before us not a real plan, but a bill which provides the funds for military and paramilitary activities by the Contras against the Sandinistas—nothing more. It must pass or fail on its own merits.

Mr. President, I firmly believe there are numerous policy alternatives for the United States which can make a positive contribution to U.S. security, and help to resolve the conflicts in Central America, but continued funding for the Contras is not among them.

In the aftermath of this vote I intend to introduce a package of legislation which I believe will make such a contribution by reiterating the grave U.S. concern about the behavior of Sandinistas, supporting the efforts of the Contadora nations, limiting the pressures for American military involvement in the region, and providing real incentives for the Nicaraguan Government to pursue those negotiations in a vigorous manner.

I believe that the leaders in Congress working with members of the administration have the capacity to forge a better path—to work together to address our common concerns, and define a set of policies which both promote our objectives and garner the support of the American people. Our first task today in forging such a consensus on Central America is to reject soundly a policy which does not contribute to progress in region.

I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing $14 million in military and paramilitary aid to the Contras.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the United States is facing a real and difficult problem in Central America. The Sandinistas are not, as some claim, simply a small, benign, or democratic group that poses no potential threat to American security interests. Indeed, the Sandinistas are a challenge to the United States to the degree they support violent revolution in this hemisphere and cooperate with the Soviets, Cubans, East Bloc countries, Libyans, etc. And it is clear that they have, in fact, given such support and been assisted by these nations. The Sandinistas' domestic policies are a concern as well, for the elections that were held last year were marred by censorship and harrassment of the opposition. Indeed, without U.S. and world attention it is doubtful that there would have been elections at all.

Our goals should be consistent with our interests and the interests of the people of Central America. We need assurance that Nicaragua will refrain from supporting revolutionary movements in other countries. We need a regional peace agreement that rests on a stable balance of power in the region and that includes the withdrawal of Soviet and other foreign military advisors. In addition, we would like to see movement toward true democracy in Nicaragua.

Administration policy up until now has been difficult to justify. It has been based in the broadest sense on the application of pressure to achieve the goals I just outlined, although I must say it has not always been clear what the administration's goals have been. Some of this pressure has been careless and embarrassing, such as the harbor mining, and some, such as support of the rebels, has seemed to backfire and to lack moral or policy justification. Moreover, the administration has attempted to undermine the Sandinistas while at the same time trading with them and maintaining diplomatic relations.

Finally, administration policy has raised the issue of scale in our foreign policy. If it is a goal of the administration to topple the recognized government of Nicaragua, it is, to say the least, incumbent upon the administration to make a compelling case for such drastic action, action which violates international norms of sovereignty and peaceful resolution of differences. In short, our policy has been ineffective, inconsistent, and based on a questionable estimate of the scale of the problem.

Nonetheless, we are left with a regime that poses challenges for the United States. I welcome the President's letter which, while coming at a late hour, sets out what should indeed be our goals and the major thrust of our policy. Still, it accompanies a resolution which would continue aid which has not worked. I intend to vote against this resolution, but stand prepared to reassess my position in accordance with the future actions of the Sandinistas.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the soul of our Nation is in torment.

The debate in this Chamber today has revealed the deep divisions in our country. The American people—a people who cherish the history of their struggle for freedom from foreign domination—have begun to question policies of their government which suggest an imperial impulse, a need to dominate others.

The American people—a people who revere the ideals and principles which guided the founders of our country and which shaped our institutions of government—have seen those ideals and principles debased by officials who regard them, not as the immutable embodiment of our Nation's character and soul, but as instruments of power to be wielded in ways which serve the narrow objectives of the moment, rather than the enduring purposes of our country's founders.

You have a dollar bill in your pocket. Take it out. Look at it. Carefully. Read the words and purpose of our revolutionaries. Novus ordo seclorum—a new secular order.

The Founding Fathers, our Founding Fathers, saw in their revolution an opportunity to change the nature of government, an opportunity to establish the rule of law in a new secular order. No longer would the common man suffer the indignities and abuse by government ruling at the whim or caprice of a despot. Law and not man would rule.

Today, we are told that, if we vote against further funding of military action by the Contras—if we vote for the restitution of order and principle and law and decency in the conduct of our Nation's foreign policy, we shall be held guilty of a shameful surrender to the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

Put aside for the moment the suggestion that this great country of ours, with a population of 233,000,000 and untold power, would surrender to an impoverished, backward country of less than 3 million which is led by a government of scoundrels. Put aside the rhetoric and consider what we are doing. It is proposed that we fund the overthrow of a foreign government.

I say, shame. Shame on those who would manipulate the American people and their faith in their institutions and Government to prosecute a secret war. I say shame on those who engage in the shameful abandonment of our ideals and our principles—who abandon law and its order for government by deception and the deceitful conduct of foreign relations through covert war.

Not long ago, the President of the United States compared the Contras of Nicaragua to our Founding Fathers. He needs to be reminded that the men of our revolution, the founders of our government, spoke, in the words of Thomas Jefferson, of a "decent respect to the opinions of Mankind."

I do not believe that, when he wrote those words—found in the Declaration of Independence—Thomas Jefferson believed that the Government he and others were founding would 1 day scorn the opinions of mankind.

That is the shameful surrender, Mr. President. For the United States to withdraw from the World Court and its compulsory jurisdiction, because our Government feared the opinions of mankind, has done more harm to the rule of law and order than any possible action by the Sandinistas.

Mr. President, I must vote against this resolution. Let there be no question. We are not voting for interdiction of arms. That was the original justification for the program. But that has not been successful. We are not voting to pressure the Sandinista government to participate in the Contadora process—that government is participating, perhaps not in a manner which is fully acceptable to the United States, but it is engaged in a process of negotiations which is acceptable to the Contadora countries.

No, we are not voting for those things, Mr. President. We are voting in support of an effort to—as the President said in his February 21 press conference—"remove the present structure" of the Government of Nicaragua. We are voting for the forcible overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I am not going to speak at length, but let us note that supporters of this resolution have today defended and attempted to justify a request for funding which may ultimately be used to provide military assistance to paramilitary groups dedicated to the overthrow of a government with which the United States maintains full diplomatic relations and which is dependent on the United States for much of its trade.

We must ask why the administration has chosen the path of bringing pressure on the Sandinistas through the force of arms rather than economic sanctions or direct discussions as advocated by a number of my colleagues.

Let me conclude, Mr. President, by saying that I have been saddened, though not particularly surprised, to seek the work of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America used selectively to support this operation. I was one of several senior counselors to the Commission, and I clearly recall one of the most basic, yet most profound, observations the Commission made:

> To be perceived by others as a nation that does what is right because it is right is one of this country's principal assets.

Mr. President, this is not right. We should not condone or favor the continuation of this not-so-secret secret war. Let us put an end to it.

LETTER FROM MR. PETER JONES IN SUPPORT OF NICARAGUAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today because I have received a letter from one of my constituents which I want to share with my colleagues.

The letter is from Mr. Peter Jones of Falls Church, VA—a Vietnam veteran who is concerned that his young son may have to fight a future war in Central America because of the failure of the Congress to provide support now to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters.

At this time, Mr. President, I would like to read Mr. Jones' letter—the view of one concerned father which expresses so well the realities this Nation faces in Central America.

APRIL 18, 1985.

Senator JOHN WARNER,
U.S. Congress,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER, I'm concerned about my son, Alex—my only boy. I'd hate to have him go to war in Central America. I've worried about it a good deal. It seems the matter is in your hands now. So I thought I'd tell you about my fears.

You see, I served in Vietnam twenty years ago. In fact, Alex was born during my tour there. Didn't see him till he was three months old. He was really a great kid—a happy clown, with bright red hair. Seems impossible that so much time has passed, but he's nineteen now—a sophomore in college. With a little seasoning, I think he has a lot of potential.

War, however, is an experience which I would just as soon he passed up, if there's a reasonable alternative. Not that Vietnam might not have been worth the attempt—particularly in views of the suffering the North Vietnamese victory there has caused millions of South Vietnamese, Cambodians and Laotians.

But, losing in Southeast Asia has not been such a problem for us Americans. It's too far away. The repercussions—other than having to make room for all those refugees—will probably not be evident for some time, if ever.

Central America, on the other hand, is in our ballpark. San Salvador is closer to Washington than Los Angeles. If governments allied to the Soviets and the Cubans take over this region, I don't see how the United States could avoid becoming involved.

Could we afford to have Soviet MIGs and missiles based so close to Texas? The warning time is nil. The Soviets tried putting missiles in Cuba. They stockpiled weapons in Grenada. They're filling up Nicaragua with tanks and gunships. I think they'll test us again. Will they back down this time? Who's to say the other countries of the area would not go the way of Cambodia and Laos—that regimes friendly to the Soviets wouldn't spread north and south from Nicaragua?

That's why I'm worried about Alex. I believe that if the Sandinistas and the Russians are not stopped now by the Central Americans themselves, he stands a good chance to be called up to do it in a few years. Our volunteer army doesn't have enough men to meet our commitments in Europe and Asia and fight in Central America at the same time.

I've heard a lot of objections to helping the people in El Salvador and Nicaragua who are resisting the capture of their countries by friends of the Soviet Union. It seems to me, though, that it would be much easier to support a Central American effort to prevent the takeover now than to have to send our sons to kick the Russians out later.

Over the past few years, the United States Congress has balked at giving aid to El Salvador. Now many Congressmen are worried about providing $14 million to the resistance fighters in Nicaragua. Why the quibbling? It's cheap insurance. We spend more on bird seed in this country every month.

The Soviets are giving both overt and covert aid to their friends. Why should we handicap ourselves? Why is it wrong to help our neighbors fight our common enemies? The Congress should get back to basics, and stop debating how many angels fit on the head of a pin. What job is more important for an American legislator than providing for his country's security?

If the majority of your colleagues decides against helping the forces resisting the Sandinistas, we would all have to accept their judgement, of course. If they don't think I have any reason to be worried about Alex)—well, ok. But, with all due respect, I'd like to say this to them: if the sledding gets tough in Central America a few years from now, I will expect them to call up their sons and grandsons—not mine.

Respectfully yours,

PETER E. JONES.

AID TO NICARAGUAN FREEDOM-FIGHTERS

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today we must cast a crucial vote on whether or not to aid Nicaraguan freedom-fighters.

American policy in Central America has four policy objectives:

First, support for democracy and human rights;

Second, support for economic development and growth;

Third, provision of security against Marxist-Leninist revolutionaries;

Fourth, negotiations aimed at restoring peace in the region.

President Reagan strongly supports these four policy objectives, and I believe that all Senators, both Democratic and Republican, can support these objectives. They are fully deserving of bipartisan support in the long tradition of a bipartisan American foreign policy.

Congress has overwhelmingly passed a resolution on three separate occasions which should guide our policy deliberations on Central America. This resolution, called the "Symms Amendment," passed the Senate on August 11, 1982 by a vote of 67 to 28, and again in June 1984, by a vote of 77 to 3. The Symms amendment passed the House of Representatives overwhelmingly three times as well. The language is identical to the congressional resolution passed overwhelmingly in September 1962 just before the Cuban missile crisis.

The main policy thrusts of the Symms amendment, are:

First, reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine against Soviet intrusion into the Western Hemisphere;

Second, reaffirmation of collective self-defense of the American States against Soviet sponsored aggression;

Third, United States determination to prevent, by whatever means may be necessary, including the use of arms, the Marxist-Leninist regime in Cuba from extending, by force or threat of force, its aggressive or subversive activities to any part of this hemisphere.

These points have been approved overwhelmingly by Congress on three previous occasions, and I urge my colleagues to keep them in mind as we consider today the Contra aid resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following items to be printed in the RECORD:

First, the Symms amendment to the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985.

Second, the Symms amendment to Public Law 97-257, Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1982.

Third, letter to the President, April 15, 1985, on aid to the Contras, signed by Senators SYMMS, MCCLURE, HELMS, EAST, and WALLOP.

Fourth, an urgent message from Europeans to Congress: Support the Nicaraguan resistance, sponsored by Resistance International, 102 Avenue des Champs Elysees, 75008, Paris, France, Vladimir Bukousky, president.

Fifth, White House Digest, June 20, 1984, "What the Sandinistas Say About Sandinismo."

Sixth, letter from Dr. Claudio Benedi, Junta Patritica Cubana, dated March 6, 1985, to Dr. Cesar Sepulveda, chairman, Inter-American Commission for Human Rights, Organization of American States, on institutional violations of human rights in Marxist Cuba.

Seventh, article by Ariel Remos in "Diario Ras Americas," Friday, March 15, 1985, (translated), entitled "Institutional Violation of Human Rights in Cuba by the Tyranny of Castro Denounced by Claudio Benedi."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPENDIX F: TEXT OF SYMMS AMENDMENT AS INCORPORATED INTO P.L. 98-525 ON OCTOBER 19, 1984

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1985

REAFFIRMATION OF UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD CUBA

SEC. 1543. (a) It is the policy of the Government of the United States to continue in its relations with the Government of Cuba the policy set forth in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution expressing the determination of the United States with respect to the situation in Cuba", approved by the President on October 3, 1962 (Public Law 87-733; 76 Stat. 697).

(b) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to change or otherwise affect the standards and procedures provided in the National Security Act of 1947, the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, or the War Powers Resolution. This section does not constitute the statutory authorization for introduction of United States Armed Forces contemplated by the War Powers Resolution.

APPENDIX C: TEXT OF SYMMS AMENDMENT AS INCORPORATED INTO P.L. 97-257 ON SEPTEMBER 10, 1982

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1982

(An Act making supplemental appropriations for fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes, namely:

CHAPTER VI.—BILATERAL ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

Funds appropriated to the President

ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUND

Caribbean Basin Initiative

For an additional amount for necessary expenses to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, $350,000,000, to remain available until March 31, 1983, notwithstanding section 10 of Public Law 91-672: Provided, That the funds in this paragraph shall be available only to the extent and in the manner provided as follows: not less than $20,000,000 for the Eastern Caribbean; not less than $41,000,000 for the Dominican Republic; not less than $10,000,000 for Haiti; not less than $50,000,000 for Jamaica; not less than $10,000,000 foir Belize; not less than $70,000,000 for Costa Rica; not more than $10,000,000 for Guatemala: not less than $35,000,000 for Honduras; not more than $75,000,000 for El Salvador; not less than $2,000,000 for the American Institute for Free Labor Development; not less than $2,000,000 for the Inter-American Foundation; and $25,000,000 unallocated: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated for this purpose may be obligated until September 15, 1982, or until the enactment of authorizing legislation, whichever comes first. Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading and made available only for a country referred to in the first proviso may be available for such country while such country is not taking adequate steps to cooperate with the United States, as certified monthly by the President to the Congress, to prevent narcotic drugs and other controlled substances (as listed in the schedules in section 202 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 812)) which are produced, processed, or transported in such country from entering the United States unlawfully. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, none of the funds appropriated in this paragraph may be obligated or expended in any manner inconsistent with the policy hereby reaffirmed, which is stated in S.J. Res. 230 (76 Stat. 697), to wit:

"Whereas President James Monroe, announcing the Monroe Doctrine in 1823, declared that the United States would consider any attempt on the part of European powers 'To extend their system to any portion of this Hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety'; and

"Whereas in the Rio Treaty of 1947 the parties agreed that 'an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered as an attack against all the American States, and, consequently, each one of the said contracting parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations'; and

"Whereas the Foreign Ministers of the Organization of American States at Punta del Este in January 1962 declared: 'The present Government of Cuba has identified itself with the principles of Marxist-Leninist ideology, has established a political, economic, and social system based on that doctrine, and accepts military assistance from extracontinental Communist powers, including even the threat of military intervention in America on the part of the Soviet Union'; and

"Whereas the international Communist movement has increasingly extended into Cuba, its political, economic, and military sphere of influence: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States is determined—

"(a) to prevent by whatever means may be necessary, including the use of arms, the Marxist-Leninist regime in Cuba from extending by force or the threat of force its aggressive or subversive activities to any part of this hemisphere;

"(b) to prevent in Cuba the creation or use of an externally supported military capability endangering the security of the United States; and

"(c) to work with the Organization of American States and with freedom-loving Cubans to support the aspirations of the Cuban people for self-determination.".

Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to change or otherwise affect the standards and procedures provided in the National Security Act of 1947, as amended; the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended; and the War Powers Resolution of 1973. This Act does not constitute the statutory authorization for introduction of United States Armed Forces contemplated by the War Powers Resolution.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 15, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT, we have just received our own independent, first-hand, fact finding report about the critical situation faced by Commander Eden Pastora's ARDE anti-Communist guerrilla force in Southern Nicaragua. Eden Pastora is a strongly anti-Communist Freedom Fighter, but his forces desperately need American help. He seems to have a genuine popular following. He is a charismatic leader who already has attracted a wide following in Nicaragua. Like the FDN in the North, Pastora's ARDE in the South deserves our support.

Eden Pastora has received some U.S. government support in the past, and we believe that support should be immediately resumed and increased. No matter what difficulties may have occurred in the past, we believe that in this critical period, U.S. policy toward Eden Pastora should at least be guided by the time-tested maxim: "The enemy of my enemy is my friend."

The recent March, 1985 U.S. State and Defense Department booklet entitled The Soviet-Cuban Connection in Central America and the Caribbean describes Eden Pastora as a "legendary" military leader. It quotes Pastora's own critique of Sandinista leaders as direct evidence of the Sandinista commitment to Marxism-Leninism: "[Sandinista leaders] isolated themselves from what Sandinismo is supposed to be about. Violations of human rights, Cuban troops in Nicaragua, the alignment toward the Soviet bloc, the moral deviations, it's a long list."

This indicates that the State and Defense Departments believe that Eden Pastora deserves our support as much as the FDN. A recent Administration policy paper states that "the United States has a clear, undeniable moral imperative not to abandon those brave men and women [the Contras] in their fight to establish democracy and respect for human rights in Nicaragua."

Yet Eden Pastora's guerrilla forces have just had two outposts in the jungle overrun by Marxist-Leninist Sandinistas, and just like our own Revolutionary War Minutemen citizen-soldiers, his volunteer troops need all kinds of supplies urgently. Eden Pastora has liberated over 10,000 square kilometers of Sandinista territory. Thousands of helpless refugees from Marxist-Leninist oppression have trekked for weeks through the jungles seeking freedom and his protection.

Mr. President, we realize that in this climactic phase of American foreign policy toward Central America, we are now facing up to the extreme danger of a Central America dominated by Marxist-Leninist Sandinistas backed by Soviet and Cuban support. Because of this Soviet-Cuban support, we are forced to respond in kind. Eden Pastora's forces have already been attacked by Soviet MI-24 Hind helicopters capable of spreading "Yellow Rain" Chemical and Biological Warfare munitions.

While there are certain legal and legislative constraints on U.S. aid to the anti-Sandinista Freedom Fighters, we believe that much can be done to help Pastora's and the FDN's Contra forces. Accordingly, we request the following immediate policy actions:

1. U.S. policy concurrence in military support of FDN and Pastora's ARDE Contras by democratic Central American Armies;

2. Release of American constraints on the use of FDN and ARDE-owned Contra aircraft in the region;

3. Release to FDN and ARDE Contras of old non-U.S. rifles previously used by regional armies and also rifles captured from Marxist rebels;

4. Urgent provisions to Pastora of 100,000 rounds of 7.62 mm. (B-39) ball ammunition, 100,000 rounds of 7.62 mm. (B-49) ball ammunition, 100,000 rounds of 50 caliber ammunition, 1,000 M-79 grenades, and 100,000 rounds of 5.56 mm. M-16 ammunition from regional army-owned surplus stocks;

5. U.S. policy concurrence in regional military provision of surplus foodstuffs and medicines to FDN and ARDE Contras;

6. U.S. policy concurrence in provision of defensive measures against Soviet "Yellow Rain" to the Contras by regional armies;

7. U.S. provision to Eden Pastora of one third of the pending $14 million in U.S. humanitarian aid to the anti-Communist Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters, in order to help Pastora take care of the thousands of refugees fleeing from Communism into the area controlled by Pastora.

Mr. President, we believe that each of these policy actions is fully consistent with existing law and legislative guidance. Moreover, these policy actions are fully in accordance with the "Symms Amendment", which passed Congress overwhelmingly three times in 1962, 1982, and 1984. The "Symms Amendment" requires U.S. resistance to Soviet military bases in Cuba, and U.S. resistance to Soviet-Cuban subversion and aggression anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, by force of arms if necessary.

We believe that U.S. failure to comply with the Symms Amendment and adopt the above policy actions would be interpreted by our friends in the region as a sign that the U.S. will not be able to reverse Soviet-Cuban subversion and aggression in Central America.

With warmest personal regards,

Sincerely,

STEVE SYMMS.
JESSE HELMS.

AN URGENT MESSAGE FROM EUROPEANS TO CONGRESS: SUPPORT THE NICARAGUAN RESISTANCE

Democracy itself is at stake in Nicaragua. After four years of dictatorship, the FSLN, the totalitarian ruling party, has not succeeded in breaking the resistance of the Nicaraguan people.

After the relative liberalization represented by the elections, the government's imposition of a "state of emergency" shows that its political agenda remains a totalitarian one.

We believe that United States aid to all sections of the opposition is indispensable in enabling the Nicaraguans to overthrow the present dictatorship and freely choose their own political future—which they thought they had already done when they overthrew Somoza.

Therefore we appeal to the Congress of the United States, in the spirit of democratic solidarity, to resume aid to the Nicaraguan resistance.

Such aid is necessary strategically. The Sandinista junta has from the beginning declared its aim to be the incorporation of all Central America into a single Marxist-Lenist entity. Should it succeed, the United States would be forced to withdraw from one of its major overseas treaty commitments. This is precisely the objective of Soviet policy: to force the withdrawal of the United States from those areas of the world which are of vital interest to it and the entire Free World. That is why the problem of Central America is also a European problem. Central America is Europe's "Fifth Frontier."

American aid to the resistance is also necessary morally. The West must be forthright in its support for those who struggle to obtain the rights declared inalienable for all men by your own Declaration of Independence.

We say to the United States Congress: For you to deny aid to people who are seeking to exercise the rights of free men is to deny the meaning of your own country. Even worse than the strategic situation in which the United States would find itself if it were to fail in Nicaragua would be the betrayal of the principles upon which the country was founded.

The freedom of the Nicaraguans is also your freedom. As it is ours. Freedom is indivisible. If you fail in Nicaragua, we must ask, where will you fail next? If freedom and democracy are not worth defending in your own hemisphere, where are they worth defending? The Free World awaits your answer. Its enemies are waiting too.

WHAT THE SANDINISTAS SAY ABOUT SANDINISMO

By your words are you justified, and by your words are you condemned.—Matthew 12:37

One of the most persistent myths about Sandinismo is that it is merely leftist, not Marxist, and certainly not Marxist-Leninist. This myth has been challenged by studies comparing Sandinista actions to those of other Marxist-Leninist states. Numerous statements of the Sandinistas themselves also contradict the non-Marxist image.

Consider this statement by Humberto Ortega, Sandinista Defense Minister:

". . . Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our vanguard to understand the historical process and to create the revolution; . . . without Sandinismo we cannot be Marxist-Leninist and Sandinismo without Marxism-Leninism cannot be revolutionary, and because of that they are indissolubly united and because of that our moral strength is Sandinismo and our doctrine is that of Marxism-Leninism." [1]

Hugo Torres, of the general staff of the Sandinista Popular Army, also extolled the role of Marxism-Leninism when he said:

"The principles of Marxism-Leninism, wisely applied to the reality of our society, guided the revolutionary actions of the FSLN, the Nicaraguan people's vanguard, to victory over the dictatorship. . . . Lenin said that the people needed a vanguard in order to succeed and the Nicaraguan people succeeded because they had the FSLN." [2]

Victor Tirado, one of the nine Marxist-Leninist "commandantes" in the core of the Sandinista leadership, analyzed both the role of Marxism and the planned dominance of the FSLN:

"Our brilliant leader Carlos Fonseca [a leader killed in battle] taught us to examine the country's economic structure to learn about the people's idiosyncrasies, psychology and feelings in order to arrive at solutions based on real facts, which is applying Marxism to our reality. This is why the FSLM outlined a government plan and prepared itself for predominant role in government. . . . As we all know, the efforts centered on the armed struggle, as this was the conclusion of the Marxist analysis." [3]

An unusual medium for a number of startling admissions by Sandinista leaders was an extensive interview with Tomas Borge, Nicaraguan Interior Minister and two of his colleagues in the September 1983 issue of Playboy. Borge told the interviewer:

"I told [my mother] that I would not be blackmailed by her gentleness and her naivete and that I was a Communist." [4]

This dedication to Marxism-Leninism has been a dominant strain in the Sandinista movement since its inception. Even before taking power, and at the same time that the FSLN was trying to hide its true nature and appear as part of a broadbased coalition, the element of Marxism-Leninism was clear. A 1978 Sandinista communique reads:

"This Sandinista nuclear vanguard must occupy and direct the governing organs. . . . This nucleus must base itself in the scientific doctrine of the proletariat, in Marxism-Leninism, as a sure guide for the transformation of society."

Miguel D'Escoto, who is Foreign Minister, and Ernesto Cardenal, Minister of Culture, are both Catholic priests. Nevertheless, they both speak positively of Marxism, a philosophy which is inherently atheistic.

In a May 1980 interview, D'Escoto described Marxism as "being one of the greatest blessings on the Church." [5] Cardenal said in an interview in Spain in 1978: "It may be said that the Gospel made me a Marxist. Marxism is the world's only solution."

Tomas Borge made the following comment on the relationship between Sandinismo and "true" belief:

"I sincerely believe that we Sandinistas respect Christ much more faithfully than do the sham Christians, the Pharisees and traitors to the cause and true thought of Jesus Christ." [6]

The attempt to combine Marxism with Christianity, a frequent theme of Sandinista literature, culminated in the publication of "The Sandinista Creed," a parody of the Apostles' Creed, by a Nicaraguan professor in El Nuevo Diario, which is strongly pro-government, though it is not an official newspaper. (Full text attached) It reads in part:

"I believe in the Sandinista People's Revolution and in the wise political military guidance of our national leaders of the FSLN, who are working for the well-being of the Nicaraguan masses, who were once exploited and excluded and are fighting for peace in Central America."

"I believe in the doctrine and struggles of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Che, great teachers and leaders of the working class which is the productive, moving force behind the class struggle that will permanently destroy the exploitative, anti-Christian, and dehumanizing class."

"I believe in the construction of a socialist, Marxist and Leninist society. I believe in the immortality and veneration of our heroes and martyrs. I believe in the power of the people in the hands of workers and campesinos and in their existence until the end of time. Amen."[7]

Besides seeking to deny the Marxist-Leninist nature of the regime, apologists for Sandinismo also contend that the regime is not supporting terrorism in other countries and that its massive arms buildup since 1979 is due to U.S. pressure and hostility.

This theory fails to take into account the fact that the buildup began even while the U.S. was sending almost $120 million in aid from mid-1979 to early 1981. It also ignores the fact that U.S. medical teams treated over 5,000 people in the Atlantic Coast region in the spring of 1980.

More importantly, arguing that Sandinismo is not expansionist also means arguing with the statements of the Sandinistas themselves. In spite of concrete proof the Sandinistas have supported terrorists in neighboring countries, the Sandinista leadership has frequently denied exporting revolution but the following statements document the fervor of Sandinista support for insurgents elsewhere.

Tomas Borge, on the second anniversary of the Sandinista victory, denied exporting revolution but expressed this sentiment in a Managua speech:

"This Revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist from the moment Sandino fought in La Segovia."

Borge was lauding the participation of foreigners in the Sandinista victory and later in the same speech expressed his moral support for "revolutionary" movements in other parts of Central America.

Michael Kramer, writing in the September 12, 1983 edition of New York magazine, quoted two prominent Sandinistas:

Bayardo Arce: "We will never give up supporting our brothers in El Salvador."

Humberto Ortega: "Of course we are not ashamed to be helping El Salvador. We would like to help all revolutions."

As early as May 1980, again well before the U.S. government ended its assistance to the Sandinista regime, no less an authority than Foreign Minister D'Escoto said:

"You (the U.S.) may look at us as five countries, six now with Panama, but we regard ourselves as six different states of a single nation, in the process of reunification."[8]

Even more outspoken than D'Escoto on this issue is Tomas Borge, who was quoted as saying: "Costa Rica is the dessert,"[9] meaning, no doubt, that the fall of this unarmed democracy would be the culmination of D'Escoto's "reunification."

Borge told a North Korean audience in June 1980 that "the Nicaraguan revolutionaries will not be content until the imperialists have been overthrown in all parts of the world. . . . We stand with the forces of peace and progress, which are the Socialist countries."

More recently, the Playboy interviewer asked Borge to respond to the remark that since the revolution triumphed in Nicaragua, "it will be exported to El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico?" Borge's response: "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that is absolutely true!"[10]

The Sandinistas promise to hold an election this year, but obviously intend to limit the choices available to the Nicaraguan people.

As early as 1981 Humberto Ortega commented on what sort of elections the Sandinistas had in mind: "Keep firmly in your minds that these elections are to consolidate revolutionary power, not to place it at stake."[11] He reiterated this view in 1983 when he said that the Nicaraguan people had already had their election in the revolution and had chosen the FSLN.

Sergio Ramirez, a member of the three man coordinating junta, had this to say about elections:

"The Nicaraguan people will have to choose and vote for one candidate. That candidate is the revolution. This is very important." He later added: "It is a question of which parties have the most responsible programs and who can really guarantee the people they will go ahead with the revolutionary process."[12]

In spite of the best efforts of the Marxist-Leninist leadership to convince North Americans that theirs is a moderate non-Communist and non-threatening revolution, their own words show clearly what their beliefs are and what their aims are. Skeptics do not have to listen to the critics of Sandinismo; they have only to listen to its leaders.

THE SANDINISTA CREED

I believe in Sandino, the Father of our people's anti-imperialist revolution, who was born of a proletarian campesino mother and descended from the line of Dirianguen, Estrada, Castro, and Zeledon. He was a proletarian with a strong conscience, self-educated, a patriot and a nationalist, anti-imperialist, and internationalist warrior, like David who slew Goliath.

I believe in Sandino, the organizer of the E.D.S.N., made up of workers and campesinos, who fought in the mountains, valleys, towns and cities against the traitors who sold their country and against the gringo imperial legions in the defense of our native soil, our sovereignty, and our national honor.

He was betrayed and assassinated by a Judas, the stepson of Uncle Sam, who repaid him with years of military dictatorship and dollars. His murderers and the desecrators of his corpse were granted amnesty through the complicity of a Liberal-Conservative Congress.

I believe in Carlos Fonseca, his beloved Son, who inherited his ideals and guerrilla warfare tactics, who was the Founder of the FSLN, our political military vanguard, who is placed upon the altar of his country beside his revolutionary Father, whose ideology he enriched with new revolutionary philosophies, proletarian in nature, which he transmitted to his closest comrades-in-arms.

I believe in the Sandinista People's Revolution and in the wise political-military guidance of our national leaders of the FSLN, who are working for the well-being of the Nicaraguan masses, who were once exploited and excluded and are fighting for peace in Central America.

I believe in the doctrines and struggles of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Che, great teachers and leaders of the working class which is the productive and moving force behind the class struggle that will permanently destroy the exploitative, anti-Christian, and dehumanizing class.

I believe in the construction of a socialist, Marxist and Leninist society. I believe in the immortality and veneration of our heroes and martyrs. I believe in the power of the people in the hands of the workers and campesinos and in their existence until the end of time. Amen.

JUNTA PATRIOTICA CUBANA, AREA METROPOLITANA DE WASHINGTON,
Washington, DC, March 6, 1985.

Dr. CÉSAR SEPÚLVEDA,
Chairman, Inter-American Commission for Human Rights, Organization of American States, Washington, DC.

DISTINGUISHED CHAIRMAN: In the capacity that I have had accredited since the inception of the Inter-American Commission for Human Rights as Coordinator for the Washington Metropolitan Area of almost all the associations and organizations of present and former Cuban political prisoners, male and female, and also as the representative of the Cuban Patriotic Board, it is my privilege to address you and, through your intercession, the honorable members of that Commission, in order to express our gratitude and present the following denouncement before that Honorable Commission:

That, after the Seventh Report was written, over two years ago, executions by firing squads in Cuba, far from diminishing, have increased, as well as cruel, sub-human and degrading treatment against political prisoners, especially the more than 200 "plantados", mainly locked up in the fatidical Boniato Prison; physical and psychological tortures are still being applied; arbitrary sentences to extend already served prison terms continue to be imposed; political prisoners who have long served their terms of imprisonment are not released; there are no procedural warranties at all for political prisoners; no impartial judges nor an independent Judiciary and, above all of this and basically in this denouncement, there continue in full force the Institutional Violations Against Human Rights contained in the Socialist Constitution, the Penal Code and other legal regulations in force in Cuba.

The Seventh Report, released by that Commission on December 21, 1983, could not be submitted to the Thirteenth Session of the General Assembly of the OAS, that had convened a month earlier, nor to the Fourteenth Session of the General Assembly, that convened in November, 1984. Although the Seventh Report, upon its approval by that Honorable Commission, does not require any approval by any other OAS organism, since it has its own value as denouncement, the knowledge of same by the General Assembly would have been advisable, notwithstanding the fact that all governments represented at same had received said Report and were award of its contents. With all due respect, we would like to state our dissatisfaction with that procedure.

We also state that, in the Annual Report from the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to the Fourteenth Session of the General Assembly, the status of human rights in Cuba was not included either, as we had requested.

Despite all of the above circumstances, there was talk within the organisms of the Fourteenth Session of the General Assembly about the Seventh Report, as well as the continuous violations against human rights in Cuba, especially the Institutional Violation of Human Rights among attending delegates and in those sessions we were privileged to attend.

Because of all of the above reasons, we are requesting that the continuous violations against human rights in Cuba and, especially, the Institutional Violation of Human Rights, be included in the corresponding chapter of the Fifteenth Period of Sessions of the General Assembly of the OAS, that will be held this year in Colombia.

We were honored to denounce before the Plenum of this Honorable Commission the violation status against human rights regarding over 2,500 Cubans, male and female, who sought asylum at the Embassy of Peru, La Habana, who had left that Embassy under the protection of safeguards issued by the present government of Cuba, implying the guaranty and promise that they would be allowed to leave Cuba. On the contrary, some of them have been executed by firing squads; others have disappeared, and the remainder of them are being persecuted and not allowed to emigrate. We said then and we repeat now with a very special petition, that this Honorable Commission should request from the Peruvian Government a list of those Cubans who sought asylum at its Embassy in La Habana, in order to check that list against names of those who have been able to emigrate, and then requesting information about the fate of the more than 2,500 who have not been able to leave Cuba. We firmly believe, Mr. Chairman and Honorable members of the Commission, that among the powers of that Honorable Commission there is one to protect the human rights of victims of the communist atrocities in Cuba.

Through information received from Cuba, prepared by a Cuban Commission on Human Rights that operates within the island, we have been able to learn that 37 persons were executed by firing squads between October 1983 and May 1984. Said Commission has also reported that 131 persons were sentenced to be executed by firing squads during the same period of time.

We have also learned from other sources that many more persons have been executed at the Managua Military Camp, province of La Habana, for refusing to fight in Africa and Latin-America. Relatives of those executed are told that "they are accomplishing internationalist missions", and are not allowed to view and bury their relatives. We are hereby requesting that the Commission will investigate these executions.

Disappearances continue as well. Besides those who sought asylum at the Embassy of Peru and disappeared after leaving it, many other Cubans, male and female, continue to disappear. We denounced timely before this Honorable Commission the disappearance of Silvino Rodriguez Barrientos and Guillermo Casasus Toledo, who were taken out of their cells at the fatidical Boniato Prison and have not been heard of since. We expect a pertinent resolution from this Commission on those cases of disappearance.

We had the privilege of appearing before this Honorable Commission together with Dr. Andres Vargas Gomez, a grandson of Generalisimo Maximo Gomez, Chief of the Cuban Liberation Army in the last century. Dr. Vargas Gomez remained imprisoned since 1961 and was only able to leave Cuba last year. At that time, Dr. Vargas Gomez stated before this Honorable Commission his denunication of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment that Cuban political prisoners have been enduring and continue to endure. He also denounced, among other things, the Institutional Violation of Human Rights, that we have denounced repeatedly. We hope that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has taken an appropriate action about those denouncements, in accordance with its powers.

In 1984, five younsters whose ages ranged from 16 to 19, were sentenced to five years of imprisonment for having painted, on the walls of their schools, slogans reading: "Viva Reagan" and "Vivan Los Estados Unidos".

A United States citizen who lives in Cuba stated his opinion about the Grenada events, and the secret political police (DGI) of the communist regime jailed him; when the U.S. Government tried to inquire about the situation of this person, the Cuban regime accused him of interfering with the Cuban internal affairs.

Private rights of persons, family rights, private homes and mail privacy are all violated by the communist regime in Cuba.

Freedom of education is infringed upon, because without freedom there cannot be education. Don Jose De La Luz Y Caballero, a Cuban educator and thinker, said: "Anyone can impart instruction; but only that person who is a living Gospel is able to educate." In Cuba, instead of the Gospel of Love, a doctrine of hate is taught.

Freedoms of expression and press, as well as all other freedoms, are being violated in Cuba, and these violations are consecrated in the articles of its Socialist Constitution.

No freedom of religion exists. Faith cannot have any priority over the socialist state, nor over the materialist and atheist Marxist Leninist doctrines. This is specified in the above mentioned Social Constitution of Cuba.

Freedom of travel does not exist in Cuba either, nor to emigrate Freedom to return to one's own country does not exist. A million Cubans are in exile, and they cannot return to their own country. Those Cubans who have emigrated, have been deprived of their Cuban citizenship arbitrarily, in violation of their human rights.

Cuban workers have been deprived of all the labor rights they had before the communist takeover in Cuba, in 1959. They cannot organize free labor unions, nor strike, nor change jobs freely, nor are entitled to 8-hour working periods.

As we denounced timely before this Honorable Commission, five workers who intended to organize a labor union, following the pattern of Solidarity in Poland, were sentenced to die through execution by a firing squad. When the world public opinion mobilized and this Commission intervened, their sentences were changed to 30 years of imprisonment. That was another violation against freedom of assembly, as defined by the American Declaration of Human Rights and Duties, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Also, 200 workers in the sugar cane industry were sentenced for having joined the above listed movement. The communist regime in Cuba continues to persecute those workers who intended to organize free labor unions.

There does not exist in Cuba, either, any private property as defined in those statements above referred to.

We further denounce before this Honorable Commission the case of Judge Nicasio Hernandez de Armas, who ruled that workers has the right to organize their own labor unions. This Judge has disappeared and his whereabouts are unknovn. We expect this Commission to have acted consequently and would like to learn about its resolution, as well as in the cases of attorneys who defended those workers charged with organizing their own labor union, which we timely denounced before this Commission. We do not know whether the pertinent resolutions have been issued in the cases of the Judge and the attorneys.

The case of violation of human rights against Dr. Orlando Bosch and his three companions by the Government of Venezuela, is an affront against justice and the enforcement of human rights in our hemisphere. We have a sufficient wealth of information about this case and have effected pertinent denouncements before this Honorable Commission.

Dr. Orlando Bosch and his companions have been arbitrarily imprisoned for over eight years now. They have been acquitted by the military courts, but their case has been successively transferred from the civilian jurisdiction to the military and viceversa, and now there is the intention to reopen the case and get it started all over again. This is an endless, arbitrary and illegal process.

The reply from the present Venezuelan Government to the Commission is not valid and is plagued by partiality and lack of consequence. The declaration that Dr. Orlando Bosch has submitted to the Commission, and that is in its possession, belies one by one those arguments stated by the Government of Venezuela. The denouncements that he makes about corruption, venality and injustice on the part of the current Judiciary Power in Venezuela have been published by the press all over the continent. The very Government of Venezuela has been forced to take action against corrupt judges, albeit not as far as it would be desirable, as in Dr. Bosch's case.

The internal judiciary process in Venezuela has been exhausted, as Dr. Bosch has fully demonstrated and it has been published in almost all the continental press. The timely intervention by this Commission has not been given due attention. We believe that time has come when the Commission ought to publicize any resolution it might have adopted or will be adopted in this case, since all efforts have been exhausted in the internal aspect and it is imperative to effect the protection of the Commission against the violation of human rights endured by Dr. Bosch and his three companions who are imprisoned. We believe that time has run out already.

The Commission has acted very aptly in many cases, on its own volition. This is why we are requesting of the Commission that, if some denouncements in the case of Cuba and the Cubans have not yet directly arrived to its jurisdiction, it will exercise, as in the past, its preoccupation and protective authority, in order to pick up and investigate the multiple cases of violations against human rights that are being committed in Cuba at the present time, incorporating same to its annual report.

We have requested and been offered that an Eighth Report on Human Rights Violations in Cuba will be prepared. There are already many denouncements in the possession of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. Many more shall continue to arrive, more than enough to merit the preparation of that Eighth Report, that should include, with its proper name, the Institutional Violation of Human Rights in Cuba. These violations are in full fledge in Cuba, and they will continue, because they are inherent to the Marxist-Leninist system of government. Because of that and many more reasons, it has been declared incompatible with the Inter-American System. This status of incompatibility is much more evident today than it has ever been.

There does not exist in Cuba, Mr. Chairman and Honorable Members of the Commission, the Rule of Law, as the honorable members of the International Association of Jurists denounced several years ago. That is an organism adscribed to the United Nations, and their denunciation has been verified now in a much higher measure than at the time it was investigated and submitted. With the proof that is presently in the possession of this Commission and the additional wealth of evidence it might amass, the same denouncement could be effected now: That there is no Rule of Law in Cuba nowadays.

There is not, either, a State of Laws in Cuba. Its Judiciary Branch, as this very Commission has stated, is subordinated to the Political Power; this, in turn, is subjected to a communist minority and the latter to the arbitrary will of the totalitarian tyrant. All of this shapes a totalitarian regime, where human rights are violated in a totalitarian manner.

There are over 15,000 political prisoners in Cuba, male and female. Over 40,000 Cubans have been executed by firing squads and otherwise.

There were in Cuba, by 1959, some 12,500 Jews; there are only less than 500 now. Why have all of these Jews had to emigrate from Cuba?

The present regime in Cuba has taken the form of a case of plain anti-judiciary status or, better said, lack of a judiciary status. And it must be thus declared.

For all of the above we request of you, Mr. Chairman and Honorable Members of the Commission, to have these denouncements as submitted; to resolve preparing the Eight Report and that, while it is prepared to include in the Annual Report to the Fifteenth Session of the General Assembly of the OAS those violations against human rights occurred in Cuba since the approval of the Seventh Report to the date of submission of the Annual Report to the Assembly; that the Institutional Violation of Human Rights in Cuba be included with a special character and with its proper name; that it be proclaimed that there is not a State of Laws in Cuba, nor a separation of the branches of the state, as stated by Montesquieu; that the resolution(s) approved in the case of Dr. Orlando Bosch et al be published, and that we may enjoy from you the same generous welcoming and consideration enjoyed in the past. We remain yours with the highest consideration and respect, (Note.—Dr. Claudio F. Benedi, Coordinator, representing almost all of the associations and organizations of present and former Cuban political prisoners, male and female, and the Cuban Patriotic Board.

Dr. CLAUDIO F. BENEDI.

INSTITUTIONAL VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS IN CUBA BY THE TYRANNY OF CASTRO DENOUNCED BY CLAUDIO BENEDI

(By Ariel Remos, "Diario Las Americas," Mar. 15, 1985)

(Translated into English as a public service by J.G. Roig).

Dr. Claudio Benedi recently appeared before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, of the OAS, expressing important denouncements about the institutional violation of human rights in Cuba.

Speaking in his condition of Coordinator and in representation of the almost totality of associations and organizations of former Cuban political prisoners, male and female, as well as of the Cuban Patriotic Board, Dr. Benedi denounced that, out of 12,500 Jews who formerly lived in Cuba, there are only 500 left, due to violations of their human rights committed by the bloody tyranny of Castro.

He also stated that 37 persons have been executed of late by firing squads and 200 more have been sentenced to the same punishment, among them some who have performed "internationalist missions" in Angola, other African countries and Central America.

Dr. Benedi also stressed that 2,500 persons who went into the Peruvian Embassy at La Habana, who were provided safeconduct documents by the satellite regime at La Habana to leave the diplomatic see and emigrate afterwards without any difficulties, have been either executed by firing squads, or have disappeared, or are in prison, after becoming "non-persons", he said.

Dr. Benedi asked of the Commission to have included in the Eighth Report on Human Rights his denouncements, and to evidence once more the cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment applied to political prisoners in Cuba, whose release has been requested. He also stated that there are in Cuba, at present, over 15,000 political prisoners and that executions by firing squads effected by the communist regime have reached the figure of 40,500.

Among those persons whose human rights have been violated by the Cuban regime, Dr. Benedi also mentioned those workers who have intended to organize labor unions in the island, there being over 200 of them imprisoned for that reason. Also, a Judge who sided with the workers has disappeared, as well as lawyers who defended them.

Dr. Benedi stated literally in his lengthy document, read before the above mentioned Commission: "That, after the Seventh Report was prepared, over two years ago, there have increased in Cuba, instead of decreasing, cruel, inhuman and degrading treatments against political prisoners and especially against those over 200 plantados, locked up mainly at the fatidical Boniato Prison; physical and psychological tortures are still being applied; arbitrary additional sentences are still being applied; political prisoners who have already served lengthy and undeserved terms are not being released; there are no procedural guarantees at all; there are no impartial judges nor a Judiciary power that is independent and, above all of that and as the foundation of these denouncements, the institutional violations of human rights contained in the Socialist Constitution of 1976, the Penal Code and legal regulations in force in Cuba are still being committed.

Dr. Benedi also alluded to violations of human rights in other countries, such as Venezuela, precisely referring to the case of Dr. Orlando Bosch, who has served over 8 years of imprisonment.

Dr. Benedi finished by requesting that acceptance would be given to those denouncements expressed by him, as well as "a resolution to prepare the Eighth Report and that, while the latter is completed, inclusion be made in the Annual Report to the Fifteenth General Assembly of the OAS of those violations of human rights that have taken place in Cuba since the approval of the Seventh Report until the date of submission of the Annual Report to the Assembly; that inclusion be made with a special character, and mentioning them by name, of the Institutional Violation of Human Rights in Cuba; the fact that there is not in Cuba a state of law, no separation of the powers of the state as formulated by Montesquieu; that publicity be given to the Resolution or Resolutions that the Commission may have approved, or those it will approve in the case of Dr. Orlando Bosch and his three companions also imprisoned, and that we may have from you the same welcome and generous consideration that we have been afforded in the past."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as debate continues on the question of aid to the Nicaraguan Contras, we as legislators must look not only to our conscience for guidance, but also to the feelings of those we represent. Even though the State of Oregon lies 3,000 miles away across the continent, their insistence that we not aid the Nicaraguan Contras militarily has come in loud and clear. Not only have I received thousands of calls, cards, and letters urging my personal opposition, but the Oregon State Legislature has sent a message to the U.S. Congress as a whole.

Earlier this month, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon approved Senate Joint Memorial 3. This memorial calls on the President and Congress to provide no further military aid, directly or indirectly, to the counterrevolutionary guerrillas seeking to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. SJM 3 also urges Congress and the administration to promote a peaceful resolution to the conflict in Nicaragua. Mentioned specifically in this appeal for negotiations is the 2-year-old peace process initiated by the Contadora nations.

Senate Joint Memorial 3 represents a forceful and definitive statement by the governing legislative body of Oregon on behalf of its citizens. The measure passed by a margin of more than 2 to 1 in the Oregon House of Representatives, and 4 to 1 in the State senate. This memorial does not seek to address, in either a positive or negative fashion, the policies and conduct of the Nicaraguan Government. That is not its aim. Rather, it addresses U.S. policy and the conduct of the Contras in light of internationally recognized legal and human-rights standards.

Behind the testimony presented at the hearings on the measure lies the firsthand experience of concerned Oregonians who have actively sought to inform themselves on the situation in Central America. Many of those testifying on the memorial had traveled to Nicaragua, Honduras, and El Salvador to see for themselves the impact of U.S. policy. These witnesses represented a diverse cross-section of Oregon citizens: Health-care professionals, business owners, elected officials, corporate managers, educators, representatives of the timber and real estate industries, church leaders, and factory workers.

The people of Oregon feel strongly about the issue of war and peace in Central America. They feel strongly about U.S. policy. They feel strongly enough to have investigated the situation for themselves and they feel strongly enough to urge their elected State officials to send this message on to us in Congress. In doing so, they are continuing a long tradition of Oregonians standing up and being counted on critical public issues. In taking this stand on the question of aiding the Contras, Oregonians are continuing a progressive tradition.

I would like to thank the members of Oregon's State Legislature for their important work on this memorial and ask unanimous consent that the text of SJM 3 be printed in the RECORD.

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 3

JOINT MEMORIAL

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled

We, your memorialists, the Sixty-third Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas a state of war, duly declared by the Congress of the United States, does not now exist between the United States of America and the Republic of Nicaragua; and

Whereas more than $100 million in United States funds have been allocated to so-called Nicaraguan counterrevolutionary ("contra") military and paramilitary organizations; and

Whereas leaders of these "contra" organizations have repeatedly affirmed through word and action that a purpose of their activities is to overthrow the present Nicaraguan government by force of arms; and

Whereas the campaign of terror conducted by "contra" military forces with the financial and material assistance of the United States government and operation and policy guidance by official United States agencies and personnel has caused thousands of deaths, woundings and kidnappings of Nicaraguan civilians, including many children, women and elderly persons; and

Whereas military facilities in neighboring countries, financed and operated with United States funds and supervision, have repeatedly been used by "contra" and other paramilitary forces to launch military attacks on Nicaragua; and

Whereas the International Court of Justice on May 10, 1984, called for an immediate end to United States participation in the mining of Nicaraguan ports and any other actions that jeopardize the sovereignty of Nicaragua; and

Whereas with the severe economic difficulties faced by the United States, the large and continually increasing federal deficit and resulting high interest rates, and the deep cuts in state and federal social and economic programs, the money can be better spent supporting needed programs in this country; now, therefore, Be it Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon:

(1) The Congress of the United States of America is memorialized to provide, either directly or indirectly through any nation, group, organization, movement or individual, no further aid in any form, including but not limited to funds, materiel, personnel, or operational and policy guidance, to counterrevolutionary or any other private military or paramilitary force conducting military activities against the civilian population, national territory or government of Nicaragua.

(2) The Congress of the United States of America is memorialized to commit itself by all means possible, multilaterally or bilaterally, including but not limited to the peace process initiated by the Contadora Group of Nations, to assist with the earliest possible peaceful resolution of the armed conflicts and threats of conflict in the Central American region.

(3) A copy of this memorial shall be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Majority Leader of the Senate, the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, the Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and to each member of the Oregon Congressional delegation.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my very strenuous objection to Senate Joint Resolution 106 which is currently before us. As my colleagues should be well aware the resolved clause of that resolution states "that the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua." Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to the open-ended authorization given to the President by this language and hope that my colleagues, whether they support the President's policy or not, will reject this gross abdication of congressional responsibility. Even though the resolution pertains specifically to the fiscal 1985 money, the $14 million, the virtually unlimited authority given the President to support directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua sets a very bad precedent which no Member of Congress should in good conscience support. I do not question the President's good faith in making both oral and written assurances as to how this money will be spent. But the fact is that those assurances are not legally binding and what will govern the expenditure of these funds is the language of Senate Joint Resolution 106, a 1985 version of the Tonkin Gulf resolution.

As we all know, sensing that the votes were not there to renew military aid to the Contras, the administration attempted to couple its request for military support with a new so-called peace plan. Unfortunately, the peace plan contains little incentive for either side to negotiate in good faith and thus is little more than a fig leaf attempting to disguise a program to throw out by military force a government which we don't like.

The cosmetics of the new peace plan aside, what we will decide today—despite our moral principles and international obligations, despite our rejection of violence as a means to settle disputes, and despite the fact that our $70 to $100 million in aid to date has not worked—is whether we will continue to arm a band of rebels whose clear aim is to overthrow a government with whom we maintain diplomatic relations. While the American people are understandably confused and uncertain about the proper direction of U.S. policy in the Central American region, on one point I believe they are not confused—they know that Nicaragua Contras are not the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers. Mr. President, I am no apologist for the Sandinistas. Our difficulties with them are well known. We object, and rightly so in my opinion, to their denial of basic rights and freedoms at home and to their support for revolution abroad. As we should with totalitarian regimes of both the right and the left, we must maintain pressure for change—for respect for human liberty and the right of people to freely choose their government. Yet legitimate pressure in this instance stops short of pushing for the military to overthrow of a government by rebels whose commitment to human rights and democratic principles is questionable at best. I would submit that the Contadora process offers the best available forum for a negotiated resolution as it is at least partially insulated from the acrimony of the United States-Nicaragua bilateral relationship. So let us get behind the Contadora process with our full support and encouragement and let us resist this attempt to revive the ill-advised and counterproductive Contra aid program.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, regrettably, I believe that our policy of aiding the Contras in Nicaragua has served a purpose that is quite different from that which we intended. Despite the rhetoric of the President linking the Contras to our own Founding Fathers, the United States is perceived by the world and much of its own citizenry as aiding a group which is largely Somoza-oriented. And, despite President Reagan's rhetoric, there is no doubt in my mind that the leaders of Nicaragua believe that the Contra aid represents an attempt to topple the regime in Managua, rather than reform it.

So the United States is, once again, perceived to be the bad guy—or so it seems. Any effort we make to point out that the leadership in Nicaragua is blatantly Marxist, that it has failed to live up to its promise of a free and democratic society, that it has failed miserably in improving its economy, that it has failed to account for 2,600 of its citizens who have disappeared, and that it regularly and deliberately violates the human rights of people is obscured by our aid to the Contras.

While I find it difficult to oppose the President on foreign policy issues, I believe that continuing to provide military aid to the Contras is misguided. It has not in the past, nor will it in the future, serve to bring about a peaceful resolution to the Nicaraguan conflict. To the contrary, it can only serve to heighten tensions and escalate the military buildup in Nicaragua. As Paul F. Gorman, commander of the U.S. Forces in Central America, recently stated, the Nicaraguan rebels are incapable of overthrowing the Sandinista government "in the foreseeable future," and it will take "years" before Contra pressure can be expected to produce any significant change in the Nicaraguan Government. Therefore, I voted to oppose the release of $14 million to support, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations when that proposal was considered by the Senate Appropriations Committee on April 18, 1985, and shall oppose it when it is considered by the full Senate on April 23.

If the President is sincere in wanting a negotiated settlement in Central America, he must do more than pay lip service to the Contadora process. The democratic nations of the region have the best chance of moderating and reforming the policies of Nicaragua. A regional settlement, negotiated and enforced by the Central American nations, is our best hope for long-term stability and peace in the region, and it is to that process that our Government should devote its full resources.

In this regard, it is my judgment that the United States ought to fund a multilateral force, composed of members of the Organization of American States or the Contadora nations, to monitor and enforce the provisions of a Contadora agreement. No American troops would be included in the multilateral force; rather, it would be composed exclusively of forces from Central and South American nations who have the most at stake in insuring that Nicaragua does not become a Soviet/Cuban client state. It is these nations which can exert the greatest pressure on Nicaragua to restore democratic pluralism, to reinstate freedom of the press, and to hold free and open elections.

In the interim, I suggest that we begin to concentrate on publicizing the facts about Nicaragua without our words being tainted by dubious actions such as the mining of Nicaraguan waters and the distribution of guerrilla warfare manuals on how to exterminate the enemy. A recent article in the Wall Street Journal exposes the Sandinista regime for what it is, and I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DESPAIR AND FEAR IN MANAGUA

(By David Asman)

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.—How to explain to The Wall Street Journal's accounting department a $20 taxi fare in one of the poorest nations of the Western Hemisphere? That's the first question I asked myself upon hearing that my cab fare for the five-mile ride from the Hotel Intercontinental to Archbishop Obando y Bravo's church would be 600 cordobas. At the official exchange rate of 28 cordobas to the dollar, the 15-minute drive cost me more than $21. However, the black-market rate for dollars in Nicaragua is now about 560 cordobas (down from a high of 580). This means the driver was getting just over a dollar for his efforts—barely enough to pay for the gas. How could I complain?

While tourists in Nicaragua—forced to account for all their dollars upon entering and leaving the country—have a difficult time trading dollars on the black market, Nicaraguans who have access to dollars (primarily government officials) can change their dollars at black-market rates, thereby maintaining their purchasing power. However, few have dollars to trade anywhere and most are paid according to the government's minimum wage scale, which is tied to the official rate.

An article in the Nation magazine recently praised the Nicaraguan revolution by announcing that base pay had been raised to 42 cordobas a day, compared with six cordobas a day under Anastasio Somoza's dictatorship. However, the real purchasing power of the cordoba reveals that most workers who received the equivalent of 60 cents a day under Somoza, now receive about eight cents a day.

MISHAPS ARE COMMON

Government officials honest enough to admit the existence of the real exchange rates say that the extreme erosion in purchasing power is offset by essential foods and services provided by the government. But these essentials are in short supply, are sometimes refused to those who publicly object to the government's policies, and do not include some very basic items that must be bought on the black market. A small tube of Mexican toothpaste, for example, costs 300 cordobas on the black market—equal to seven days' labor at the minimum wage. Since such items are usually impossible to get outside of the capital, many workers must spend a full day traveling to buy these "luxuries."

Even supporters of the government agree that economic planning by the Sandinista commandantes is chaotic at best. An East German economist visiting Nicaragua lamented: "They [the Sandinistas] are about to propose a law that will set up about 15 separate exchange rates for imports and exports, I can't think of any East European economy as messed up as this one." Stories of Soviet-style mishaps are now common: The Netherlands sent powdered milk that was misplaced and eventually went bad; the Soviets recently sent two million light bulbs that had the wrong fittings and could not be used.

Nicaragua's socialist economy has also played havoc with peasant farmers, the group supposed to benefit most from revolutionary changes. "Nicaragua was a land of merchants," says Mario Rappaccioli, president of the Nicaraguan Conservative Party. "Small farmers used to bring produce to the market or roadside and sell directly to the consumer. Now they have to sell it to the government for prices that discourage even back-yard farming. The government has become a burdensome middle man, sucking money and vitality out of the economy."

The Sandinista government explains that expenses associated with the war are to blame for shortages and the general economic deterioration of Nicaragua. But economic policies that dicourage production remain in place and, even with the war, many question why the government must spend so much money and divert so much labor to the military. The government admits to spending 40 percent of its budget on its 100,000-man army, but according to Jaime Chamorro, co-director of the independent newspaper La Prensa, the figure is probably well above 50 percent.

The size and purpose of the military has become the single most contentious issue in Nicaragua. This is particularly the case with regard to the military draft and has actually led to cases of open rebellion among the general population. Marta Patricia Boltodano, until recently head of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights in Managua, handled a case of six women who were arrested in San Rafael del Sur. Apparently 200 mothers of unwilling recruits stormed an army training camp in San Rafael where their sons were being trained and took them away. Shots were fired, but no one was reported killed. Mr. Chamorro reports a similar incident in Nagarote involving 800 mothers.

Some suggest that the military buildup has as much to do with controlling the people as it does with controlling the contras. "When U.S. planes flew over last summer," says Mr. Rappaccioli, "the Sandinistas brought their tanks out, but it wasn't to fight the U.S. Marines. It was to say to the people, 'Don't get so enthusiastic about the U.S. coming; we're still in control.'"

The presence of thousands of Cuban advisers is also seen as a method of reinforcing the power of the state over individuals. Suggestions that the Cubans are in Nicaragua to advise on agricultural matters are not taken very seriously. Says one independent farmer: "Historically, we have produced much more effectively than the Cubans. I was at one coffee farm where Cubans were telling us we should get 50 bags of coffee from a particular area. But before the revolution, we were getting 80 bags from this same spot. There's nothing the Cubans can tell us about agriculture. But there is a lot they can tell the Sandinistas about controlling the population."

One example of Cuban influence came from an interview with Roger Guevara Mena, a man I met after Mass at Archbishop Obando's church. "The government just gave me a little holiday," he said. "A holiday in jail."

Mr. Mena is an international lawyer who was asked by the archbishop to defend Father Luis Amado Pena, a priest the Sandinistas had arrested as a counterrevolutionary. The Roman Catholic Church claimed that he had been framed by the Sandinistas, and a demonstration organized to protest his arrest eventually led to the expulsion of 10 priests from Nicaragua. It was clear the government intended to harass anyone who came to the defense of Father Pena, but Mr. Mena did not know how far that harassment would go.

One night in February, police from the Ministry of the Interior knocked on his door and served him with a summons to come to the "public relations" department of the Ministry, located behind the Hotel Intercontinental in Managua. Ironically, this is the same place where Somoza built his infamous "last stand" bunker in the late 1970s. It is now used by Comandante Tomas Borge, head of the Ministry, as an interrogation center.

When Mr. Mena arrived, he was immediately locked in a closet big enough only for a chair. He was kept there for an hour, never knowing why he was there, nor for how much longer he would be interned. He was then questioned by Cubans and Nicaraguans. "A Cuban accent is not hard to distinguish from a Nicaraguan accent," he says, "and their techniques were quite similar to those used in Cuba."

After five hours of threats, insults and questions, Mr. Mena was stripped of all his clothes except his pants and put in a small cell that had no light—natural or artificial. The guards were instructed not to talk to him, not even to tell him what time it was.

LIFE WOULD HAVE NO MEANING

For 10 days he was kept in a cell, had nothing to do, nothing to read and no one to talk to. The only sound he heard were other prisoners screaming and crying in the night. He was never told what he had done.

His food consisted of rice, moldy cheese and stale bread. He had to use his fingers when he sat and ate, and that was right next to the pot on the ground for excrement. He wondered how long he could retain his sanity. Not knowing how long he would be detained, he decided he could survive for up to 15 years. Any more time and his life would have no meaning left.

On the 10th day of incarceration he was brought in to the interrogation room and presented before one of Mr. Borge's assistants. "How have you been treated?" he was asked.

"What do you mean?" Mr. Mena answered. "I still haven't been charged, and you're asking me how I was treated?"

"Well, we have decided to give you your freedom."

He was given a shave and taken out in the sun for about two hours to make him presentable for the outside world. Upon leaving he was told: "We hope that you have learned something from all this."

In fact, he has learned something: "I am no longer afraid. I now know that they can strip me of everything but my faith. And that is all I need to survive. Those who have found their faith are not afraid. I now know I cannot leave Nicaragua. I must stay to help my country survive."

Three weeks ago, Americas Watch issued a report on human-rights abuses in Nicaragua. One member of the Nicaraguan Permanent Commission on Human Rights commented on the Americas Watch report and its chief investigator Juan Mendez: "The Sandinistas are laying the groundwork for a totalitarian society here and yet all Mendez wanted to hear about were abuses by the Contras. How can we get people in the U.S. to see what's happening here when so many of the groups who come down are pro-Sandinista?"

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, a careful review of recent history has led me to believe that we are faced with a decision today which is similar to a decision we made in 1979. We are being asked to provide assistance to a united opposition who support the restitution of peace, democracy and justice in Nicaragua. This opposition has called for a cease-fire and peace negotiations with the Sandinistas, mediated by the Catholic Church. They have recognized President Ortega pending a plebiscite on the last election and they insist on guarantee of free speech. This proposal is fundamentally the same as the combination of proposals forwarded by the Organization of American States in 1978 and 1979. Then, as now, the United States was asked to support the opposition to a seated government. Then, as now, we had to choose to do so based on a belief that the promises of the future were consistent with the principles of democracy and justice which we, as a nation, uphold.

During 1978, significant events changed the course of Nicaraguan history. Public consensus was in large measure responsible.

In Nicaragua, the Sandinistas had been engaged in a bitter guerrilla war against President Somoza and his National Guardsman. Erosion of public support for the Somoza government was galvanized into active opposition following the 1978 assassination of the editor of La Prensa, a daily Nicaraguan newspaper.

Similarly, the 1978 televised shooting of an American newsman by a National Guardsman generated outrage in the United States.

These and other reports compelled the Foreign Ministers of the Organization of America States to meet in December to review an investigative report on the situation in Nicaragua prepared by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. The report was grim. In response to these events in 1978, the Carter administration cut off all assistance to Somoza. Public, press and Government representatives, here and in Central America, agreed that Somoza did not share the interests and support of most of the Nicaraguan people.

In June 1979, the United States supported the OAS call for Somoza's resignation. This resolution called for the "immediate replacement of the Somoza regime * * * and installation in Nicaraguan territory of a democratic government * * * which reflects the free will of the people of Nicaragua." The document also insisted the new government guarantee respect for human rights and hold free elections. All OAS members were urged to take steps to contribute to the social and economic recovery of Nicaragua. In an unusual step, the United States sent representatives to Nicaragua to ask the President to resign.

This resolution was the basis for a pledge from a new Junta of the Government of National Reconstruction to, among other things, hold free elections, to observe human rights and "make democracy and justice possible in Nicaragua."

Popular support brought the Sandinistas to power. American popular support for the change resulted in the provision of $117 million in direct assistance from the United States and our facilitating over $220 million in World Bank loans. The prospects for the Nicaraguan people finally looked bright.

I have briefly recounted the history of the Sandinista's rise to power to remind my colleagues that America's role in this transition was a positive one. We shared an understanding with other members of the OAS. We all believed in the pledges the new Government of Nicaragua made to that body.

I continue to believe in the principles of justice and democracy the Sandinistas committed themselves to uphold to the benefit of all Nicaraguans. I have not seen evidence this pledge has been fulfilled. We are faced today with a decision to support Nicaraguans who intend to rejuvenate that pledge made to the OAS.

What has compelled these people to take up arms against the Sandinistas? Are their goals and concerns the same as ours? To decide whether we should support the Contras, we must decide, as we did in 1978 and 1979, that a change is needed and the people we choose to support represent what is best about that change.

First, what are the circumstances which have led many Americans, Central Americans, and at least, 15,000 Nicaraguans to believe the Sandinistas have betrayed the commitments made to their country and the OAS? I have considered and would like to share some of the opinions which contributed to reaching the conclusion that the Sandinistas have not fulfilled their pledge.

Arturo Cruz, the former Nicaraguan Ambassador to the U.S. and now a leader of the unified opposition:

". . . I badly underestimated the vigor with which the newly elected Nicaraguan Government would proceed to repress its opponents and militarize the state. . . . The Sandinistas are evidently determined to ignore the democratic yearnings of the Nicaraguan people. They have staged an electoral charade and refused to allow serious opponents to participate . . . they have begun an open buildup of Soviet arms . . . and resumed their censorship of the country's only free newspaper. . . ."

New York Times Op-Ed, 12-6-84 "Managua's Central Problem"

Archbishop Obando y Bravo in an April 4, 1985 homily:

"We must realize that it is very difficult for the Nicaraguan people to join hands with a power which deprives man of his dignity, of his rights and of his freedom. It costs our people greatly to live under a power which makes one pay for social advances with reductions in another major revolutionary achievement which is liberty."

A pastoral Letter in April 1984, Nicaragua's bishops called for dialogue between the Sandinistas and Contras said:

"The road to social peace is possible through dialogue . . . All Nicaraguans inside and outside the country must participate in this dialogue, regardless of ideology, class, or partisan belief. . . . It is dishonest to constantly blame internal aggression and violence on foreign aggression."

Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo in an July 11, 1984 speech:

"We want to state clearly that this government is totalitarian. . . . We are dealing with a government that is an enemy of the Church."

These quotes give one a sense of the concerns I believe many Nicaraguans share about their government. I do not believe these comments represent the only view of the situation in Nicaragua, but they do represent a compelling view which calls for change. Are calls for freedom and dignity of a people, "fulfillment of democratic yearnings" inconsistent with American beliefs? I think not.

Compare these concerns with the views expressed by the current Nicaraguan leadership:

In 1981, Humberto Ortega, Defense Minister, said:

"Keep firmly in your minds that these elections are to consolidate revolutionary power, not to place it at stake."

Commandante Bayardo Arce said in May 1984:

"We believe the elections should be used in order to vote for Sandinismo . . . our job right now is to concentrate all our forces in the military effort. . . "

In an interview in 1983 Tomas Borge stated:

"Revolutions are a necessary and inevitable step . . . so Reagan is correct when he points out that today Nicaragua, tomorrow El Salvador. . ."

In the same interview, Borge said:

"I told (my mother) that I would not be blackmailed by her gentleness and her naivete and that I was a Communist."

I do not think these views represent the consensus of popular opinion in America. Nor do I believe they are shared by the majority of citizens in countries that are neighbors to Nicaragua.

These views do not stand in a vacuum. They can and should be evaluated in the context of the actions the government has taken. I find the actions even more disturbing than the words. What will Nicaragua do with over 100 T-55 tanks? How many active duty soldiers does it take to defend your sovereignty against Costa Rica's police constabulatory of 8,000 and the Honduran military force of less than 20,000? The Sandinista's seem to think 62,000 active duty soldiers will afford an adequate deterrent.

Some say the Nicaraguans are simply responding to the threat they believe the United States imposes. However, history reminds us this build up began as we—the threat—were providing $17 million in assistance to the Sandinistas.

We, as a country, do not share Sandinista goals to convert Central America to a region of revolution. We do not seek the escalation in militarization. We are not Marxist-Leninists. What we are is evident by what we have done. We have repeatedly endorsed peaceful broad based solutions to the difficult problems.

The United States has consistently and strongly supported the nations involved in the Contadora negotiations. We have worked closely with all countries to develop the Document of 21 Objectives into a comprehensive and verifiable agreement. This process is fragile but imperative. All countries in the region must participate to assure all concerns are satisfied. Nicaragua has not yet accepted recent amendments proposed by Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador and has indicated it would prefer to resolve such questions as arms buildup in bilateral talks with the United States.

Bilateral talks are also important. To this end, the United States held nine meetings with Nicaraguan representatives from June to December 1984. The negotiating instructions for our envoy have been flexible and fair. However, when the United States tried to initiate concrete discussions on points at issue in the Contadora process Nicaragua balked.

The Nicaraguan negotiating strategy has been characterized by an effort to bilateralize discussions. This is demonstrated by President Ortega's recent proposal to Senators KERRY and HARKIN. The proposal focuses on a cease-fire based upon normalization of relations between the United States and Nicaragua. There is no mention of direct talks with the opposition. Nicaraguans should be talking with Nicaraguans. These discussions should be the basis for building constructive, peaceful regional solutions.

Just as we recognized the need to redress the significant grievances Nicaraguans had in the 1970's, we must once again recognize the need for change. The Sandinista's must include politically, socially and economically disenfranchised Nicaraguans in the decisionmaking about the future of their country.

I will vote today to support the opposition acting to bring change to Nicaragua, change which will restore and rejuvenate the commitments to freedom and democracy that the Sandinistas have disregarded. I believe if a cease-fire and serious discussion with the opposition are initiated, prospects for peace and security brighten. It is a first step. The opposition must be afforded a genuine opportunity to fully participate in the political process, to bring within reach solutions to the problems of the Nicaraguan military buildup, foreign military advisers, and Sandinista support to regional insurgencies.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President. The subject under discussion today is covert action concerning Nicaragua. This subject is of grave importance for the nations concerned and indeed the whole Caribbean-Central American region.

What needs to be emphasized is that the position the United States takes on this issue now has far-reaching strategic consequences for relationships between the United States and the Soviet Union. It will also materially affect the fate of lesser totalitarian dictatorships like Cuba and many small nations struggling to keep free and independent of Communist internal rule or Soviet predominance. It is an exceptional situation confronting this country and the Congress has a heavy responsibility to deal with it wisely.

Covert action by the intelligence agencies of the U.S. Government should be an exceptional act, but it is entirely legitimate when it is Presidentially authorized to carry out essential national security programs abroad when overt means are inappropriate or will not suffice to counter a serious threat to American interests. Such a threat exists in Central America today. The crucial conflict zone is Nicaragua, where a dictatorship supported directly by the Soviet Union and Cuba is trying to suppress liberty inside Nicaragua and export violence and instability across its borders.

I wish to state categorically that I believe it is within the constitutional prerogatives of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces and Chief Executive of the U.S. Government to authorize covert special activities by intelligence agencies to support national foreign policy objectives abroad in ways that conceal and do not acknowledge publicly the role of the United States when this course is safer or more effective than open military operations.

Finally, we must turn to the key question of whether covert action is justified now. It is a much broader question. It is one the Congress must examine with their eyes fixed on long term challenges to the security of our Nation, its moral values, and political institutions.

As one who has served as a counter-intelligence agent behind the Iron Curtain, I say yes, covert action in Central America is justified because the kind of covert action in which we are, or ought to be, engaged is both strategic and defensive. By this I mean it is designed to counter the forward thrust of Soviet political and military domination of important regions of the globe.

The 1980's certainly present a grave challenge to the future of American national security, economic well-being, and the political process of representative government in an open society. Political oppression and outright captivity are widespread in our troubled time.

It is possible, though not inevitable, that this decade is one of the permanent turning points in history. The fate of Nicaragua could be one of those turning points.

It is conceivable that the Russians could, by superior forward political planning, create a worldwide trend toward totalitarian governments ruled by one-party Communist dictatorships hostile to the United States and other open societies.

Stalin in his own heyday hoped for exactly this achievement.

He made a mighty surge forward in both East Europe and Northeast Asia but failed to achieve a decisive preponderance of power.

It is patently still the strategy of the leaders of the Soviet Union to increase and expand the reach of their power, neutralizing U.S. military capabilities with the threat of nuclear war implicit in the gigantic Soviet military weapons buildup of the 1970's and destroying the political will of non-Communist countries to pay the price of local and regional self-defense.

This Leninist strategy is long-established and well understood by Communist party leaders.

Russian leaders believe in the maxim, enunciated by their one-time Chinese comrade, Mao Tse-Tung, that political power grows from the barrel of a gun.

They want to dominate and exploit the resources and the technology of the world.

They have no fixed timetable.

They prefer to win concessions from weak and fearful foreign governments without actually waging wars that would damage the economic infrastructure whose output they covet.

Consequently, the United States faces a persistent hostile behavior pattern in conflicts below the level of organized, declared warfare. Make no mistake: Our form of free society and our influence abroad are the targets of the conflict in Central America above and beyond the local stakes.

What Soviet Communist leaders have in mind is the gradual psychological undermining of national will in target States and the establishment of political control when local circumstances permit. The process is not easy to contain. It is like ocean waves eroding shores of freedom.

The United States should use every diplomatic and informational device at its disposal to explain that the "War of National Liberation" waged in Central America from a base in Nicaragua is simply Leninist double talk for a war destabilizing governments cooperative with the United States by terrorism, political revolutionary action, and guerrilla warfare.

These wars are fought to create a new Communist dictatorship beholden to Moscow.

With extensive Soviet and Cuban guidance, the Sandinista regime is close to establishing a typical Leninist-model dictatorship over a small nation whose people want to have political and economic freedom.

A new nation under Communist control often provides a base for exporting revolution to other neighboring States marked for the next destabilizing assault.

Nicaragua is playing this role, supplying the arms and leadership for guerrilla war against El Salvador where a pluralist elected government struggles for stability.

President Reagan accurately views Nicaragua as a classical case of a revolution that raised Democratic hopes but went sour in the totalitarian mode. Nicaragua thus became a State created by terrorism directly sponsoring further terrorism around it.

The Sandinista regime in Nicaragua exhibits all the elements of the spreading danger of State-sponsored terrorism. The criminal nature of the acts, the clear identity of the State sponsors as perpetrators, the admitted Leninist revolutionary strategic objective, the intended totalitarian outcome and violent methods can be seen in detail in the events that have taken place over 6 years.

To implement an active countermeasure policy against State-sponsored terrorism, the United States must be prepared to have recourse to a full range of responses. There is no easy solution that guarantees success. We must meet our own responsibilities to defend American interests and the security of friendly States or groups abroad in order to maintain American ideals and goals.

Secretary Shultz argues that U.S. responsibilities as a leader of the free world require bold action, at times covert in the sense that the detailed moves as distinct from the policy must be kept so as to pre-empt revolutionary successes by Soviet sponsored forces.

He said:

If we shrink from leadership, we create a vacuum into which our adversaries can move. Our national security suffers, our global interests suffer, and yes, the worldwide struggle for democracy suffers.

While Secretary Shultz did not specify when or how defensive and deterrent measures should be employed, he made it clear that both covert paramilitary assistance and open military support can justifiably be extended to "those struggling against the imposition of Communist tyranny" on the basis of the "inherent right of individual and collective self-defense against aggression."

It is unthinkable to me that the Congress of the United States can take a stand on the other side of this grave issue.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am now prepared to yield back the remainder of the time on this side, subject to the 15 minutes that has already been allocated to the distinguished majority leader, and I do yield back the remainder of our time subject to those 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is right. The time is yielded back.

The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am sure President Reagan is a man of his word. He says in his letter of today that his intention is to use none of the $14 million for military operations. But intentions change.

President Reagan's original intention was to use this money for military purposes. His original intention was to not touch Social Security. Now his intention is to cut Social Security.

The text of what we are going to vote on reads:

. . . The Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds for supporting directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

Let us vote against what we and the President are against. Let us vote for what we and the President are for.

We could do that by unanimous consent. We could set-aside what we are about to vote on and vote for something embodying what the President calls for in his letter. By a two-thirds vote we could suspend the rules and vote right now on the Byrd substitute for what this language in the Byrd resolution calls for is in close tune with what the President has spelled out in his letter. Or immediately following the vote on the proposal before us, we could vote for the Byrd resolution spelling out what the President has called for. Or we could refer the Byrd resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee and get it back tomorrow after the committee has worked it over to make sure that it coincides with what the President has asked for and vote tomorrow for what the President now states he wants.

Mr. President, even though the President has sent us an eleventh-hour compromise proposal, the legal question before the Senate today remains the same. Our vote is on language authorizing military operations against Nicaragua. This is not simply a debate over parliamentary formalisms, over the proper mechanism for authorizing acts of war. We should use the opportunity provided by today's first full, public Senate debate and vote on Contra operation against the Sandinistas to consider an escalating U.S. policy gone wrong.

The Nicaragua policy we have been following is wrong because it is immoral: U.S. taxpayer dollars should not be used to sponsor acts of international terrorism in Nicaraguan villages, harbors and cities.

It is wrong because it is illegal: U.S. funding of military efforts to overthrow a government that we recognize violates not only the charter of the United Nations and the Organization of American States but our own Constitution as well.

It is wrong because it violates our national principles: No matter how much we deplore the Sandinistas' reprehensible curbs on civil liberties and their provocative support from Havana and Moscow, we must not adopt the attitude that our ends justify our means. We ill serve America's mission of promoting democracy when we emulate our adversary's most deplorable tactics.

But for those who feel that arguments based on morality, legality and national principles have little relevance on a troubled planet; I would hope that the impracticality of the efforts the administration has been making would be decisive.

The fact is that U.S.-bankrolled efforts to undermine the Sandinistas have proven utterly counterproductive. They have increased domestic, nationalist support for the Sandinistas we all would like to see replaced. They have isolated Nicaraguans opposed to the Sandinistas—precisely the forces of moderation we'd like to encourage—and have made them, by association, allies of CIA-backed terrorists. They have provided the Sandinistas with readymade excuses for curbing press and political freedoms and for relying heavily on Warsaw Pact nations for security assistance. And after 4 years and nearly $100 million in U.S. taxpayer funds, these efforts have failed to wrest one inch of soil from the Sandinistas' control. A resolution authorizing direct or indirect military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua will not help either.

On the 10th anniversary of our withdrawal from our "limited war" in Vietnam, we should recall some of the lessons of opposing nationalist movements in urban and jungle warfare on their own soil.

Just as the Gulf of Tonkin resolution did, the Nicaragua authorization could open the door for a war that the American people do not understand, will not support and do not believe holds the promise of advancing our national interest in stable democratic developments in a turbulent region.

Congress must not repeat the tragic error of Vietnam.

And we must not repeat the errors of past policies in Central America, where Cuba, Panama, Mexico, Nicaragua, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala and other nations have all been targets of direct U.S. military action or covert subversion in our long, tangled and failing efforts to use gunboats and "big sticks" to impose our will on our neighbors south of the border.

For these interventionist acts of war, "Uncle Sam" has earned the hatred of millions of Latins who equate the U.S. Government with Yankee imperialism.

The legacy of U.S. policies is clear.

For most Central Americans, true democracy is still far away.

Poverty, hunger, and oppression are common everywhere.

Military juntas still reign or wield actual power in many Central American nations.

And the very Communist forces we have tried to scare away are more entrenched than ever before.

Perhaps we have tried to do too much in Central America.

Perhaps we have tried to do too little.

Perhaps we have tried the wrong things.

But what we have done, just has not worked.

And the policies of the Reagan administration are not working either.

Today the Senate should consider why these and previous policies have failed.

Nineteen years ago, one of our members, the distinguished and wise chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Bill Fulbright, warned in his book "The Arrogance of Power" against the policies of military interventionism which have weakened our cause throughout Latin America.

Fulbright wrote in 1966, just as the Vietnam war was getting underway and he was at the peak of his long and thoughtful career.

In reviewing the successes and failures of American foreign policy, Fulbright talked of the need for "social revolution in Latin America" and "a drawing away from military and economic oligarchies" there.

He said that successful American policy in Latin America "will also require acceptance of the fact that Latin America is coming into its own in the world and can no longer be regarded as the special ward of the United States."

Above all, Fulbright warned against illegal actions by the United States in Central America and other parts of the world.

"Law is the essential foundation of stability and order both within societies and in international relations," he wrote.

Indeed, adherence to law is the most basic and fundamental protection of our democratic society. Order crumbles and our Constitution is threatened if law is not preserved.

And around the world we preach the need for law—through treaties ratified by this body, through the United Nations, and through the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

But, now, once again, at the World Court and in Central America, our Government's adherence to legal principle and the sovereign rights of nations is being questioned.

For this administration through CIA-directed acts of war against Nicaragua, has violated international laws and treaty obligations.

The Reagan administration walked away from the World Court, saying it lacks jurisdiction over the claim by Nicaragua that the United States broke the law in its attacks on shipping in Nicaraguan waters.

Does this administration regard the United Nations charter, the OAS charter, the Rio Treaty, the International Court of Justice, and all the other treaties, accords and solemn pledges to observe international law nothing but scraps of paper to be ignored at will?

Is the United States—the leader of the free world and the symbol of constitutional law, democracy, freedom, and liberty for nations in every corner of the globe must stop acting in Central America in a manner similar to that employed by the very tyrannies we oppose?

I believe that we should elevate the discussion about Central America to the higher level of how our Central America policy relates to our world position.

That world position is, indisputably, that we are the force for peaceful, democratic change and that we are, indisputably, the beacon light of hope for freedom-yearning people around the globe.

We have achieved that eminent status, not through military might and reckless adventurism in Central America, but through the strength of our constitutional representative democracy, through the powerful dynamics of our free economic system and through our support of the basic principles of the United Nations and other mechanisms of international cooperation.

United States leadership in that role is vital.

Without it, we could face endless turmoil around the world.

So let us apply the test of leadership in Nicaragua.

It is not in our global interests and it does not further the principles of international law to foment terrorism and war against a sovereign Latin country which is recognized by our own Government and our allies.

Clearly, it is not.

In this Hall we and our predecessors have debated the great issues of this and other times, always with one eye on history and the other on the future.

History tells us that a great nation must remain true to its ideals and principles, concepts that have stood the test of more than two centuries and which this body helped formulate and mold during decades of debate and bipartisan accord around the core ideas of our Republic.

Those ideals were embodied in the Wilsonian and Rooseveltian visions of the rights of man and democracy's mandate to protect those rights and to extend them wherever possible.

We helped create the United Nations.

We created the instruments of reconstruction in the Marshall plan, the World Bank, foreign aid, and a myriad of cultural, educational, health, and economic projects that reached into thousands of cities and villages in virtually every country in the world.

And we did these things not for the glory of the American flag, but because we believe in our own declarations of the brotherhood and sisterhood of mankind and the inalienable rights of men, women, and children for opportunity and freedom.

As we consider the pending request, I encourage my colleagues to consider the wisdom of a late President this administration is so fond of quoting—John F. Kennedy. President Kennedy wrote of looking "forward to an America that commands the respect of the world not only for its strength, but for its civilization as well."

Let us show not only strength today, but civilization and wisdom as well.

Let us reject using any more U.S. taxpayer dollars for clumsy counterproductive covert or not-so-covert wars.

Let us reject the crude comparison of a group that includes so many mercenaries and terrorists to our Founding Fathers—a gross insult to the Jeffersons and Washingtons and Adamses.

Let us make clear how repugnant we find the totalitarianism of the Sandinista left, just as we deplore the extremism of a Pinochet dictatorship of the right.

But let us resolve to chart a more responsible, civilized and productive course for achieving U.S. national security interests around the world.

Let us vote for language that spells all that out as clearly as the Byrd proposal would do, and as the resolution presently before us would not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 5 minutes and 10 seconds remaining.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Presiding Officer, the Vice President of the United States.

Mr. President, I will introduce a resolution following the action on the present matter before the Senate which will embrace the principles that were involved in the package presented by the Democratic Senators at the White House on yesterday. I do this for this reason: In the event the resolution on which we are about to vote is defeated here or, if not here, in the House of Representatives, then I should think that we would need to have a legislative vehicle to deal with the Nicaragua situation. I am saying that in the event this resolution fails.

I have looked at the letter which my good friend, Senator DOLE, has presented to me. It is addressed to me by the President of the United States. And having given a cursory reading to the letter—I have not had a chance to study it as carefully as I would like—it seems to me that the President has gone a long way toward meeting many of the suggestions that were proposed by the Democrats who went with me to the White House on yesterday, and I am glad to see that.

I think therefore, that we Democrats, in making our proposals to the White House yesterday, performed a service. That is obvious because the President has now come around to the viewpoint that most of our proposals were indeed worthy.

I would only say a couple of further things with respect to the letter: First of all, Mr. President, it does not satisfy the concerns some of us had with respect to the using of the CIA as a channel through which food, clothing, and medicine would flow. So that is still one big problem as far as this Senator is concerned.

I will not comment further on the letter except to say that I am glad that the President does indicate his intention to resume bilateral talks with the Government of Nicaragua. He also intends to press for a cease-fire and he has also mentioned in the letter specifically the kind of assistance that would go to the Contras as being food, medicine, clothing, "not for arms, ammunition, and weapons," but he does use the phrase "and other assistance for their survival and well-being."

"Other assistance for the survival and well-being" of the resistance fighters could very well include trucks, earth-moving equipment, et cetera, et cetera, which would not fall into the category of "arms, ammunition, and weapons."

I do not intend to try to make a further play on words, but just to point out that phrase is as big as would be needed for an Amtrak train to go through.

Now, Mr. President, having indicated my objections to this fact, again I wish to compliment the President on having moved in our direction, although the resolution was introduced on April 4, and today is April 23. We have had all of those many days in which the President could have indicated to Senators even yesterday, for example, or by letter, that he would do the things stated therein—and these are the same things that were involved in the package which we presented to him at the White House on yesterday.

But at the 11th hour and the 59th minute here comes the letter. Here comes the letter.

My concern also goes to the fact that we as Senators should be very careful how we at the last minute, when there have been days or weeks in which the President could have made his position clear—days or weeks—but at the last minute, the last 15 minutes, or the last 1 hour and 15 minutes or the last 2 hours and 15 minutes, can be influenced in our vote by a White House letter which concedes on the part of the President most of the items that we sought to put into the form of legislation—legislation enacted by you, and you, and you, under our constitutional responsibilities as Members of the Senate. Are we going in the future to follow this procedure of changing our positions at the last hour, the last 2 hours, the last 3 hours, because of a letter that is sent to us by the President of the United States, no matter whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, and I do not say this in denigration of the President. This is no way to legislate, in my judgment. Other Senators may see it in their own light. As far as I am concerned, I do not propose to legislate in this manner.

Mr. President, one final note, and I will sit down: I understand that the Secretary of State has been calling Democratic Senators during the last hours on the telephone. Now he did not call me.

But I understand he has called others. All I have to say to that is this: Senators might remember—and I respect the Secretary of State. I think he is a good Secretary of State. He is dedicated. He works hard and he has high marks as far as I am concerned—but it is the same Secretary of State who, according to my information, said on the "Today" show on yesterday, April 22, when asked if certain Senators were used, Shultz responded:

It looks like that to me. It's a problem when Senators run around and deal with Communists themselves.

Now, when I was the majority leader, I went to see President Brezhnev to talk with him about the SALT II Treaty. The next day I saw Mr. Gromyko and talked with him about the SALT II Treaty. I met with Vice Premier Deng, the leading man in the People's Republic of China. They were all Communists. Everybody knew that.

Is there an inference to be drawn from the fact that I met with these Communist leaders, as majority leader of the U.S. Senate and also as an emissary of the President of the United States? I talked with them. They were Communists. So what is the inference to be drawn from the Secretary's reference to Senators who talk with "Communists themselves." I leave the answer for Senators to think about.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first of all, I would like to make the President's letter a part of the record and ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I announced on April 4 a proposal to promote peace in Central America by fostering a dialogue between the Government of Nicaragua and the democratic resistance, accompanied by a ceasefire in the conflict between them. My proposal was intended, in the words of the Contadora Document of Objectives agreed to by Nicaragua and its neighbors, "to promote national reconciliation efforts . . ., with a view to fostering participation in democratic political processes in accordance with the law."

Since April 4, I have had the benefit of many fruitful discussions with Latin American leaders and with members of the Congress. I have been encouraged by these discussions, which have shown that a broad consensus exists on the need for reconciliation in Nicaragua, based on democratic principles, as an essential aspect of achieving peace in Central America.

Today the Senate will vote on a resolution, S.J. Res. 106, the test of which is required by a law enacted last October. That text purports to release appropriated funds and free the Executive Branch from restrictions against the support of military or paramilitary action in Nicaragua. However, my intentions are founded on a different approach. Accordingly, I want to make clear to the Senate, as it approaches this important vote, how I will proceed in pursuit of peace if S.J. Res. 106 is enacted.

First, I will provide assistance to the democratic resistance only for food, medicine, clothing, and other assistance for their survival and well-being—and not for arms, ammunition, and weapons of war. Second, I will not use more than the $14 million already appropriated during the current fiscal year for such assistance. No other U.S. Government funds would be spent for such material assistance to the armed democratic resistance. I will personally establish thorough procedures for the detailed management and accountability of the program in order to assure that these limitations on both the nature and amount of U.S. assistance are scrupulously observed.

I recognize the importance some Senators have attached to bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua and the establishment of a ceasefire. I have considered these views and believe that such steps could help to promote the internal reconciliation called for by Contadora and endorsed by so many Latin American leaders.

Therefore, I intend to resume bilateral talks with the Government of Nicaragua and will instruct our representatives in those talks to press for a ceasefire as well as a church-mediated dialogue between the contending Nicaraguan factions. I must emphasize, however, that such bilateral talks must be in support of the Contadora process and the internal dialogue and cannot become a substitute for these efforts to achieve a comprehensive, verifiable agreement among all the nations of Central America. Also, as I said on April 4, peace negotiations must not become a cover for deception and delay. If the Sandinista government shows bad faith by seeking to gain unilateral advantage, for example, through a further arms buildup during a ceasefire or intransigence in negotiations, I would feel obligated to respond accordingly in our diplomatic efforts and would not expect the democratic resistance to continue to observe a ceasefire which was unfairly working to their disadvantage.

I will report to the Congress no later than September 1, 1985, on the progress made in achieving a verifiable peace and reconciliation in Nicaragua based on democratic principles. Such report shall also include an accounting for the funds obligated or expended under this joint resolution and may include such recommendations as I deem appropriate with respect to Nicaragua. I shall expect any recommendations for additional legislation for further assistance or sanctions to receive expedited handling.

While economic sanctions are unlikely by themselves to create sufficient pressure to change Nicaragua's behavior, the Sandinistas should not benefit from their present access to the U.S. market while continuing their intransigence on issues affecting our national security. The Administration will favorably consider economic sanctions against the Government of Nicaragua and will undertake multilateral consultations with other Central American states in this regard.

The U.S. condemns atrocities by either side in the strongest possible terms. We will use our assistance to help ensure against wrongful acts by those who seek our help and we will urge them to take steps to investigate allegations of such acts and take appropriate actions against those found to be guilty.

The United States now stands at a moment of judgment. Experience has shown that a policy of support for democracy, economic opportunity, and security will best serve the people of Central America and the national interests of the United States. If we show consistency of purpose, if we are firm in our conviction what the promising developments over the past year in El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala also show the way for a better future for Nicaragua, then over time we can help the democratic center prevail over tyrants of the left or the right. But if we abandon democracy in Nicaragua, if we tolerate the consolidation of a surrogate state in Central America, responsive to Cuba and the Soviet Union, we will see the progress that has been achieved begin to unravel under the strain of continuing conflict, attempts at subversion, and loss of confidence in our support.

There can be a more democratic, more prosperous, and more peaceful Central America. I am prepared to devote my energies toward that end. But, I also need the support of the Congress. I hope that you will give me your support today.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me clarify the question of the delivery time of the letter. We have had different drafts floating around all afternoon. One reason for the final draft being a bit late was we were trying to accommodate the concerns of some Senators on both sides of the aisle. Some, for example, wanted stronger language on economic sanctions, including this Senator, the Senator from Texas, and others. So I think we have made some progress by not having the letter up earlier.

But I would also indicate that there are some feelings on this side that the letter goes too far; that after meeting for 8½ hours yesterday, we almost adopted a Democratic package, and that did not make some people happy. So we backed away from that proposition.

We decided this morning we probably could not get together because there were some on the other side who do not want the Nicaraguan Sandinistas to talk to the Contras for some reason. They prefer only that the Sandinistas talk to us and that we become the surrogates. That is how we get involved and things start to escalate.

I could go down the list of areas that are covered in the letter. Some suggested, for example, that we ought to have a statute laying out in detail what actions the President should take on negotiations, where he should go, what he should do. We must reject that. It seemed to many of us that those are foreign policy matters, and the President ought to have some flexibility.

So the President's letter is very obviously an effort to achieve a bipartisan consensus on this critical foreign policy and national security issue.

Let me indicate very quickly what this letter provides.

Fourteen million dollars for humanitarian use only.

Detailed management and accountability of the program.

Resumption of bilateral discussions between the United States and Nicaragua.

Press for the Contras and the Sandinistas to accept a cease-fire.

Provisions for appropriate response in the event of intransigence or cease-fire violations by the Sandinistas.

The United States encourages and supports the Contadora process.

Economic sanctions are favorably considered.

The President will make a report to the Congress not later than September 1, suggesting any additional assistance or sanctions, which should be considered under expedited procedures.

I think if you look very carefully at the very thoughtful proposal that was put together by a number of Democrats, primarily intitiated by Senator JOHNSTON, you will find that nearly every one of these points has been recognized and addressed in the President's letter.

There have been concessions. I believe the President's letter is a carefully crafted effort to achieve bipartisan support. It should not be a partisan matter. Some Republicans may vote against S. 106. Hopefully some Democrats will support it.

I believe we had a good meeting yesterday, I say to my colleague, the distinguished minority leader. We did not go down there from 10:30 until 7 o'clock just to pass away the day. Many of us never spent a full day in the White House. Some have thought about it, but it had not happened. [Laughter.]

But, in any event, we had a good, thorough discussion of many of the points raised by the distinguished minority leader and others.

I regret that the minority leader may have slipped off the boat here at the end and may not be able to support the resolution. But I believe we are on the verge of making some policy that will be very important in the months ahead. So we appreciate the efforts made on both sides.

So, Mr. President, may I say that Senate Joint Resolution 106 and the companion letter from the President are fully consistent with our overall policy goals and strategy in Nicaragua. They represent a package containing the four essential elements of a sound approach to the current situation.

First, this package will strongly encourage the beginning of good faith negotiations. By continuing to provide funding for the Contras at the $14 million level and within existing channels, the package preserves one of the most important points of leverage which we have in Nicaragua. We cannot give up that leverage if we are to have any realistic prospect of getting the Sandinistas to moderate their oppressive and aggressive policies and take part in serious talks.

At the same time, the President pledged to use no more than the $14 million and to use all of it for non-lethal purposes, as a sign of our good faith interest in negotiations. The President has also asserted his intention to resume direct contacts with the Sandinistas, to press for a cease-fire and the beginning of talks between the contending forces within the country, who must ultimately decide the fate of their own country.

The Sandinistas have said repeatedly that they are interested in a peaceful settlement and national reconciliation. The President is going the extra mile to give them the chance to demonstrate they are sincere.

Second, the resolution and letter will preserve and in fact enhance the policy flexibility the President needs, while ensuring that Congress can play its appropriate oversight role. In his letter, the President says he will make greater use of economic pressure, a tool which we have not yet fully exploited, to encourage more reasonable policies in Managua. While the administration will continue to manage the expenditure of funds for the Contras, the Congress has been assured that it will be given a full accounting of how those funds are spent. Though no policy option is precluded for fiscal year 1986, the President has committed himself to report to the Congress by September 1, 1986, on the situation in Nicaragua, so that our own decisions can be made on the basis of all the facts. And the President has promised a close monitoring of any cease-fire which emerges, so that we may know who is abiding by its provisions and who isn't.

Third, the President's package, by continuing the funding which the President sought, makes good on our national commitment to the Contras. We can argue all we want about the wisdom of that commitment, but we can hardly question that it exists. Whatever else we do today, let this not be the day that the Congress pulls the plug on yet another group of people who have chosen to believe in our word.

Finally, the resolution and letter are real world solutions to the real world situation. The President has stood firm on what he regards—correctly, in my view—as matters of principle, but he has shown a real willingness to compromise throughout the hard bargaining in which we have been engaged over the past several days. Others involved in our discussions have compromised, too, in the interest of getting something which most of us can comfortably support. All of us have reservations about some of the things which have gone on in and around Nicaragua. None of us wants to deny the President and the administration the wherewithal they need to conduct an effective foreign policy. This package strikes a realistic middle ground.

I urge all of my colleagues to think about this vote in this realistic frame of mind. This is an important vote, and we are going to be held accountable for developments which our decision today produces. The best decision, for our country and for us, is to support this package.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. May I say for the record, I hope the distinguished majority leader does not feel that my references to the lateness of the hour to which I received this letter were in any way a reflection on him. It was not. He sent a draft of the letter. He sent me the first draft and then the second draft. I thank him for that. I want to make that clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read in full. It is short. I hope Senators will listen carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A Joint Resolution (S.J. Res. 106) to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 46, as follows:

So the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 106) was passed, as follows:

S.J. RES. 106

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

[Applause in galleries.]

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the galleries?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The galleries will be in order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I may inform my colleagues, there will be no more votes tonight. We will be in not before noon tomorrow.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend past 9:30 p.m. this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. I then ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination under Coast Guard of Capt. Bennett S. Sparks.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, that nomination has been cleared on this side of the aisle, and there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Capt. Bennett S. Sparks to be a permanent commissioned officer in the Coast Guard Reserves in the grade of commodore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF STANDARDS AUTHORIZATION, 1986

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having consulted with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of Calendar item No. 81, S. 796, the National Bureau of Standards Authorization Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 796) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal year 1986, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 796) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal year 1986, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, with amendments, as follows:

(The parts of the bill intended to be stricken are shown in boldface brackets, and the parts of the bill intended to be inserted are shown in italics.)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Bureau of Standards Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1986".

AUTHORIZATION FOR PROGRAM ACTIVITIES

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1986 to the Secretary of Commerce to carry out activities performed by the National Bureau of Standards the sums set forth in the following line items:

(1) Measurement Research and Standards, $39,174,000.

(2) Materials Science and Engineering, $22,744,000.

(3) Engineering Measurements and Standards, $34,040,000.

(4) Computer Science and Technology, $10,000,000.

(5) Center for Fire Research, $5,827,000.

(6) Technical Competence Fund, $8,626,000.

(7) Central Technical Support, $9,245,000.

OFFICE OF PRODUCTIVITY, TECHNOLOGY, AND INNOVATION

SEC. 3. In addition to the sums authorized to be appropriated by this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Commerce $2,715,000 for fiscal year 1986 for the activities of the Office of Productivity, Technology, and Innovation.

NATIONAL TECHNICAL INFORMATION SERVICE

SEC. 4. Section 2 of the Act of September 9, 1950 (15 U.S.C. [1152),]1152) is amended—

(1) in paragraph [(a),] (b), by inserting immediately after "reproductions," the following: "without regard to section 501 of title 44, United States Code,"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) To acquire capital equipment and inventories from receipts for work or services performed or to be performed under this section.".

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL TECHNICAL INFORMATION SERVICE

SEC. 5. In addition to the sums authorized to be appropriated by this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Commerce $537,000 for fiscal year 1986 for the patent licensing activities of the National Technical Information Service.

EXCESS FOREIGN CURRENCY

SEC. 6. In addition to the sums authorized to be appropriated by this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Commerce $600,000 for fiscal year 1986 for expenses of the National Bureau of Standards incurred outside the United States, to be paid for in foreign currencies that the Secretary of the Treasury determines to be excess to the normal requirements of the United States.

SALARY ADJUSTMENTS

SEC. 7. In addition to the sums authorized to be appropriated by this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Commerce for fiscal year 1986 such additional sums as may be necessary to make any adjustments in salary, pay, retirement, and other employee benefits which may be provided for by law.

AVAILABILITY OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 8. Appropriations made under the authority provided in this Act shall remain available for obligation, for expenditure, or for obligation and expenditure for such period or periods as may be specified in the Acts making such appropriations.

COST RECOVERY AUTHORITY

SEC. 9. (a) Section 12(f) of the Act of March 3, 1901 (15 U.S.C. [278b(f)),] 278b(f)) is amended—

(1) by striking "first"; and

(2) by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof the following: ", and to ensure the availability of working capital necessary to replace equipment and inventories".

(b) Fees for calibration services, standard reference materials, and other comparable services provided by the National Bureau of Standards shall be at least sufficient to meet the requirements set forth in the amendments made by subsection (a) of this section, and any funds recovered in excess of such requirements shall be returned to the Treasury of the United States.

COMPENSATION OF DIRECTOR

SEC. 10. (a) Section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1901 (15 U.S.C. [274,] 274) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The director shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter in effect for level IV of the Executive Schedule, pursuant to section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.".

(b)(1) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Director, National Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce.".

(2) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking the following item:

"Director, National Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce.".

STRUCTURAL FAILURES

SEC. 11. The National Bureau of Standards, on its own initiative but only after consultation with local authorities, may initiate and conduct investigations to determine the causes of structural failures in structures which are used or occupied by the general public. No part of any report resulting from such investigation shall be admitted as evidence or used in any suit or action for damages arising out of any matter mentioned in such report.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 12. Sections 9 and 10 of this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I support S. 796, a bill to authorize programs of the National Bureau of Standards [NBS] for fiscal year 1986.

The National Bureau of Standards is an agency with an extremely broad mission, relevant to nearly every national problem area and every economic sector. Many of us take for granted the measures, standards, and technologies developed at the Bureau which affect us daily.

For example, scientists at the Bureau developed an ultrasound device for identification of tumors which is significantly cheaper and safer than the use of most advanced x ray instruments; the Bureau first made it possible for radios to operate on household current; and the performance standards for flammability of children's sleepwear and for residential smoke detectors were developed by Bureau scientists. Of particular interest to my home State of Washington, the Center for Applied Mathematics at the Bureau developed several models for more efficient and economical fishery management for Washington State salmon fisheries along the Columbia River. These models continue to provide an intelligent basis for management of this scarce and precious natural resource.

Mr. President, we have examined closely the administration's budget for fiscal year 1986 for the Bureau. There are substantial budget decreases in that proposal, as well as several initiatives. In the National Engineering Laboratory, both the Center for Building Technology and the Center for Fire Research are proposed for elimination. In addition, the Institute for Computer Sciences and Technology is proposed for drastic reductions.

There are also new initiatives proposed at the Bureau, including: A role for the Bureau in the rapidly growing biotechnology field; construction of a cold neutron research facility; increased funding for process and quality control measurements; and funding for advanced ceramics research.

We have scrutinized carefully those proposed changes and assessed their effect on the future of the Bureau. S. 796 reflects our evaluation of the Bureau's programs and includes, among other programs, the restoration of the Centers for Fire Research and Building Technology, and of funding in full for the Institute for Computer Sciences and Technology. S. 796 contains funding for all the administration's initiatives except the construction of the Cold Neutron Research Facility. Although the committee feels that cold neutron is important to the Bureau's statutory mandate, it is not possible to eliminate important programs or to delay the beginning of other important initiatives to fund this project.

Mr. President, I would like to add that it is not the intention of section 12 of this bill to make an additional authorization of appropriations. Rather, it is anticipated that the functioning carried out pursuant to section 12 would be absorbed from existing appropriations to the National Bureau of Standards.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 796 be passed.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I express my strong support for S. 796, a bill to authorize programs of the National Bureau of Standards [NBS] for fiscal year 1986.

The National Bureau of Standards plays a central role in setting standards and measurements for both science and industry. Through its many programs the Bureau is making investments that will pay off with real dividends for our industrial and technological future. The Bureau also has a proven track record of professionalism in structural failures investigations. It has investigated tragedies such as the Hartford Civic Center roof collapse and the collapse of the cooling tower at Willow Island, WV. In 1981, at the request of Senator EAGLETON and me, the Bureau investigated the catastrophic skywalk collapse at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City, MO. The Bureau's investigation was thorough, professional, and efficient. Its report identified the cause of the accident, and has been credited with speeding the settlement of lawsuits in that case. S. 796 recognizes the important role the Bureau plays in examining structural failures and gives the Bureau formal statutory authority to investigate structural failures after consultation with local authorities. The reports from such investigations would serve to raise the standards of building safety codes.

I also support the amendment to this bill which would create a central repository for information on structural failures in this country. Access to this information will enable parties in the future to avoid the mistakes that have caused failures in the past.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my Commerce Committee colleagues in supporting this legislation.

S. 796 will reauthorize the National Bureau of Standards for another year. With today's strong global challenge to American industry, NBS becomes more important than ever. It gives industry many of the measurement tools and quality control methods needed to make our products and factories up to date and competitive.

This bill restores funding for three NBS programs that the Office of Management and Budget continually tries to eliminate, programs that I consider to be important investments in our future. These are the Center for Fire Research, an NBS laboratory that made modern smoke detectors possible; the Center for Building Technology, which helps to improve building materials and investigates major accidents such as the skywalk collapse at the Kansas City Hyatt Regency; and the Institute for Computer Sciences and Technology.

I find it sad, although not surprising, that OMB doesn't care about the thousands of American lives that are lost every year to fire or thousands who could die if we do not make our buildings more resistant to earthquakes and other hazards. To cut such programs is to be penny-wise and pound-foolish to the extreme.

The bill also contains funds for three new initiatives that I believe will greatly help American industry. The initiatives will develop new measurement techniques and process techniques for manufacturing quality control, advanced ceramics, and industrial applications of biotechnology. Unfortunately, though, the administration did not provide sufficient funds to pay for these important programs as well as its fourth requested initiative—a so-called cold neutron source to aid research on advanced materials.

Mr. President, the recent report of the Commission on Industrial Competitiveness reminds us again how technology is a central ingredient in America's industrial success. Our technological lead is under international challenge as never before. This bill, and the resulting work of the National Bureau of Standards, will help ensure that American industry has the technological tools it needs to stay competitive in today's world.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I understand that my distinguished colleagues from Montana and West Virginia both would like to discuss one part of the NBS bill.

Mr. BAUCUS. I would like to comment on the bill, Mr. President, and I thank the Senator from Washington for his courtesy.

I call my colleagues' attention to a new effort just starting at the Department of Commerce—an effort to provide high-quality translations of Japanese technical documents. I strongly support this new initiative and believe that it should be expanded and widely publicized.

In recent months, we have rightly called attention to the barriers that Japan has erected to many American products. But if we are to become more competitive with Japan, we must also get our own house in order.

Among other things, that means learning more about Japan and gaining more access to their technology. The Japanese Government and Japanese companies work very hard at learning American technology and taking advantage of it. They send students to our universities, and extensively review our technical literature. We should do the same thing. We should study their new technology, learn from it, and use it as they use ours.

Yet until very recently we have done little to translate key documents from Japan's extensive technical literature. Companies have not done much translation, because they lack the resources and incentives to translate most information. The Government has done very little in this area, despite the potential benefits to American companies.

Now, however, the National Bureau of Standards has begun a small program to translate Japanese technical documents, as well as some potentially useful Soviet materials. I believe that this effort deserves strong congressional support, and I for one would like to see it expanded and the results widely distributed to American companies. For a small investment, we could gain access to a great deal of valuable information.

Mr. President, we must learn to compete more effectively in the new international environment that confronts us. This translation effort is a small but very valuable step in the right direction.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I associate myself with Senator BAUCUS' remarks. As my colleagues may know, I studied the Japanese language and I majored in Asian studies while in college, and I still maintain a deep interest in the area.

I know from personal experience that Japanese is a very difficult language to learn. Yet we cannot expect to succeed in Asian business, or learn as much from the Japanese as they learn from us, unless we improve our language abilities. One useful step in this direction is to translate more of their technical literature and make that information available to American companies. As we all know, Japan no longer simply imitates American science and technology. They are now world-class researchers and innovators in their own right. They study our literature and use that information to improve their products. We must do more to gain access to their literature.

For that reason, I agree wholeheartedly with the Senator from Montana, and if I understand the position of the distinguished Senator from Washington, he shares my interest and Senator BAUCUS' interest in this important area.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I do share their interest in this subject. I am pleased that the National Bureau of Standards is taking steps in this direction, and I urge and expect the Commerce Department to continue these efforts.

AMENDMENT NO. 32

(Purpose: To assist creation and maintenance of data bases on structural failures)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of Mr. GORE and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], for Mr. GORE, proposes an amendment numbered 32.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In section 2, insert "(a)" immediately after "Sec. 2.", and add the following at the end:

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, of the total amount authorized under subsection (a) of this section, $50,000 is authorized only for the purpose of assisting the creation and maintenance of data bases on structural failures.".

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment to this bill to create a central repository for information on structural failures in this country.

Before my election to the Senate I served in the House of Representatives as chairman of the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight. In that capacity I held several hearings on the problem of structural failures and building collapses around the country. My colleagues may recall the great human suffering and economic loss that resulted from such catastrophes as the collapse of the walkway at the Kansas City Hyatt Regency Hotel in 1981 and the failure of the Hartford Civic Center's roof in 1978.

One conclusion drawn from those hearings is that there is a great need for some sort of central data bank for information on structural failures. Witness after witness testified that many future structural failures could be avoided if information on past failures was readily available. Although the causes of failures are often investigated by private parties involved in them, much too frequently the previous information gathered through these investigations is kept in private hands or even prevented from being made public because of settlement agreements in lawsuits. The only information that is available to the public is not organized in a comprehensive fashion to maximize its utility. As a result, many errors that led to failures are repeated in other projects.

The purpose of my amendment is to ensure that the data that is public is organized in a readily accessible fashion. Information that is gathered by the National Bureau of Standards through its investigations or which is provided by private sources will be compiled into one central repository. Access to this information will enable parties in the future to avoid the mistakes that have caused failures in the past.

The program that my amendment initiates is a very modest one in light of the gravity of the problem it is designed to address. The amendment simply creates a technical assistance function for the National Bureau of Standards and is in no way intended to establish a regulatory entity. I believe that it is a good effort and will be of tremendous assistance in the prevention of structural failures.

Mr. President, I thank Mr. DANFORTH, the distinguished chairman of the Commerce Committee, for his assistance in and support of my amendment. I also want to thank my good friend and colleague Mr. GORTON for his fine effort in presenting this legislation. I believe that with the addition of my amendment, this is an excellent bill. It accomplishes a number of commendable objectives and, importantly, restores funding for the Center for Building Technology and the Center for Fire Research at the National Bureau of Standards. I am a strong supporter of both of these centers, and their continuation demonstrates the commitment of this Congress to building safety across the country. I congratulate Mr. GORTON on the bill and voice my enthusiastic support for it.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Tessessee for lending us his experience in the House on this subject. I understand he has been looking at this issue of structural failures for some time. He has discussed this amendment with me, and I support the establishment of a repository of information on structural failures. I hope we can look at this subject more closely next year. In the meantime this amendment will help support efforts to collect information on structural failures and to make that information useful to the public.

I am happy to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 32) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. SIMPSON. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to Calendar item No. 86, H.R. 1617, the House companion bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the text of S. 796, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H.R. 1617), as amended, was passed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to indefinitely postpone S. 796.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF JEANNETTE RANKIN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having consulted with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration be discharged from further consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 37, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 37) providing for acceptance of a statue of Jeannette Rankin presented by the State of Montana for placement in National Statuary Hall, and for other purposes.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the Montana delegation is honored and proud, through this concurrent resolution, to present a statute of a Montana woman, Jeannette Rankin, the first woman elected to the U.S. Congress, to National Statuary Hall on behalf of the Treasure State.

Montana was nicknamed the Treasure State many years ago in reference to the natural treasures concealed beneath her surface. Her early settled history is the story of the search for and extraction of gold, silver, copper, lead and zinc, and later coal and oil. The town known as "Butte, America" sprawls over and around what once was "the richest hill on earth" and the center of an area that supplied half of the Nation's copper.

Then, as development continued, other treasures poured forth—millions of board feet of timber, herds of cattle, bands of sheep, tons of prairie gold better know as grain.

People over the years who have called Montana home enjoyed and continue to enjoy the splendor of the mountains creating the Continental Divide, the vast plains abundant with wildlife and the lakes and streams teeming with fish.

Montanans are thankful for the material riches that have blessed and continue to bless our State. But we are also mindful that the greatest of Montana's treasures has been her sons and daughters—people who have used their abilities, skills, determination, compassion and courage for the good of us all.

Jeannette Rankin was one of these treasures and with gratitude we honor her memory and point to her accomplishments as an incentive to all citizens.

AMENDMENT NO. 33

(Purpose: Relating to binding of document by Joint Committee on Printing)

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of Senator MATHIAS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], for Mr. MATHIAS, proposes an amendment numbered 33.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 16, strike out "Joint Committee on the Library" and insert in lieu thereof "Joint Committee on Printing".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 33) was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 37

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Jeannette Rankin, presented by the State of Montana for the National Statuary Hall collection in accordance with the provisions of section 1814 of the Revised Statutes (40 U.S.C. 187), is accepted in the name of the United States, and the thanks of the Congress are tendered to the State of Montana for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent personages, the first woman elected to the United States Congress, known for her courage and convictions regarding equality and peace.

SEC. 2. The State of Montana is authorized to place temporarily in the rotunda of the Capitol the statue of Jeannette Rankin referred to in the first section of this concurrent resolution, and to hold ceremonies on May 1, 1985, in the rotunda on that occasion. The Architect of the Capitol is authorized to make the necessary arrangements therefor.

SEC. 3. (a) The proceedings in the rotunda of the Capitol at the presentation by the State of Montana of the statue of Jeannette Rankin for the National Statuary Hall collection, together with appropriate illustrations and other pertinent matter, shall be printed as a Senate document. The copy for such document shall be prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library.

(b) There shall be printed five thousand additional copies of such document which shall be bound in such style as the Joint Committee on Printing shall direct, of which one hundred and three copies shall be for the use of the Senate and eighteen hundred and ninety-seven copies shall be for the use of the Members of the Senate from the State of Montana, and four hundred and sixty-three copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and two thousand five hundred and thirty-seven copies shall be for the use of the Members of the House of Representatives from the State of Montana.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the Governor of Montana.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, having consulted with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 45, to designate "National Child Safety Week," and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 45) to designate "National Child Safety Week".

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today we are considering a resolution to increase the public's awareness of the need for child safety. Originally Senate Joint Resolution 45 and its House counterpart House Joint Resolution 33 designated the week of September 8 through 14, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week." However, at the request of the White House and the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee [Mr. THURMOND], I have agreed to accept an amendment to my resolution which will redesignate the month of May 1985 as "National Child Safety Week."

This modification, to designate the full month of May as Child Safety Month, is particularly apt because it follows April as Sexual Child Abuse Month, it incorporates the date of May 25 which is Missing Children Day and it will begin almost immediately after the NBC reshowing of the television production of "Adam" which dramatizes the fight of Adam's parents, John and Reve Walsh, to channel their grief and frustration into positive action to help protect other children.

One of the most heartening developments during the 4 years since I first introduced S. 1351, the Missing Children Act, has been the willingness of individuals, organizations and corporations to dedicate their time and talents to protect our children. The National Center on Missing and Exploited Children has a directory listing over 70 nonprofit and public organizations that serve missing children and their families most of which are staffed by dedicated and talented volunteers. Numerous charitable and civic organizations, like the PTA, the Boys Club, the Campfire organization, the AARP, the Ad Council, and the American Legion, have incorporated child safety programs into their agenda.

But perhaps the most dramatic outpouring of concern over the plight of these children are the businesses and corporations that are joining forces to protect children. Groceries are printing pictures of missing children on their grocery bags, utilities are placing flyers of missing children in their monthly billings, the K-Mart Corp. is inserting pictures of missing children and safety tips into the approximately 43 million bags of photographs processed through their stores, cereal manufacturers are putting the McGruff child safety tips on the back of their children's cereal boxes, truckers are displaying pictures of missing children on their trucks, the National Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse working in conjunction with the NEA and Marvel Comics developed an excellent Spiderman comic book which teaches children about sexual child abuse, dairies are putting pictures of the children on their milk cartons, and corporations like Mobil Oil and Acacia Life Insurance are underwriting television programming regarding child safety.

Mr. President, this is only a partial listing of the individuals, organizations, and businesses that have dedicated their time and talents to protect children. I hope to draw the public's attention to these efforts throughout the month of May, which hopefully will be designated as "National Child Safety Month."

Mr. President, I want to thank Senator THURMOND, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, for his interest and advocacy on behalf of children. Senator THURMOND has been a champion of children throughout his Senate career and has played a crucial role in the enactment of the Missing Children Act, the Missing Children's Assistance Act, the reauthorization of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention and other Federal programs affecting children. I am delighted to accept his amendment to expand National Child Safety Week to the full month of May.

AMENDMENT NO. 34

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute, on behalf of Senator THURMOND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], for Mr. THURMOND, proposes an amendment numbered 34.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimus consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike all after the title and insert in lieu thereof:

Whereas more than 1.5 million children have been reported missing in the United States;

Whereas many of these children are never found;

Whereas missing children are often innocent victims of physical and sexual abuse;

Whereas many local volunteer groups already are working enthusiastically to promote child safety;

Whereas the Missing Children Act and the Missing Children's Assistance Act have facilitated the investigation and prosecution of crimes involving missing and exploited children;

Whereas there is now a national clearinghouse, The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and a toll-free hotline to centralize the efforts to locate missing children;

Whereas The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children provides educational child safety materials and information about identificaion procedures, such as voluntary fingerprinting, dental charting and photographing of children;

Whereas information received through the toll-free hotline is disseminated to appropriate law enforcement agencies;

Whereas the protection, safety, and security of all children should be one of our highest priorities;

Whereas it is essential that we continue to increase public awareness and provide information and assistance to combat and prevent the increasing problem of missing and exploited children:

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May, 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month" and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate programs, activities, and ceremonies for the better protection, security, and safety of all children.

Amend the title so as to read: "Designating the month of May, 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute to Senate Joint Resolution 45, to designate "National Child Safety Week." This amendment is identical to Senate Joint Resolution 110, which I introduced on April 16, 1985. Senate Joint Resolution 110 designates the entire month of May 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month."

More than 1.5 million children have been reported missing in the United States. Many of these children may never be found; many may become the innocent victims of physical and/or sexual abuse, as portrayed in the television drama "Adam," which will be aired again on April 29.

The beginning of a national, coordinated effort to combat this problem took place in the 97th Congress with the passage of the Missing Children Act. This was continued during the final days of the 98th Congress, when the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-473), containing the Missing Children's Assistance Act, was passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by President Reagan. Both of these measures have facilitated the investigation and prosecution of crimes involving missing and exploited children and the identification of deceased missing children.

In addition, there is now a national clearinghouse, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and a toll-free hotline to centralize the efforts to locate missing children. The toll-free number is available for information about, and inquiries regarding missing children. The information received through the hotline is disseminated to appropriate law enforcement agencies. The National Center provides other assistance, such as educational child safety literature and materials about identification procedures, to help combat the tragedy of missing children. These national efforts supplement those of States like South Carolina, which have made preventive efforts a high priority.

Much more needs to be done. Establishing "Child Safety Awareness Month" will bring nationwide attention to the problem of missing and exploited children. During this month, attention should be focused on preventive programs—voluntary fingerprinting, dental charting, obtaining hair samples, photographing, and compiling vital statistics of children. President Reagan recently highlighted such efforts during his appearance at the Ringling Brothers-Barnum & Bailey Circus here in Washington. Involving parents, children, volunteer groups, and whole communities will aid State and national law enforcement officials in locating missing children.

The protection, safety, and security of all children should be one of our highest priorities. They are our greatest national resource and the future of our country. I want to commend Senator PAULA HAWKINS for her devoted efforts in this area, and Congressman TOM LEWIS, whose companion measure will be considered immediately after Senate Joint Resolution 45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 34) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 33, to designate "National Child Safety Week" which is being held at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legistative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week".

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to strike all after the title and insert the text of Senate Joint Resolution 45 as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 33) was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The title, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to indefinitely postpone Senate Joint Resolution 45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The minority leader is recognized.

HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE FOR NICARAGUAN RESISTANCE FORCES

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution on humanitarian assistance for Nicaraguan resistance forces and ask that it be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution is as follows:

S.J. RES. 120

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the prohibitions contained in section 8066 of Public Law 98-473 and in section 801 of Public Law 98-618 shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 2. During Fiscal Year 1985, not more than $14,000,000 may be expended for the provision of food, clothing, medicine and other humanitarian assistance to resistance forces which are opposed to the present government in Nicaragua: Provided, however:

(a) Such assistance is provided in a manner such that the nature and extent of such assistance is independently monitored;

(b) The United States resumes bilateral negotiations with the government of Nicaragua; and

(c) The government of Nicaragua and resistance forces which are opposed to the government of Nicaragua each agree to institute a cease-fire.

SEC. 3. In the event the government of Nicaragua refuses to enter into a mutual cease-fire, the humanitarian assistance described in Section 2 may be provided, subject to the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of Section 2.

SEC. 4. In the event a mutual cease-fire described in Section 2(c) is seriously or substantially violated by resistance forces opposed to the government of Nicaragua, no humanitarian assistance described in Section 2 may thereafter be provided: Provided, however, That if the government of Nicaragua has earlier, and seriously or substantially, violated such cease-fire, this prohibition shall not apply.

SEC. 5. (a) The $14,000,000 described in Section 2 may be provided only:

(i) By the Department of State;

(ii) From funds previously appropriated to the Department of State; and

(iii) Upon a determination by the Secretary of State that the assistance described in Section 2 is necessary to meet the humanitarian needs of resistance forces opposing the government of Nicaragua.

(b) Not later than September 1, 1985, the President shall submit to the Congress a written report which contains an accounting of all funds expended under Section 2.

SEC. 6. The assistance described in Section 2 may be provided only in the form of goods and services, and no direct or indirect financial assistance may be provided.

SEC. 7. No assistance may be provided by the United States to resistance forces opposed to the government of Nicaragua except as authorized and for the purpose described in Section 2, and no funds may be used to provide the assistance described in Section 2 except as provided in Section 5.

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States should encourage and support the efforts of the Contadora nations (Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela) to negotiate and conclude an agreement based upon the Contadora Document of objectives of September 9, 1983.

SEC. 9. (a) In the event that less than $14 million is expended for the humanitarian assistance described in Section 2, the remainder of such amount and any necessary additional funds may be made available for payment to the Contadora nations for expenses arising from implementation of the agreement described in Section 8 including peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems: Provided, however, That in the event $14 milion is expended for the humanitarian assistance described in Section 2, other funds may be made available for payment of such expenses.

(b) Any funds made available for the purpose described in subsection (a) may be provided from funds previously appropriated to the Department of State.

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States should immediately enter into discussions with allies of the United States concerning possible economic sanctions which may be taken with respect to the Nicaraguan government, as provided in Section 11.

SEC. 11. In the event that, following the resumption of the bilateral negotiations described in Section 2(b), the government of Nicaragua is not negotiating in good faith, the President may request the Congress to authorize economic sanctions. Such a request shall be accompanied by a report on the status of such negotiations, which shall contain a certification by the President that the government of Nicaragua is not negotiating in good faith and a description of the facts and circumstances upon which such certification is based. A request submitted to the Congress under this Section shall be handled by the Congress under the provisions of Section 13.

SEC. 12. The President may request the Congress to authorize additional assistance for resistance forces opposed to the government of Nicaragua, in such amount and of such a nature as he deems appropriate, including economic sanctions with respect to the government of Nicaragua, in the event that:

(a) The government of Nicaragua refuses to resume the bilateral negotiations with the United States which are described in Section 2(b); or

(b) Following an agreement between the government of Nicaragua and the United States to resume the bilateral negotiations which are described in Section 2(b), the government of Nicaragua refuses to enter into the mutual cease-fire which is described in Section 2(c).

A request submitted to the Congress under this section shall be handled by the Congress under the provisions of Section 13.

SEC. 13. (a) A joint resolution which is introduced within 3 calendar days after the Congress receives a Presidential request described in Section 11 or 12 and which, if enacted, would grant the President the authority to take any or all of the actions described in such Sections, shall be considered in accordance with procedures contained in Section 8066 of Public Law 98-473: Provided, however, That—

(i) References in that Section to the Committee on Appropriations of each House shall be deemed to be references to the appropriate committee or committees of each House; and

(ii) Amendments to the joint resolution are in order.

(b) This Section is enacted by Congress as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, and as such it is deemed a part of the rules of each House, respectively, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in that House in the case of a resolution described in subsection (a), and it supersedes other rules only to the extent that it is inconsistent with such rules; and

(c) With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change the rules (so far as relating to the procedure of that House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of that House.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 977. A bill to establish the Hennepin Canal National Heritage Corridor in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HENNEPIN CANAL NATIONAL HERITAGE CORRIDOR ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today my colleague Senator SIMON and I are introducing legislation to establish the Hennepin Canal National Heritage Corridor. This will give national recognition to the Hennepin Canal State trail in the State of Illinois.

This project is not only an important and innovative project for my State and its local area but also for the Nation.

In recognition of its heritage and significance as a cultural resource, the majority of the canal is now listed on the National Register of Historic Places as a National Historic District. Today, as a popular recreational corridor featuring trail and water base opportunities, it annually attracts a third of a million visitors.

Situated in rural northwestern Illinois, the canal is a T-shaped, manmade waterway corridor some 96 miles in length, becoming the natural connection between the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers. Formally known as the Illinois and Mississippi Canal, it was built by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers between 1890 and 1907, was operated for navigation as a component of our inland waterway system until 1951, and was conveyed to the Department of Conservation of the State of Illinois for recreational use in 1970.

A national designation would recognize the area's significance to our Nation's history. Implementing the plan will be a partnership of local and State interests—historical societies, industrialists, conservation and recreation groups and State and local governments.

Last year, Representative LANE EVANS appointed a 13-member Citizens Task Force on the Hennepin Canal, consisting of individuals representing historic and environmental preservation, recreation, tourism, economic development, agricultural, business, and labor. Representative EVANS charged the task force with recommending the best way to preserve and redevelop the canal for recreational use, with an eye toward local economic benefits. It is my hope that we can all continue to work together to make this project a reality.

The Hennepin, although somewhat physically modified, remains essentially intact, providing a unique case study of America's historic canals. The technology has provided a basis for more modern waterways.

The Hennepin Canal covers 4 counties and 21 civil townships in northern Illinois. Although adjacent land use is predominantly agricultural, numerous urban communities of varying size also dot the canal corridor. The canal is readily accessible to both local and regional populations via a well-developed highway network. A number of public and private entities in the canal area provide additional outdoor recreational opportunities.

On August 1, 1970, the State of Illinois assumed full ownership of the Hennepin Canal, and has since operated it primarily under the jurisdiction of the Department of Conservation, as a recreational corridor affording a variety of water and trail-related outdoor recreational opportunities. The redevelopment of the canal continued through mutual efforts of the Department of Conservation and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Current usage of the canal includes such activities as sport fishing, pleasure boating, nature studying, and camping. All of these, in conjunction with an abundance of natural habitat and beauty, will provide an attraction for new businesses, tourism, and recreational activities. Image and quality of life are among major considerations for industries staying in an area or moving into a locality.

National recognition is important to the project for the prominence that a national designation can bring to the area. The Nation should be proud to have a place of such historic meaning, natural beauty, and community commitment. Designation as a national heritage corridor is an appropriate step to take.

The project has the support of the State of Illinois, the people who reside along the 96 miles of the canal, businesses in the area and historic preservation and recreation groups, all of whom will be lending a hand in various efforts—financial, technical, and physical—to establish this area as a model for others to follow.

We are pleased to sponsor this legislation. It is an example of what cooperation by mutual, diverse interests can do to improve a region.

A companion bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative LANE EVANS, and cosponsored by the entire Illinois congressional delegation.

I hope the Senate will give the matter expeditious and favorable consideration.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 978. A bill to designate the building known as the Federal building in Salt Lake City, UT, as the "Wallace F. Bennett Federal Building"; to the Committee on environment and Public Works.

WALLACE F. BENNETT FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a bill designating the Federal building at 125 South State Street, Salt Lake City, UT, as the "Wallace F. Bennett Federal Building."

During his 24 years as a U.S. Senator, Wallace Bennett served the people of his State and our entire Nation with distinction and fidelity. He served with a reputation for absolute integrity, human decency, and unusual ability as a legislator. He was first elected to the Senate in 1959, which, incidentally, was the only elective public office he ever sought or held. Because of his service and patriotism, the people of Utah reelected him three times, and he served during the administrations of six U.S. Presidents.

Mr. Bennett has also been a successful businessman. In fact, he served a term as president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Mr. Bennett was the ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, and Senior Republican on the Senate Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee. He served as secretary of the Senate Republican Conference, vice chairman of the Senate Ethics Committee, and a member of the Joint Committees on Atomic Energy, Defense Production, and Internal Revenue Taxation. In addition, he was the second ranking minority member of the Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee. He also worked diligently as a member of the Senate Select Committee on Standards and Conduct.

Senator Bennett worked on legislation that created the Colorado River storage project, credit union insurance, and various professional standards review organizations. One of Mr. Bennett's colleagues, Paul J. Fannin, stated: "No man better represents these people and this heritage than the senior Senator from Utah, Wallace Bennett."

Another colleague, Senator EDWARD KENNEDY, stated that Bennett had outstanding abilities, "especially in his mastery of the details of the complex tax and economic legislation that he so often handled so well on the Senate floor." Mr. Bennett has clearly had a lasting impact on the tax and financial policies of this country.

Mr. Bennett is the father of the PSRO [professional standards review organization], a concept of peer review of medical care which was enacted in 1972 and which is now operational in many parts of the country.

His 24-year term of service is the second longest in the history of Utah, and he is the first popularly elected Utah Senator to retire from office voluntarily. His staff were witnesses to his concern for our country, a concern which exceeds his concern for himself.

His life is a chronology of achievement and service to his State, Nation, church, and fellow men. Of course, much of his personal success could not have been accomplished without the help of his wife, Frances Grant Bennett. Because of Bennett's devotion and service to his State and Nation, it is singularly apporpriate that this Federal building in Salt Lake City be named in his honor. Funds for this Federal building were appropriated by the Congress during the term when Wallace Bennett was serving as our Senator. He worked hard to get this building built; and, as a fitting tribute to his service, naming this building in his honor seems entirely proper. I ask my colleagues in the Senate and House to join me in supporting this measure.

By Mr. McCLURE:

S. 979. A bill to extend the expiration date of titles I and II of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ENERGY POLICY AND CONSERVATION AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today I introduce S. 979, the Energy Policy and Conservation Amendments Act of 1985. This bill would extend until June 30, 1989, two statutory authorities that are integral to the U.S. capability to respond domestically and internationally to a severe energy supply interruption.

The strategic petroleum reserve is the key element of the U.S. capability to respond to domestic and international energy supply emergencies. The reserve provides our Nation with substantial insurance against the possibility of a severe energy supply interruption.

This measure extends until June 30, 1989, existing authorities to create, maintain, and drawdown the strategic petroleum reserve; these authorities in title I of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act would otherwise expire on June 30, 1985. Among other matters, these provisions authorize construction of the strategic petroleum reserve. In addition, they provide Presidential authority to drawdown the reserve in the event of a severe energy supply disruption or to meet U.S. obligations under the International Energy Program.

Another key component of the U.S. energy emergency preparedness program is maintaining a continuing commitment to the International Energy Program. Effective U.S. participation in the International Energy Agency assures mutual preparedness in the event of a severe international energy supply interruption. We are fully aware of the mutual interdependence of the energy security of the free world. This bill also extends until June 30, 1989, the basic authorities which facilitate U.S. participation in the International Energy Program; these authorities in title II of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act would otherwise expire on June 30, 1985. Among other matters, these authorities enable the United States to make information available to the IEA which is necessary to its effective operation and to enable U.S. oil companies to share oil voluntarily under the IEA's emergency sharing system.

These are essential authorities needed by the administration to prepare for and respond to severe energy emergencies as well as meet its obligations under the international energy agreement. Therefore, it is critical that they be expeditiously extended and not become embroiled in other issues.

For example, during the last Congress the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources devoted extensive time to consideration of complementary authorities that would strengthen our Nation's energy emergency preparedness consistent with the policy set forth in section 271(b) of EPCA, which established the policy that:

> The Federal Government shall be prepared prior to any shortage of petroleum products to respond to energy emergencies * * * as a supplement to reliance on the free market to mitigate the adverse impacts of a shortage of petroleum products on public health, safety, and welfare.

I continue to believe that energy emergency preparedness requires continuous upgrading and improvement; however, I do not see any agreement with the administration on what those improvements should be, if any. In addition, there are those who want the Federal Government to be even less obviously involved in the event of an energy emergency. In the absence of agreement on additional energy-emergency measures, this measure would simply extend the existing authorities I have described.

Our country's energy emergency preparedness relies on titles I and II of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act. Without these fundamental authorities the evolutionary process for upgrading and improving our national capability to respond to severe energy supply interruptions would be nonexistent.

Now is not the time, Mr. President, to debate whether there should be a reduction or expansion of Federal energy emergency preparedness authorities. People would be advised not to open up that box, but rather provide for a simple extension of EPCA.

I wish, at this time, Mr. President, to announce a hearing on the Energy Policy and Conservation Amendments Act of 1985 before the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on May 1, 1985. Inquiries should be directed to Richard D. Grundy, senior professional staff member, at 224-2564.●

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. WARNER, Mr. GRAMM, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 980. A bill to amend title I of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today, along with Senators D'AMATO, WARNER, GRAMM, and RIEGLE, I am introducing legislation to continue certain small cities in the Community Development Block Grant [CDBG] Program at least through the next census. These cities are now scheduled to lose their CDBG entitlement status at the end of this fiscal year as a result of an arbitrary administrative procedure.

Our proposal amounts to a modest reallocation of CDBG funding of about $8 million per year—out of a program total of $3.5 billion—so that 18 small communities can continue to receive funding which is both needed and justified. No new funding would be required, and funding reductions for other entitlement communities would be negligible.

The cities affected by this bill are: Hopewell, VA; Cape Coral and Cocoa, FL; West Lafayette, IN; Muskegon Heights, Norton Shores, and Portage, MI; Moss Point, MS; Concord and Salisbury, NC; Asbury Park, Long Branch, and Sayreville, NJ; Middletown and Newburgh, NY; and Orange, San Benito, and Pharr, TX.

As a result of an arbitrary administrative procedure, these needy small cities have been disqualified as central cities of metropolitan statistical areas, and have therefore been disqualified as entitlement communities under the CDBG Program. Under our proposal, these communities would continue to receive CDBG funding at least until the next decennial census is completed.

We are making this proposal, Mr. President, because these needy communities are being harmed by an arbitrary Federal administrative procedure used to define and determine metropolitan statistical areas, and because this situation contradicts the intent of the housing and community development laws to help needy communities. Let me explain by providing some background.

Prior to the last census, a Federal task force developed criteria and procedures for redefining standard metropolitan statistical areas. During the census, commuter surveys were also conducted to determine where people worked, lived, and traveled within large metropolitan areas. The task force report redefining metropolitan areas developed a new system for classifying cities and regions as metropolitan statistical areas, consolidated statistical areas, and primary statistical areas.

In this process, new metropolitan areas were defined, several metro areas were renamed—and some cities dropped from central city status—and consolidated and primary areas were delineated. These changes were announced in June 1983, and have not been reviewed by the Senate Banking Committee.

As a result of this announcement, 19 cities were dropped as central cities of SMSA's and thereby lost CDBG entitlement status. They cannot regain their lost status and funding until after the next decennial census.

Unfortunately, this result was unjustified. The situation is well illustrated by the position of Hopewell, in my own State of Virginia. I am assured that Hopewell's case is typical of the other small cities previously mentioned.

Because of the census, Hopewell—previously in the Hopewell/Petersburg/Colonial Heights metropolitan area—became part of a new statistical area centered on Richmond, VA. Since Hopewell is not at least one-third the size of Richmond in population, and since too many Hopewell workers have to commute to jobs in Richmond and Petersburg because of depressed local conditions, Hopewell was suddenly disqualified as an SMSA central city, and suddenly lost CDBG entitlement funding which it had received since 1974.

This is a bizarre result, Mr. President, because Hopewell is a very distressed community; in fact, Hopewell has been identified as my State's most fiscally distressed community by the Virginia General Assembly. It is clear to me that communities like Hopewell should not be punished by a loss of CDBG funding just because there aren't enough jobs locally and residents must commute elsewhere to find work. Yet this is the strange result of applying the 1980 census commuter data in the case at hand.

We need to direct community development grant funds to needy communities like Hopewell, not to communities that meet some arbitrary statistical estimate of centrality.

As recipients of CDBG funds, Hopewell and the other cities mentioned have demonstrated a strong record of performance. Their programs help low- and moderate-income residents of these cities by providing needed streets, sewers, and other community facilities. They have not used CDBG funds to add municipal employees to the payroll or to provide frills. And they are needy: 11 of the cities I have mentioned meet UDAG distress criteria, for example.

I hope that other Senators will agree that it makes no sense to cut off their CDBG funding.

By Mr. MATHIAS (for himself, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. TRIBLE):

S. 981. A bill to provide that section 103(h) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not apply to any obligation issued to finance certain solid waste disposal facilities; to the Committee on Finance.

SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL UNITS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the measure I am introducing today along with my colleagues from Maryland and Virginia seeks a congressional clarification of the tax-exempt bond section of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 so that it is correctly applied to two waste-to-energy projects in the State of Maryland.

The two projects are the Harford County/Aberdeen Proving Ground and city of Annapolis/U.S. Naval Academy facilities. The Northeast Maryland Waste Disposal Authority, a single-purpose, independent public authority, has developed these projects to provide long-term solutions to the solid waste disposal problems in several Maryland jurisdictions and to provide an equally long-term source of energy to the two military installations. The authority is currently operating a very successful similar facility for the city of Baltimore.

Military procurement laws in recent years have reflected Congress' intent that third party financing and ownership of energy facilities be encouraged and that directed Federal appropriations be used only as a last resort. The Harford County and Annapolis projects have been through the bargaining process with the military services, but the benefits to all the parties cannot be realized unless the overly restrictive interpretation of these projects by the Treasury Department is changed.

The problem the authority is encountering concerns the view that a contract to provide energy to the military bases would constitute a Federal guarantee. These contracts would not be a guarantee because the authority assumes the financial, technological and operating risks. Under the 1984 tax act's special service contract rule for solid waste disposal facilities, the service recipient cannot bear significant financial risks. The two projects intend to comply fully with this requirement.

To finance successfully the Harford County and Annapolis facilities, Congress must clarify that it did not intend for the Federal guarantee provisions to apply in these two instances. I hope the Congress can act quickly on this bill so these two important projects can go forward.

A companion bill is being introduced in the other body by Representatives ROY DYSON, HELEN BENTLEY, and MARJORIE HOLT.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

S. 981

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CERTAIN OBLIGATIONS USED TO FINANCE SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL FACILITIES NOT TREATED AS FEDERALLY GUARANTEED.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Any obligation which is part of an issue a substantial portion of the proceeds of which are to be used to finance a solid waste disposal facility described in subsection (c) shall not, for purposes of section 103(h)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, be treated as an obligation which is federally guaranteed.

(b) LIMITATION ON DOLLAR AMOUNT.—The aggregate face amount of obligations to which subsection (a) applies with respect to any State shall not exceed $65,000,000.

(c) SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL FACILITIES TO WHICH SECTION APPLIES.—A solid waste disposal facility is described in this subsection if such facility is described in section 103(b)(4)(E) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and—

(1) a public State authority created pursuant to State legislation which took effect on July 1, 1980, took formal action before October 19, 1983, to commit development funds for such facility;

(2) such authority issues obligations for such facility before January 1, 1988; and

(3) expenditures have been made for the development of such facility before October 19, 1983.

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am today joining my colleague from Maryland in introducing legislation to clarify that a "Federal guarantee" provision in the tax-exempt bond sections of the Deficit Reduction Tax Act of 1984 should not apply to the financing of two waste-to-energy facilities in Maryland. Both of these facilities will be financed by the Northeast Maryland Waste Disposal Authority, a public instrumentality of the State of Maryland formed on July 1, 1980, in order to develop regional solid waste disposal projects. The facilities will provide much-needed solid waste disposal in an environmentally sound manner, and at the same time will provide the military with an assured supply of energy. It is estimated that the two projects will save over 6.5 million gallons of fuel oil each year as a result of their use of steam generated from municipal solid waste.

Over the past 4 years, the authority has expended approximately $1.1 million to develop these two waste-to-energy projects. One will be located in Harford County, MD. It will provide Harford County and Aberdeen Proving Ground with a long-term solution to their solid waste disposal problems and will produce steam for sale to the Army, pursuant to a long-term contract. The other project, located in Annapolis, MD, will provide waste disposal for the city of Annapolis, Anne Arundel County, Queen Annes County, and the Naval Academy, and provide the Naval Academy with a reliable source of steam.

A question has arisen as to whether these energy facilities are eligible for financing with industrial development bonds. The question stems from a provision in the recently enacted tax legislation prohibiting the use of IDB's in situations where the payment of principal or interest on the bond is guaranteed by the Federal Government. This provision was meant to eliminate a double subsidy, so to speak, in cases where the Federal Government assumes a risk to protect investors.

However, in the case of these two projects, in my view the long-term steam purchase contracts should not be construed to constitute a "Federal guarantee." In the case of these projects, a service and a product is to be provided to the Government. The contracts give no protection to the investors should the projects fail to perform. The contract does not contain "hell or high water" provisions which require Government payments even if a facility is not built or energy is not available. Nor is a special bond class created or do the bonds receive a higher credit rating than they otherwise would receive because the facility has entered into a long-term contract with a Federal facility.

Despite these reasons, and despite the fact that the development of these projects was well underway prior to the passage of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, they have been brought virtually to a halt by the questions raised about the tax-exempt status of bonds to be issued to finance their construction.

The Congress should rectify this as soon as possible, and I urge the Senate Finance Committee to consider this legislation quickly. In my view, these projects represent sound energy policy and sound solid waste disposal policy; and notwithstanding any debate on the question of IDB's in general, the Congress should clarify this matter so that these projects, so long in the making, can proceed.●

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. COHEN, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. BUMPERS):

S. 982. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 regarding international trade in softwood lumber, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

WOOD PRODUCTS TRADE ACT

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, along with Senators PRYOR, MITCHELL, COHEN, THURMOND, and BUMPERS, that deals with the problem of rising imports of subsidized Canadian softwood lumber.

In a nutshell, the legislation gives Canada 1 year to eliminate its unfair softwood lumber stumpage pricing practices or to otherwise reduce its softwood lumber imports into the United States. If Canada refuses, the legislation retaliates two ways: By imposing a temporary 10-percent tariff increase and by revising our countervailing duty law to make clear that Canada's unfair stumpage practices are illegal subsidies.

Let me explain why this legislation is necessary.

THE TRADE PROBLEM

In today's hyper-competitive world, a nation's trade performance may be the best indication of its fundamental economic strength.

If that's true, we're in trouble, because America's trade performance has never been worse.

Over the past 5 years, our trade deficit has quadrupled. Last year, it was $123 billion. This year, it probably will be even larger.

This deficit is not just an abstract statistic for economists to debate. It represents the shift of millions of jobs from the United States to foreign countries. This shift has affected communities in every State, whether they're losing export sales in foreign markets or losing out to imports here at home.

There are many reasons for our huge trade deficits. One is the high value of the dollar. Another is some American companies' failure to aggressively adapt to foreign competition.

But one of the main reasons is unfair foreign trade practices. America has tried to achieve free trade by example. At the same time, other countries have adopted a kind of "new mercantalism," protecting their own domestic markets while subsidizing the invasion of ours.

Recently, Congress has begun focusing on this problem and adopting a tougher, more pragmatic approach. For example, we have taken steps to force Japan to open its markets.

But our problem is not just with Japan. It is with our other major trading partners as well, including the EC, Canada, and the ASEAN countries.

TRADE WITH CANADA

The legislation I am introducing today relates to Canada.

Mr. President, Canada, not Japan, is our major trading partner. Last year, the United States and Canada traded $120 billion worth of goods; Canada was our largest export customer and import supplier, and we were theirs. Unfortunately, we had a $20 billion bilateral trade deficit with Canada. To put this deficit in perspective, it is over twice as large, on a per capita basis, as our bilateral deficit with Japan.

Given the huge volume of United States-Canada trade and our rising bilateral deficit, problems are inevitable. A few weeks ago in Quebec, President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney resolved some of our recent trade problems. Unresolved, however, was the problem that threatens to dwarf all the others: Softwood lumber.

THE SOFTWOOD LUMBER PROBLEM

The U.S. forest products industry is the most productive in the world. Nevertheless, the industry has become a victim of the trade war.

On one hand, we're losing our natural export markets to unfair foreign barriers like Japan's huge tariffs.

On the other hand, we're losing our domestic market to rising Canadian imports.

In 1984, housing starts continued to rise and U.S. lumber consumption reached its highest level ever. Nevertheless, the U.S. lumber industry continued to suffer economic hard times, sustaining pre-tax losses of over $300 million and operating at only about 80 percent of capacity. As Scott Shotwell of the National Forest Products Association recently said:

> U.S. producers have not been able to benefit from the economic recovery. Mills are closing and thousands of U.S. lumber jobs have been lost. And this at a time when housing starts are in the range of 1.7-1.8 million. In the past, this number of housing starts caused our industry to boom; instead, we are going bust.

Unfortunately, 1984 was not an aberration, but only the continuation of an alarming trend. Over the past decade, Canadian lumber imports have increased from 17 to 31 percent of total softwood consumption. Since 1980, the U.S. lumber industry has lost more than 30,000 jobs, of which 22,000 can be attributed to increased Canadian lumber imports.

One might reasonably ask how the Canadians can achieve such a commanding position in the U.S. lumber market, especially since U.S. producers are generally more efficient, have comparable or lower wage rates, and are much closer to their local markets than Canadian producers are.

One major reason is the over-valued dollar. Yesterday, the U.S. dollar was worth about 26-percent more than the Canadian dollar, effectively giving every Canadian forest products company an automatic 25-percent subsidy.

Another major reason is the cheap price of Canadian stumpage—the right to cut timber on government-owned land.

The Canadian federal and provincial governments generally play a more active economic role than the U.S. Federal and State governments; for example, the OECD reports that Canadian subsidies constituted 2.34 percent of Canadian GDP in 1979, while U.S. subsidies constituted only 0.43 percent of U.S. GDP.

This general difference is reflected in the different United States and Canadian stumpage pricing systems.

In the United States the price of stumpage is determined in an open auction or through sealed bids.

In Canada, the federal or provincial government sets the price administratively, at artificially low prices that keep mills operating and workers employed. A professor at the University of British Columbia recently concluded that, in the United States, public agencies—

> Encourage competitive bidding for standing timber whereas in British Columbia, competitive sales for standing timber have been virtually eliminated.

These differences have a significant impact. As Montana State University's Forty-Ninth Parallel Institute recently said, "the end result of the two strikingly different methods has been that Canadian producers have traditionally paid a lower stumpage fee than U.S. firms, allowing them to reduce overall production costs." Indeed, a 1982

International Trade Commission study found that Canadian stumpage prices were about one-sixth of U.S. prices.

THE 1983 DECISION

Shortly after the ITC study was released, a coalition of U.S. softwood lumber producers filed a petition alleging that numerous Canadian Government programs—British Columbia stumpage pricing being by far the most important—were trade subsidies causing serious injury to the American industry.

Eventually, the Commerce Department rejected the petition, bending over backward to conclude that Canadian stumpage technically is not a subsidy within the meaning of our countervailing duty law.

More specifically, the Commerce Department said that Canadian stumpage programs are theoretically "generally available," and, therefore, are not domestic subsidies because the only thing that limits the use of stumpage programs is the inherent characteristics of the natural resource, logs. But under this logic, no natural resource subsidy would ever be countervailable because the use of every natural resource is limited only by the inherent characteristics of the resource.

This is silly enough, but Commerce went on to say that Canadian stumpage programs are in fact generally available because at least three different groups of industries benefit from the program. These different groups of industries were the lumber and wood products industries, the pulp and paper industries, and the furniture manufacturing industry. Under this logic, no domestic subsidy will be considered to be counteravailable unless it is used only by tiny classes of producers, such as chair producers or table producers or 2×4 producers or 2×6 producers. To my mind, Congress did not intend so narrow a definition when we enacted the domestic subsidy provisions in 1979.

Another aspect of the Commerce decision was disturbing. As an alternative holding, Commerce concluded that the prices paid for stumpage in British Columbia are reasonable and reflect the true market value for stumpage—in other words, that the British Columbia stumpage program is not a subsidy. This is nonsense. In 1984, the average price for stumpage on Federal lands in the Western United States was $62 (U.S. dollars); in Interior British Columbia it was $1. The trees are the same; they are cut the same way, processed the same way, and sold in the same market. If such cheap stumpage is not a subsidy for purposes of our countervailing duty law, then I don't know why we have such a law at all.

THE WOOD PRODUCTS TRADE ACT

Mr. President, the Commerce Department's decision has forced us to consider other ways to deal with the Canadian softwood lumber problem.

One way is negotiation. On February 26, United States and Canadian negotiators began discussions of bilateral forest products trade problems, including the stumpage problem. Unfortunately, during these negotiations, which resume tomorrow, the Canadians have not been willing to seriously consider eliminating their stumpage subsidy.

Another way is legislation. That is why I am introducing the "Wood Products Trade Act," which is similar to legislation Congressman BONKER recently introduced in the House, H.R. 1648.

The legislation is designed to encourage a negotiated settlement of the softwood lumber imports dispute.

To accomplish this, the legislation establishes a 1-year negotiating period, starting when the United States-Canadian forest products negotiations began on February 26, and gives the President the authority to negotiate a voluntary restraint agreement or an elimination of Canadian stumpage subsidies.

If the negotiations succeed, the legislation would be superseded by legislation implementing the agreement and, therefore, have no effect.

But if the negotiations do not succeed, the ax will fall. Specifically, the legislation will impose two restrictions. First, the legislation will "unbind" the current zero tariff on softwood lumber and replace it with a 3-year 10 percent tariff.

Second, the legislation will revise the definition of "domestic subsidy," for purposes of U.S. countervailing duty law, to clarify that a foreign stumpage price is subsidized if it is below the comparable U.S. price. This would have the practical effect of overruling the 1983 Commerce Department decision.

If the negotiations succeed after restrictions are imposed, the restrictions could be lifted by the legislation implementing the negotiated agreement.

This approach has three advantages: First, it gives the negotiations a chance to succeed and gives the Canadians an incentive to make them succeed. Second, it is consistent with U.S. obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and other international agreements. Third, it gets at the real problem—the cheap stumpage subsidy.

Even so, this legislation is not perfect. Several of its provisions may need to be refined. For example, it may be appropriate to make the revised subsidy provision generic—along the lines of the natural resource subsidy provisions of last year's House version of the omnibus trade bill—rather than tied to specific U.S. prices. I am currently reviewing such potential revisions and welcome any suggestions my colleagues have. But whatever specific language we decide upon, one thing is clear. We need to revise the countervailing duty law so that cheap Canadian stumpage is treated in law as what it is in fact: a trade subsidy.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, the U.S. forest products industry has always favored free trade and had a close relationship with the Canadian industry. Now, that relationship is strained by Canada's cheap stumpage system and the rising imports it generates. I hope that we can resolve this issue during the current negotiations. Otherwise, this festering problem could undermine overall United States-Canadian relations. That would be unfortunate indeed, especially at a time when our countries may be on the verge of considering a comprehensive free trade agreement.

The best way to persuade the Canadians to negotiate is to convince them that if they don't, the consequences will be swift and severe. Accordingly, I urge all my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation and help me enact it.

Mr. President, about 2 weeks ago I held an informal hearing in Kalispell, MT, to discuss the Canadian softwood lumber import problem. I ask unanimous consent that copies of three statements submitted at that hearing be inserted in the RECORD—from Mr. Royce Satterlee of the F.H. Stolze Lumber Co., Mr. Roger D. Johnson of Pyramid Mountain Lumber, and Mr. Tom Richards of Idaho Forest Industries.

I also ask unanimous consent that a copy of the legislation be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 982

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Wood Products Trade Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. NEGOTIATING AUTHORITY; INCREASE IN TARIFFS.

(a) Chapter 1 of title I of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"SEC. 110. WOOD PRODUCTS TRADE.

"(a)(1) The President may enter into a trade agreement with Canada which provides for the reduction of imports of softwood lumber that is the product of Canada into the United States by means of—

"(A) voluntary restraints, or

"(B) elimination of the benefit on the manufacture, export, or production of Canadian softwood lumber of the stumpage subsidy provided by Canadian government entities.

Such agreement also may provide for the reduction or elimination of tariff and nontariff barriers to (or other distortions of) international trade in wood products.

"(2) For purposes of section 151 and sections (c), (d), (e), (f), and (g) of section 102, any trade agreement entered into under paragraph (1) shall be treated as a trade agreement entered into under section 102.

"(b)(1) If a trade agreement has not been entered into with Canada under subsection (a) before February 26, 1986, the President shall by proclamation, on February 26, 1986, terminate—

"(A) any portion of a trade agreement which was entered into under—

"(i) this Act,

"(ii) section 201 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, or

"(iii) section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, with respect to any duty imposed by the United States on softwood lumber, and

"(B) any obligations of the United States under any other agreement with respect to such duty that arise by reason of a trade agreement described in subparagraph (A).

"(2)(A) Notwithstanding section 125 and any other provision of law, if any portion of a trade agreement described in paragraph (1)(A) is terminated under paragraph (1) with respect to any duty imposed by the United States on any softwood lumber, the rate of duty provided under the Tariff Schedules of the United States that shall apply to the entry of softwood lumber after the date of such termination shall be the sum of—

"(i) the rate of duty applicable to softwood lumber under rate column number 1 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States, plus

"(ii) the equilibrium rate of duty for such softwood lumber.

"(B) Any duty imposed by title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930, or by any other provision of law other than the Tariff Schedules of the United States, shall be in addition to the duty that is imposed by the Tariff Schedules of the United States at the rate set forth in subparagraph (A).

"(3) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) The term 'equilibrium rate of duty' means, with respect to any entry of softwood lumber before February 27, 1989, the ad valorem rate of duty equal to the excess, if any, of—

"(i) 10 percent, over

"(ii) the percentage of the ad valorem rate of any duty imposed by section 701 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671) that is applicable to such entry.

"(B) In the case of an entry of softwood lumber made after February 26, 1989, the equilibrium rate of duty shall be zero.

"(C) The term 'entry' means entry, or withdrawal from warehouse, for consumption within the customs territory of the United States.

"(c) For purposes of the provisions of section 123 (other than section 123(b)(4)), any termination of any portion of a trade agreement under subsection (b) shall be treated as an action under section 203 to increase or impose a duty (or other import restriction) which takes effect on the date such termination is proclaimed.

"(d) For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'softwood lumber' means any article provided for in any of the items 202.03 through 202.30 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States.

"(2) The term 'stumpage subdidy' means the furnishing of stumpage rights under circumstances described in section 771(5)(B) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1677(5)(B)), as amended by the Wood Products Trade Act of 1985.

"(3) The term 'wood product' means any item in part 1 or 3 of schedule 2 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States.".

(b) The President shall consult with the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and other appropriate congressional committees, as well as the appropriate committees established pursuant to section 135 of the Trade Act of 1974, in carrying out the amendments made by subsection (a).

(c) The table of contents for chapter 1 of title I of the Trade Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end the following:

"Sec. 110. Wood products trade.".

SEC. 3. COUNTERVAILING DUTIES.

(a) Paragraph (5) of section 771 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1677) is amended by redesignating subparagraph (B) as subparagraph (C) and by inserting after subparagraph (A) the following new subparagraph:

"(B) The furnishing of stumpage rights on government lands by a country under a program or system in which those rights are furnished to an enterprise in exchange for compensation by such enterprise that is less than the current price for comparable stumpage rights on Federal lands in the United States.".

(b) Section 771 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1677) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(18) STUMPAGE RIGHTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'stumpage rights' means the right to cut or remove standing timber.

"(B) CURRENT PRICE FOR COMPARABLE STUMPAGE RIGHTS.—In determining the current price for comparable stumpage rights.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—The price for stumpage rights in any foreign country (other than Canada) shall be compared to the price for stumpage rights for the most recent available calendar quarter in the region of the National Forest System (as defined in section 11 of the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974) which is determined to be most comparable in accordance with procedures of the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture.

"(ii) CANADA.—In the case of stumpage rights in Canada—

"(I) prices for stumpage rights in coastal British Columbia shall be compared to such prices in Region 6 of the National Forest System for the most recent available calendar quarter; and

"(II) prices for stumpage rights in interior British Columbia and in Eastern Canada shall be compared to such prices in Region 8 of the National Forest System.

"(iii) PRICES IN REGIONS OF NATIONAL FOREST SYSTEM.—The prices for stumpage rights in each region of the National Forest System shall be determined in accordance with procedures of the Forest Service, and shall include prices for all species of timber in Region 6 and prices for Southern pine sawtimber in Region 8. Such prices—

"(I) shall reflect prices paid for the removal of standing timber (and not bid prices),

"(II) shall be for standing timber only (and shall not include road building or other costs), and

"(III) shall be stated in dollars per thousand board feet, Scribner log scale.".

(c) Section 706 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671(e)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) FORM OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES IMPOSED ON SOFTWOOD LUMBER.—Any duty imposed by section 701 with respect to softwood lumber (within the meaning of section 110(d) of the Trade Act of 1974) after February 26, 1986, but before February 27, 1989, shall be in the form of an ad valorem duty.".

(d) The amendments made by this section shall apply to proceedings commenced on or after February 26, 1986.

F.H. STOLTZE LAND & LUMBER CO.,
LUMBER MANUFACTURERS,
Columbia Falls, MT, April 8, 1985.

My name is Royce Satterlee and I am employed as General Manager for the F.H. Stoltze Land and Lumber Company. We operate three sawmills in Montana employing about 350 employees with a payroll exceeding 6 million dollars per year. In addition our mills indirectly provide employment for over 100 loggers who contract logs or sell logs to our Company.

I would like to thank you Senator Baucus for providing us with an opportunity to publically discuss Industry problems concerning increased Canadian imports taking our traditional markets.

Canadian and U.S. lumber producers have had a healthy competitive relationship for most of the life of our two countries. In many cases the Canadian Companies are owned by U.S. Companies and in a few cases U.S. Companies are owned by Canadian Companies. Up until 1950 the Canadian Companies were generally getting under 10 percent of the total U.S. lumber market. From 1950 until 1975 this gradually increased to where the Canadians had 18 percent of the U.S. market. Since 1975 up to the present time we have seen the Canadian producers capture over 30 percent of the U.S. market. Naturally we U.S. producers no longer consider it to be healthy competition when the Canadian producers can continue to out compete us in our own market.

I would like to take several minutes to explain why this is happening.

The first reason is that the Canadian producers do not have to compete for stumpage. Stumpage is given to them at an appraised price which is set by a residual type appraisal which deliberately sets the price so that they can compete in our markets. On the other hand U.S. producers are faced with a declining land and timber base for which they must bid in order to protect their investments in plant and equipment. This leads to high bids for timber which does not work out economically in other than inflationary times.

The second reason is the strong U.S. dollar in comparison to the Canadian dollar. There has been a strong correlation between the differences in value of the two currencies and the amount of Canadian lumber which has entered U.S. markets.

The third reason is transportation. The Canadian railroads have been much more cooperative in working with the Canadian lumber producers than have the U.S. railroads in working with U.S. lumber producers.

Canada is a resource based country and the Canadian Government and Canadian railroads realize that they must all work together if they are to produce products that will compete price wise in U.S. and other world markets. Canadian lumber producers have worked very closely in establishing special rates to reload centers on the U.S.-Canadian borders so that Canadian lumber can be shipped by truck or rail into prime U.S. markets.

In addition the Canadian producers on the coast of British Columbia have traditionally moved most of their production by ship into California or through the Panama Canal to the gulf and east coast ports. Because of the Jones Act and the high cost of U.S. shipping, U.S. West Coast producers have not been able to compete in this method other than the California markets.

The fourth reason is the passage of the Staggers Act which effectively allowed the railroads to set any rail rate they desire and allowed them to abandon rail lines which were not profitable. After the passage of the Staggers Act, the railroads began offering rebate contracts to their larger customers which drastically reduced cost for these customers. Where most of the Canadian producers are large they along with big U.S. producers have gotten freight rebate contracts which are worth in excess of $10 per thousand for everything shipped by rail.

These contracts have not been available for small producers and it is one of the reasons that the small producers are the first to go under in these difficult times. I believe that the Staggers Act should be amended so that the per car rate is the same no matter who ships it. This problem was the primary reason for the establishment of the ICC in the early days of railroading and I believe it is past time to do something about it.

The solution to these problems has to be political in nature. At this time I can support either Congressman Weaver's HR 1088 or Congressman Bonker's HR 1648. I believe that either of these bills will have the desired effect of getting some serious negotiations underway with our Canadian friends. I would like to emphasis that they are our good friends and neighbors and it is imperative that we have realistic discussions so that we can continue to have the good relationship we have had in the past.

From a local industry standpoint I think it would be an ideal situation if the Canadian Government would allow the export of unprocessed logs out of Canada. This happened under a special dispensation several years ago and it was a big help to local industry to get some good cheap logs.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear here today.

ROYCE SATTERLEE.

PYRAMID MOUNTAIN LUMBER INC.,
Seeley Lake, MT, April 8, 1985.

Senator MAX BAUCUS,
Dirksen Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BAUCUS: I am an owner-operator of a sawmill in Seeley Lake, Montana. Pyramid Mountain Lumber Inc., employs some 120 people. We are the largest employer in the area.

I want to thank you for the opportunity to testify in regards to the current problem of Canadian wood products imports.

As a smaller operation, our consensus of how the Canadian imports affect our business, comes from several sources.

1. What we read in regards to the Canadian Government favorable stumpage practices.

2. The notable increase of imports of Canadian softwood lubmer into our country.

3. The effects of the current exchange rates between Canadian and U.S. currency.

4. The presence of Canadian lumber in our traditional market areas in abundance and priced very competitively.

Pyramid Mountain Lumber has over the past eight years, continued to modernize its plant. We have a very efficient operation which will compete effectly, aside from the advantage of the Canadian government subsidy towards their industry.

Major capitalization in a small operation creates a heavy debt load. Our firm does not have the staying power for a prolonged resolve of this issue.

Waiting for some weakening in our dollar could be too late. We are now in our third year of a fairly strong housing start, while at the same time we are experiencing a weakening market. History indicates that three years is about the average length of our housing booms.

The decline in building activity could absorb any effects of a weaker dollar in relation to the Canadian imports in our markets.

We need action now, that will stop the dumping of Canadian wood products in our market. Thank you.

ROGER D. JOHNSON,
President.

IDAHO FOREST INDUSTRIES, INC.
Kalispell, MT, April 8, 1985.

Senator Baucus, I want to extend my sincere appreciation for allowing us to discuss the crisis currently confronting the forest products industry. I am Tom Richards, President of Idaho Forest Industries, headquartered in Coeur d'Alene, ID. Our Company operates three sawmills in Idaho and one sawmill in Oregon in which we employ slightly in excess of 400 people. We are obviously not large by industry standards, but our plants are very productive in a very productive industry.

We have been in the forest products business for almost 70 years. During this period the industry had suffered through many periods of recession and depression, the last being the lengthly and deep depression of 1980–1982. Each time we have found ourselves confronted with recession we quickly took whatever steps were required to keep our plants operating and our people employed and have always been successful. In 1980–1982 this meant a freeze on wages and benefits that lasted 18 months. On October 1, 1984, we again froze wages and benefits as part of a total belt-tightening program to attempt to keep our plants operating. We are legitimately concerned, however, that any series of steps might prove unsuccessful in keeping our plants operating given the unfair competition from Canadian imports we are currently confronted with.

The primary cause of the 1980–1982 depression was high interest rates and their corresponding effect on the critical housing market. By 1982, total consumption of softwood lumber had dropped 27 percent from its 1978 peak and both the demand and prices for our products dropped dramatically. During such periods of reduced housing and low consumption of wood, we can normally anticipate and deal with the low prices and demand that are the end result. The current depression, however, is totally different and extremely frightening.

Total U.S. softwood lumber consumption in 1984 reached a record of 42.8 billion board feet, 150 million board feet higher than the record set in 1978. Through the first quarter of 1985, consumption is continuing at or close to these record levels. Yet lumber prices have plummeted to levels below or close to 1980–1982 levels with many plants curtailed or shutdown and well in excess of 20,000 people in our industry out of work. Plant closure announcements continue to be made almost daily even with consumption continuing at record levels. Mills in the western United States are running at 81 percent of normal capacity for the first 12 weeks of 1985 compared to 98 percent at the same time last year.

The culprit in this scenario is very easy to find—record levels of subsidized lumber being imported from Canada. Canadian lumber imports reached a high of 13.2 billion board feed, or 30 percent of our market in 1984. These figures compare to 27.6 percent of the market in 1978 and 18.7 percent in 1975. Although figures are not yet available, Canadian imports during the first quarter of 1985 likely ran close to 32–34 percent of our market.

In Canada almost all of the timberlands are owned by the provincial government. Stumpage is sold at arbitrarily low prices in order to give Canadian producers a cost advantage and to insure employment. While we are operating at 80 percent of capacity with thousands of people unemployed, the Canadians are operating well in excess of 100 percent of capacity taking advantage of the subsidized stumpage and the difference between our two currencies. Even with the dramatically low stumpage cost, key Canadian products are clearly below their breakeven costs.

I have always believed in free trade. Free trade, however, must also be fair trade with both countries operating under the same rules. With the Canadian government clearly subsidizing stumpage and Canadian industry operating in excess of 100% of normal capacity, taking advantage of the stumpage subsidy and differences between our currencies, we are clearly not operating under the same rules. And, most importantly, when you see a picture of record low prices when consumption continues at record high levels, you must certainly question where our industry will be in 1986 and 1987 when consumption will inevitably reverse as it always does in a cyclical industry such as ours.

Senator Baucus, we would ask you to seriously consider two courses of action. First, we would ask you to introduce a resolution in the Senate Finance Committee asking the new U.S. Trade Representative to immediately begin negotiations with the Canadian government and Canadian forest products industry to voluntarily cut back on sales of forest products to the United States. At the same time, we would ask you to introduce legislation comparable to that which has been introduced in the House of Representatives.

Free traders traditionally argue that cheap imports are healthy in that they weed out inefficient domestic operations. In the western United States in the past five years, the number of sawmills has dropped from 818 to less than 650. Clearly the inefficient operators and many that were efficient have been weeded out. Further weeding out is simply going to cost us valuable jobs and make us more and more dependent on a foreign country for one or more important resources.

By Mr. McCLURE (for himself and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 983. A bill to provide for limited extension of alternative means of providing assistance under the school lunch program and to provide for national commodity processing programs; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ALTERNATIVE SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM EXTENSION AND THE NATIONAL DONATED COMMODITY PROCESSING PROGRAM

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which is essential to the contribution of two programs which help decrease the enormous surplus of Government commodities. The National School Lunch Extension and the National Donated Commodity Processing Program bill will do two things.

First it will freeze in place the present method through which 70 elementary and secondary school districts in 29 States receive their USDA donated commodity assistance. These school districts have for the last 3 years been participating in a congressionally mandated test of alternative means of delivering USDA donated commodity benefits. They have been receiving either cash in lieu of the actual commodities or a commodity letter of credit which entitles them to buy the products they can use most efficiently and which contain the commodity USDA wants supported by school purchases.

USDA has completed the study data and has sent the report to Congress. It is now up to Congress to review this information and decide on the best method to provide nutritious school lunches to this Nation's school children. However, Congress will not be able to act in time to keep the 70 school systems going after June 30, 1985. These schools went to a great deal of expense and change to help in this study. They have found substantial savings on the cash or letter of credit program. Many districts have found that plate waste is down and student usage is up. They want this picture to continue.

In introducing this extension of this program, I am seeking to provide these school districts with the breathing room needed so that the Congress can review the USDA report, hold oversight hearings and come to a decision either to modify the program or leave it just the way it is.

There is no fiscal impact to the budget. Each school receives 11.5 cents per child per day for support of the School Lunch Program. Instead of receiving this in commodities, the participating school districts have been receiving this in cash or in a letter of credit. There would be no additional outlays to continue this program. I urge all Senators who have affected school systems to call them and determine whether they want to continue on this program. I have attached a listing of those school systems who are effected by this program.

The second provision of the bill will extend a current USDA program for 2 years. The program is called the National Donated Commodity Processing Program. Through this program elementary and secondary school systems, correctional facilities, nonprofit hospitals and nursing homes as well as senior citizens food service operations, nonprofit summer camps, food banks and day care centers can buy products produced with USDA commodities at discount.

The National Donated Commodity Processing Program has the USDA entering into contracts with processors to make finished products from the nonfat dry milk, butter, cheese and honey on which the Department is paying storage. The companies take the USDA commodity, make finished products, and discount the price of the finished products to eligible recipients by the value of the donated commodity in the end product.

This program has been running for about 18 months and has moved over 35 million pounds of USDA commodities out of storage and on their way to eligible agencies in the form of finished products ready to be served to their customers.

I believe that this program makes sense and should be extended beyond its June 30, 1985 expiration until USDA no longer has surplus of price supported commodities under storage. I urge my colleagues to support this measure and pass it swiftly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this bill and the listing of the school districts attached be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 983

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXTENSION OF ALTERNATIVE MEANS OF ASSISTANCE.

Upon request to the Secretary of Agriculture, any school district receiving all cash or all letters of credit in lieu of commodities under the school lunch program on January 1, 1985, shall continue to receive all cash in lieu of commodities or all letters of credit in lieu of commodities through the school year ending June 30, 1987. Such school districts shall receive bonus commodities in the same manner as such commodities are made available to any other school district participating in the school lunch program.

SEC. 2. NATIONAL DONATED COMMODITY PROCESSING PROGRAMS.

(a) COMMODITY PROCESSING.—Whenever a commodity is made available without charge or credit under any nutrition program administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary shall encourage consumption of such commodities through agreements with private companies under which the commodity is reprocessed into end food products for use by eligible recipient agencies. The expense of such reprocessing shall be paid by such eligible recipient agencies.

(b) SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS.—To be eligible to enter into any agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture under subsection (a), a private company shall annually settle all accounts with Secretary and any appropriate State agency regarding commodities processed under such an agreement.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE—The provisions of this section shall take effect July 1, 1985, and shall cease to have effect October 15, 1987.

S.J. Res. 118. Joint resolution to designate May 25, 1985, as "Missing Children's Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISSING CHILDREN DAY

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Senate that the President issue a proclamation designating May 25, 1985 as Missing Children Day.

The date of May 25 is of particular significance to the cause of missing children. On that day in 1979, 6-year-old Etan Patz disappeared on his way to school in New York City. Etan has never been found. His case, however, symbolized the plight of missing children and the frustrations and helplessness of families whose child is missing. During my investigation into the problem of missing children, I discovered the true parameters of this tragedy in the United States and we set about trying to resolve the situation.

Etan is but one example of thousands who disappear from their homes each year. In the past 4 years we have worked with parents, law enforcement agencies and many concerned citizen advocate groups nationwide with the sole purpose of increasing public awareness of the problem of missing children. Mr. President, we have made significant progress to date. On October 12, 1982, President Reagan signed into law the Missing Children Act which provides national clearinghouses of information on missing children and the unidentified dead. This act became the first step in a series of successes accomplished by this resolution.

Since this date, the advocates of the Missing Children Act have witnessed many far reaching accomplishments. These successes include, among other things, the enactment of the Missing Children's Assistance Act which creates a National Center on Missing and Exploited Children funded by the Department of Justice. The center will serve as a coordinating office for information collection and dissemination on missing children. It has established a national toll-free number to provide assistance and technical information to persons and organizations interested in helping solve this tragic problem. And, importantly, we have recently appointed an advisory board on missing children whose staff includes Etan's mother, Julie Patz, who has miraculously transferred her energy from totally encompassing grief to an unrelentless fight to help ensure that other such similar happenings never occur. And, last, the National Center has introduced selected State legislation providing a guide to effective State child laws to protect children.

Since 1981, we have also successfully worked to heighten the priority of the missing children problem in law enforcement agencies which before this time was often shown little attention. I clearly remember the words of Julie Patz who, in testimony on October 6, 1981 before the Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee said:

> When the police have gone, the burden falls back on the parents. Usually they are emotionally distraught, financially limited, untrained in search methods, and totally lacking any leverage necessary in obtaining information. The task in conducting a national search is beyond the abilities of grieving parents.

Since then, however, the Missing Children Act has succeeded in increasing the listing of missing children significantly. In February alone, the NCIC system is credited with entering 25,824 missing children and later cancelling 27,700 names. It is because of this increased awareness both by the general public as well as law enforcement agencies that missing children have been recovered in places as distant from their homes are Rhode Island was for Bobby Smith of California. Thanks to the improved programs enacted by the Rhode Island State Police and other concerned agencies, the Missing Children Act is becoming increasingly successful. Tragic stories are, finally, beginning to reveal happy endings.

But, Mr. President, it is not only law enforcement agencies which have answered the call for help for missing children. Both public and private concern has continued to grow since the Missing Children Act's establishment in 1981. If it weren't for their increased awareness and ardent support such accomplishments would never have been realized. It is for this reason that I plan to honor this May 25 those supporters without whose help such successes would never have been possible. Their time and never ending concern helped instill a glimmer of hope into thousands of lives.

And thus, the purpose of this resolution is to continue the momentum of increased public awareness and understanding of this national tragedy which began back in 1981. It is finally evident to all of us that the missing children problem is more pervasive than we could ever had imagined—whether that child be a runaway, a throwaway, a victim of parental kidnapping, or abducted by a stranger. Last year the Senate demonstrated the foresight to declare May 25 Missing Children Day. Enthusiasm has never been so high and dedication so great. Let's see that the successes of the past 4 years do not go for naught.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the name of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] was added as a cosponsor of S. 1, a bill requiring reductions in outlays for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

SENATE RESOLUTION 141—TO COMMEMORATE ULYSSES S. GRANT

Mr. HATFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 141

Whereas April 27, 1985 marks the anniversary of the birthday of President Ulysses S. Grant;

Whereas Ulysses S. Grant served as General of the victorious Union Army during the Civil War;

Whereas Ulysses S. Grant, as the eighteenth President of the United States, worked to restore the unity of the Nation following the devisive Civil War: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States commemorates Ulysses S. Grant and gives special recognition to his service to the Nation.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, April 27 marks the birthday of our Nation's 18th President, Ulysses S. Grant. Because this year also marks the 100th anniversary of President Grant's death, this birth date takes on special significance. Each year the day is marked by a ceremony at the tomb of the former President in New York City, and this year's program will be a special one. Plans are underway for an elaborate wreath laying ceremony on April 27, 1985, to recognize the life of Ulysses S. Grant, and to reflect upon the contributions he made to the history and development of our Nation.

In attendance will be members of the Loyal Legion, one of the country's oldest patriotic societies. President Grant served as commander-in-chief of the legion from 1884 to 1886. The Loyal Legion was created following the death of President Lincoln at the close of the Civil War to continue the patriotism and friendship formed by the common experience of the war, and to preserve faith in the united American Republic. President Rutherford B. Hayes, also a former commander-in-chief of the legion upheld the legion's faith in American and patriotic values by saying:

Our one flag represents a people great, prosperous, and happy, whose heritage will be, as long as they are guided by widsom and justice, the enjoyment of unbroken harmony and perpetual peace throughout our continental republic. These are the lessons which our Society would teach to our children and to our children's children.

The grandson of President Hayes, James Birchard Hayes, is coordinating the ceremony in connection with the newly appointed site manager of Grant's tomb, Diane Dayson. Also in attendance will be descendants of President Grant, Mrs. D.W. Griffiths, Mrs. P. Reuston, and Mrs. John Dietz.

Highlighting this event will be a seven gun salute by the U.S. Military Academy of West Point honor guard.

In acknowledgment of this significant date and the ceremonies marking it, I am submitting a resolution to commemorate Ulysses S. Grant.

SENATE RESOLUTION 142—SUPPORTING DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. SYMMS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; as follows:

S. RES. 142

Whereas, the Congress finds that Communist regimes are engaged in a comprehensive and pervasive program of violating the human rights of their citizens and exporting the means for violation of human rights of citizens of other nations;

Whereas, the Congress finds that Communist regimes have introduced their combatants and equipment in the nations of Latin America with the purpose of exporting totalitarianism;

Whereas, the intrusion by Communist regimes into Latin America has undermined the stability of the region, resulted in violence and deprivation of human rights, and threatens the national security of the United States and of our neighbors in Central and South America: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the policy of the United States to support and aid democratic government in Latin America through a systematic and predictable program of assistance, including support for public and private efforts that furnish direct aid to the people in the region, and further, to assist any nations or people in Latin America who request American assistance to halt any and all introduction of any Communist nations combatants or equipment into their respective countries.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, we speak in the Senate often about the importance of looking at our national security interests in a bipartisan fashion, and making decisions about America's concerns overseas without domestic political considerations.

Israel, for her size, tends to receive very generous amounts of our annual foreign military and economic assistance. The majority of the Congress recognize Israel as an important ally and as a strategic deterrent to Soviet adventurism in the Middle East, and foreign aid is conditioned upon that premise.

But, Mr. President, while most of us in the Congress are perceptive of Israel's defense needs, and cognizant of the threats to her security, many of Israel's strongest proponents fail to perceive the role Israel's enemies—and the enemies of the United States—play outside of the Middle East. Just as U.S. security interests are not confined to the Persian Gulf, neither is Israeli security tied solely to the Middle East. It is only sensible to design our foreign policy to counter threats to our security and those of our allies, whether in the Persian Gulf, the Horn of Africa, or just below our southern border, in the Caribbean.

Yet there are Members of Congress who close their eyes to threats in Central America to the United States and Israel, while they berate the activities of our mutual enemies in the Middle East. This regionalist perspective on foreign policy is narrowminded and dangerous. The adversaries of America, of Israel, and of other Western democracies, are strategizing on a global scale. The terrorism, subversion, international narcotics trafficking, and the foment of domestic unrest and violence in democratic countries are not separate incidents, and should not be viewed in isolation.

I hope my colleagues will be interested in a portion of a letter I received from the chairman of the Federation of Likud Students in Israel, which compares the free world to a wall which is being dismantled by our adversaries. The letter reads:

During the past decades, many stones have been removed from this wall by totalitarian regimes: Cuba, Angola, Mozambique, Vietnam, Nicaragua, Cambodia, Afghanistan, Ethiopia, not to speak of the Soviet-friendly nations that encircle the Middle East. The loss of more nations in Central America threatens the United States itself * * * The United States is the leader of the Free World. Israel needs a strong and secure America to oppose the power of the Soviet Union and its allies if Israel is to survive. We therefore urge you to assist the Nicaraguan freedom fighters who want their country back while countering the spread of totalitarianism in Central America.

It is only fair to mention that there are Israeli critics who recognize the role of the PLO in the Caribbean, but they refuse to condemn, and rather, instead, rationalize, PLO mischief in the Middle East. Neither position, that of Israel's declared friends who ignore the PLO presence in Central America, or of PLO critics who close their eyes to the PLO role in the Middle East, serves America's vital interests.

Just recently the Philippines denied the PLO an embassy in their capital city of Manila. In contrast, Daniel Ortega, Nicaragua's dictator, has embraced the PLO. Some strong defenders of Israel in Congress seek to cut American aid to President Marcos' country, a proven loyal ally and site of two strategic American bases. Some of these same opponents of Marcos advocate policies toward Nicaragua that would ensure Ortega's continued rule, and thus a continued PLO role in that country and the entire region. This inexplicable behavior calls to mind Jeane Kirkpatrick's incisive piece, "Dictatorships and Double Standards." Mrs. Kirkpatrick points out the utter hypocrisy of those who criticize America's allies and urge interference in their domestic affairs, but who advocate a hands-off policy to those countries committed to America's violent overthrow.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee recently approved in a foreign aid authorization bill, $5 million for the democratic resistance in Cambodia, an appropriation not even sought by this conservative administration. Now $5 million is not a lot, and perhaps the gesture is only a token one. But there are liberal Members here in the Senate who were active in the legislated defeat in Vietnam, but who now support militarily aiding Cambodia's freedom fighters. How can aid to a victim of America's retreat from Southeast Asia be justified when the democratic resistance forces in our own hemisphere are denied our help? Will these same Members opposed today to helping Nicaragua's Contras admit their mistake 10 years down the road, and then pledge their support for what's left of the democratic resistance in Nicaragua?

The threat is real and iminent in Nicaragua. The assertion maintained by some that United States arming of the Contras forced the Sandinistas into the arms of the Soviets is pure disinformation. The PLO-Sandinista connection, for example, is well documented, and their proclaimed solidarity goes back to 1969, 10 years before the Sandinista revolution overthrew Somoza. According to a Wall Street Journal article by Shoshana Bryen, executive director of the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs, the Sandinistas successfully solicited military training assistance from the PLO in 1969. It was not until 1978 that the Sandinista-PLO friendship was publicly disclosed, in a joint communique condemning U.S. support of Israel and Nicaragua. After the 1979 revolution, the PLO lent the new Government of Nicaragua $12 million. Arafat confirmed in 1982 that pilots had been dispatched to Nicaragua and guerillas to El Salvador.

The State Department published a report on Communist, PLO, and Libyan support for Nicaragua and El Salvador's insurgents in May 1983. In December 1983, the Center for International Security published a report entitled "The Sandinista-PLO Axis: a challenge to the Free World." CIS queried how liberal Congressmen who take the lead in the appropriations process to ensure adequate levels of foreign aid to Israel can simultaneously lead in the effort to protect and defend forces committed to the very destruction of Israel, as well as America. CIS questioned whether these Members were blatantly hypocritical for ignoring the flagrant anti-Semitism of the Nicaraguan regime and Nicaragua's long-time association with international terroism.

The Sandinista terrorist linkage is clear and irrefutable. Tomas Borge, Nicaragua's Interior Minister, was part of a contingent trained by the PLO. Libya's dictator Qadhafi acknowledged in a New York Times interview that Libyan arms and fighters had reached the Nicaraguan people, "because they fight with us."

Borge was quoted as saying: "We say to our brother Arafat that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas." Likewise, Arafat was quoted as saying at the July 1980 anniversary of the Sandinista power grab: "Your enemies are our enemies." Managua has flirted with every terrorist group known—from Colombia's M-19 guerrillas, to Italy's Red Brigades, West Germany's Baader-Meinhof Gang, Spain's Basque ETA Separatists, Peru's Shining Path, Tupamaros from Uruguay, Honduras' Cinchonero guerrillas, and with every leftist faction imaginable.

The charges about high-level government involvement in international narcotics trafficking are also confirmed. Antonio Farach, a former Sandinist diplomat, testified about Interior Minister Borge's complicity in drug trafficking, and revealed that the Nicaraguan Government instructs its diplomats to provide support and cover for members of international terrorist organizations traveling in countries where Nicaraguan diplomats reside. Not only do these drugs provide a source of badly needed revenue to the Sandinistas to finance their unprecedented offensive military buildup, but the drug trade is viewed as a political weapon against the youth of the United States—to deliver a blow to what the Sandinistas call the United States in their national anthem—the "enemy of humanity."

Despite this overwhelming evidence of Nicaragua's allegiance with the violent groups committed to the overthrow of the United States, Sandinista apologists still claim that Nicaragua is not an occupied country, and that the Sandinistas would behave themselves if only the United States would quit arming the Contras. Castro was given the same excuse 24 years ago—that American belligerence toward him precipitated his friendship with the U.S.S.R. Some of us knew better then, and we know better now. Cuba today is a Soviet military bastion, the Kennedy-Khrushchev agreement has been violated by the Soviet Union, and human rights are nonexistent. Now Castro and his cronies want to turn Nicaragua into another Soviet puppet state, another human rights hellhole, and with the help of their sympathizers in U.S. Government, they just might succeed.

There are two other aspects of Nicaraguan life that deserve mention. The first is the role of the church in Nicaragua, and its treatment at the hands of the Sandinistas. This issue is particularly important, because so many religious groups inside the United States have been made the dupes of a very sophisticated disinformation campaign sponsored by the Sandinistas and their propaganda masters, the Cubans and Soviets.

The archbishop of Nicaragua is named Obando Y Bravo, a man of humble parentage and modest lifestyle. The Sandinistas fear Obando's influence with the common people—he is a potent moral force in a nation which is 80-percent Catholic. Somoza called the Archbishop "Commandante Obando" implying that he was a Communist. Today, the Sandinistas call him a "counterrevolutionary," a term they use for the freedom fighters. It was Lenin who coined the term "counterrevolutionary" for anyone who opposed their imposition of Communist totalitarianism. Last year, a pastoral letter by Archbishop Obando was denounced by the Sandinistas as a "criminal act." The letter called for a dialog of national reconciliation, for all the conflicting parties in Nicaragua to come together to peaceably work out their differences.

Castro deceived many in the West about his avowed Marxist-Leninist beliefs; he even carried a rosary and wore crucifixes when parading through the streets of Havana. Also recognizing the usefulness of disguising their real intentions from the West, the Sandinistas have followed the example of Poland; religion will not be obliterated overnight, but rather, gradually eliminated. To counter the traditional church, the Sandinistas created their so-called popular church, which merges Marxism and Christianity. Indeed, many posters around Managua cite that there is no contradiction between Christianity and Marxism. At campesino—peasant—masses, bullets are consecrated and sent to the war front.

The campaign against the church includes tactics to discredit and smear church officials. The Sandinistas attempted to frame one priest in an alleged sexual encounter with a female parishioner. The parishioner turned out to be a Sandinista agent. Camera crews were conveniently waiting at the woman's house when another Sandinista internal security official, who claimed to be the woman's husband, dragged the beaten and naked priest from the house. A revealing commentary on the nature of the Sandinistas was the subsequent publication, on the anniversary of the priest's humiliation at their hands, of a pornographic pamphlet detailing the lurid incident. The Catholic Bishops Councils' response, typically, was censored from being published.

Last, I would like to comment on the literacy campaign in Nicaragua. Sandinista apologist often point to the so-called successes of the Sandinistas, as if to say, anyone who teaches a child to read cannot be all bad. But, we should remember that, as Arkady Shevchenko recently remarked after his defection, all the amenities in life are worth little without your freedom.

The literacy campaign is more accurately described as an indoctrination campaign—or as brainwashing. The Sandinistas, like true Communists, recognize the value of ideas. As the introduction to a literacy manual explains:

> Language does not possess that sense of neutrality which the capitalist bourgeoisie, as a dedicated defender of scandalous privileges, wished to stamp on it. Language, as human expression, is a historical transmitter of moral, social, and aesthetic values * * * it shouldn't seem strange that the language of our people contains the spirit of the bourgeoisie who sold us out and of Somocismo; nor should we be surprised that it contains the social attitudes of the capitalist bourgeoisie.

The publication goes on to point out that the literacy campaign will not consist purely of learning to read and write, but of raising consciousness. While all of this may be dismissed by some as rhetoric, I think it significant that the children of Nicaragua are learning to spell words like "exterminate," "aggression," "intervention," and "repression" in the third grade. One high school text displays an interesting twist to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan—explaining that the Soviet soldiers are in Afghanistan to liberate that country, and assuring readers that if the Soviets were imperialists, there would be Soviet businesses in Afghanistan.

I will not lay out the nature of the Soviet military buildup in Nicaragua, and the menace it represents to the democratic neighboring countries of Central America, except to say that the introduction of the MI-24 Hind gunship, the flying tanks which the Soviets are using so effectively against the Afghan people, and intelligence reports about Sandinista acquisition of chemical warfare capability, are of major concern. All the information about Nicaragua's militarism is well documented and available to Members who want to read it. I just want to add that I am perplexed by my colleagues in this body who have said they will vote against the aid package to Nicaragua's freedom fighters, and yet take credit for supporting the Afghan mujahedin. Does it take direct Soviet troop involvement in order for the threat to be acknowledged? Can opponents of aid simply ignore Soviet military advisers, thousands of Cubans, at every level of the Nicaraguan Armed Forces, plus the Eastern bloc personnel—Bulgarians, Czechs, East Germans, as well as the PLO, Libyans, and North Koreans? Indeed, Soviet military advisers have recently been sighted in combat against the freedom fighters close to the Honduran border.

America's desertion of Nicaragua's democratic resistance will send a terrible message to the Afghan rebels, to those groups seeking to liberate their countries from Communist dictatorships in Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Cambodia, and in Vietnam. and, if we give up on freedom in Nicaragua, it will give inspiration and renewed fervor to the terrorists and the enemies of America and our allies all over the world.

I hope this package will be approved, but beyond that, I hope that this administration will revisit this issue with the Congress soon; $14 million is not enough to put adequate military pressure on the Sandinistas so they will agree to negotiate with the Contras and with all elements of the internal dissident groups—the trade unions, the Catholic Church, the silenced press, and the business community.

In all honesty, I must state that $14 million is a Bay of Pigs in slow motion, another half-hearted commitment to the men and women who are willing to shed their blood to liberate their country and their fellow citizens. The $14 million will be appreciated by the Contras nevertheless, and it will also keep the Sandinistas from fulfilling their stated objective of overthrowing neighboring El Salvador, and eventually, Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica. Costa Rica, Borge claimed, was such easy pickings that it would be the "dessert." To those Members who claim the Contras are not effective nor represent a military threat to the Sandinistas, let me assure them that if they were not, it is hardly likely that the Sandinistas would have spent so much time and money trying to manipulate the vote on aid. Finally, for those concerned about budgetary restraint, $14 million will save a great deal of money we will have to spend otherwise to beef up the FBI, the Customs Service, the Drug Enforcement Agency, the Coast Guard, military assistance to Latin America, and for refugee assistance programs. These agencies and programs will require more funding if Sandinista destabilization efforts are not curtailed. The refugee problem will clearly worsen as the Sandinistas, relieved of Contra pressure, move to strangle any internal dissidence.

Contrary to the argument that American aid to the Contras is the reason for the war, the civil war in Nicaragua will rage on, as it has for the past year, whether or not American aid is continued, because the Contras, thankfully, have more reliable friends than the United States. But without respect for basic human rights, there will be no peace in Nicaragua, just as there is no peace today in Vietnam. As long as Nicaragua continues to deny fundamental liberties to its people, internal dissension will persist, and there will be no peace.

The Soviet Union is clearly the greatest violator of human rights and the greatest menace to peace in the world today. But, the Brezhnev doctrine should not be seen as irreversible. Today, eight countries are in armed revolt against Soviet imperialism. The Soviet empire is rotten from internal corruption, a growing rejection of Soviet-style government, and the same spirit of nationalism which was successfully exploited by the Soviets in the 1970's. We should take advantage of this trend, and align ourselves with those who are willing to challenge the nation that poses the greatest threat to our freedoms.

Our Nation has saved the free world more than once from totalitarianism. On the 40th anniversary of the salvation of democratic government from the Nazi threat, and the liberation of the survivors of the Holocaust, let's not sell out our friends to the brutality and expansionist grip of the Soviet totalitarians and their clients in the Third World. I urge my colleagues to suppport this appropriation, and any other measures to force the Sandinistas to live up to the unfulfilled promises of the revolution, and to the solemn pledge they made to the Organization of American States in 1979 to establish representative government in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter to me from Pat Robertson of the Christian Broadcast Network and a monograph entitled "Central America: Freedom or Slavery," from the National Perspectives Institute, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHRISTIAN BROADCASTING NETWORK, INC.,
Virginia Beach, VA, April 22, 1985.

Hon. STEVEN D. SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Senate Hart Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Major General Jerry Curry, Former Deputy Commander of the Fifth Corps in Germany, this week completed an outstanding monograph entitled "Central America: Freedom or Slavery."

In this fresh work, General Curry points out that the United States under the Articles of Confederation established a rebel government to wrest freedom from the oppression of King George III of England. At a crucial juncture in the life of this new nation, it was recognized as legitimate by the government of France and thereby received the critical support needed to prevail in a struggle against tyranny.

General Curry argues that the United States could follow the historic precedent set by France and recognize the Nicaraguan government in exile as the legitimate expression of the people of Nicaragua, who are struggling to throw off an illegitimate yoke impressed upon them by a foreign dominated oligarchy.

May I commend this insightful work to your attention as you consider the crucial issue of United States support for freedom in Nicaragua. I remain

Cordially yours,

PAT ROBERTSON,
President.

For centuries, Central America has been cursed with endemic political, social, and economic instability. The human rights of the Central Americans have been betrayed so often that, at times, the people seem numb and debilitated.

Communism did not create this condition. The same situation would exist today, with modification, whether or not there was an ideology called communism. But the Soviets, their East European Empire, Fidel Castro and the communist-Sandinistas are now seizing power in Central America, giving the situation a crucial twist.

There is no historical example of a nation in which communism has fulfilled its promises of democracy and freedom to its citizens. Historically the reverse is true. Communist governments perpetually exist in a hostile environment of rejection by the people they enslave because they violate both the philosophy and system of lawful government.

Today many attempt to rationalize away the bitter slavery that communism brings.[1] But if our founding fathers were here, they would remind us that our Revolutionary War was fought over lesser offenses. Freedom for Central America is an idea whose time has come!

The current struggle in Central America is not a matter of ideology, a struggle between communism and free enterprise, though such a struggle is surely taking place. At issue is not a confrontation between Fidel Castro, the illegitimate communist-Sandinista government of Nicaragua and the President of the United States of America, though that too is part of the process. The issue is not whether Congress should provide $14 million in support to the contras, nor is it about the number of U.S. military advisers in El Salvador.

Mr. Calero, a leader of the Nicaraguan resistance, writing in the Washington Post says:

"But rarely do we hear concern about what is good for Nicaraguans and what we want for our country.

"We Nicaraguans see the main issue as internal—a struggle by Nicaraguans for self determination, democracy and social justice. It is a struggle against other Nicaraguans and foreigners who, like the Polish regime of General Wojciech Jaruzelski, have imposed a tyranny on their fellow citizens with the help of the Soviet Union." [2]

Events have shown that the people of Nicaragua, El Salvador and Central America intend to continue fighting for their freedom. Must they fight alone? The Sandinistas don't have to fight alone. Foreign communist powers openly help them. The communist terrorists fighting the legitimate government of El Salvador don't have to fight alone. Should those who are fighting for freedom be asked to fight alone? No! These things ought not to be. For this is neither a partisan nor a bipartisan matter. It is an American matter.

Though U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick was talking about communist insurgents in Central America when she made the following statement, she could just as well have been talking about some opinion-makers in this country:

"They are trying to teach us that it is legitimate for communist governments to train and arm guerrillas and make war on their noncommunist neighbors, and that it is illegitimate for noncommunist to defend themselves or for others to help them do so." [3] Mr. Calero pleads:

"We ask only for enough help so that we can have a reasonably even chance in our fight for freedom. We are the ones who are suffering, and it is our country that must make the sacrifices. We do not ask others to share these horrors. We ask only for enough resources from outside to give us a chance to fight against the weapons the Sandinistas have received from communists." [4] This certainly does not seem an excessive request. During the Revolutionary War of 1776, our requests were less modest.

It is true, too, that what is a question of freedom for Central Americans, may become a question of stability for the United States. Five percent of the population of Latin America already lives within our borders.[5] With Central America in the throes of a crisis, hundreds of thousands of people are looking to refuge in our country. If we don't support the Central Americans in their fight for their own countries, we will find ourselves supporting them when they come to take refuge in ours.

What should be our objective in Central America? It is to oppose the enslavement of the frightened and abused people of Central America by all enemies of freedom, from both the Right and the Left. We also must strive to help lift them from their historic poverty.

Human slavery is human slavery, from whatever ideological cauldron it is ladled. Slavery is wrong, and the people of the United States of America remain unalterably opposed to it. In the final analysis, they will neither excuse nor forgive those who give away Central America's freedom, no matter how well intentioned they may be, or how cleverly they disguise the betrayal.

The real question facing the Congress and this nation is whether we will choose to help Central America remain free, or whether we will stand by—idle, indifferent, or politically posturing—while others steal their freedom from them. Do we or do we not intend to fully support our Central American brothers and sisters in their quest for freedom?

NICARAGUA

Our founding fathers believed that all people have a lawful right to resist tyranny and to fight to secure their freedom upon proof of a systematic violation of law by the ruling authority. Since the communist-Sandinistas have clearly violated the legitimate aims and aspirations of the Nicaraguan people, they govern illegitimately. Therefore, the people of Nicaragua have at least as much right to change governments by force as did our founding fathers. Mr. Calero correctly points out that:

"The very conditions that justified the hemispheric intervention against the Somoza regime exist again, but in greater measure. The existence of those conditions justifies foreign support again, this time against the Sandinista regime, which has betrayed our revolution against Somoza and has ignored its commitments to the Nicaraguan people * * *

"Above all, however, we believe that the United States and other democratic nations have no right to confer upon the Sandinista regime the legitimacy that it has not been able to achieve within the country. The people of Nicaragua do not regard the Sandinista regime as a legitimate or acceptable government." [6]

It is a historical fact that the United States supported the rightwing dictator Somoza in Nicaragua. It is also a fact that the United States stopped supporting Somoza and started supporting the Sandinistas. That support continued until it became obvious that the Sandinistas intended to exchange slavery of the Right under the dictator Somoza for slavery of the Left under a communist-Sandinista dictatorship.

The Sandinistas were recognized as a government in exile only two months prior to Somoza's ouster.[7] They had no great legitimacy. In fact, they enjoyed far less popular support than the contras now have.

But it was the Nicaraguan people's determination to be free that toppled Somoza and brought the Sandinistas to power. They did not overthrow the enslavers of the Right only to be reenslaved by the equally repugnant and cruel Sandinistas of the Left. They will fight on, armed only with courage and hope if necessary. But still they will fight, with or without assistance from the United States. They may be forced to submit, but they will never surrender.

U.S. News and World Report points out: "By any standard the Sandinistas are in trouble. The economy is nearly bankrupt. Women trudge from shop to shop or stand hours in line at markets for food and other necessities." [8]

And Mr. Calero observes:

"Again nearly the entire spectrum of political opinion and leadership in Nicaragua has turned against the government . . . And our neighbors—Costa Rica, Honduras and El Salvador—have all spoken out officially against the Sandinistas even more strongly than they ever did against Somoza." [9]

It is interesting to note that while U.S. government support has gone down because Congress refuses to release $14 million in aid, the Nicaraguans are voting with their feet. There has been a rapid increase in the numbers fleeing Nicaragua to join those fighting the Sandinistas.

"Still, rebel numbers continue to swell. The most important group has grown in less than a year from around 10,000 to nearly 16,000 . . . Also swelling FDN ranks are young men who say they prefer joining the contras to being drafted into the army." [10]

But because of reluctance on the part of the U.S. Congress to support them, those fighting for freedom must do so under conditions reminiscent of Valley Forge:

"But rebel forces are rapidly depleting their ammunition and supplies. Recent visitors to contra camps say many soldiers are limited to a half-dozen bullets a day. Battered tin cans often serve as canteens. Boots are badly worn and sometimes have only frayed strings for laces. Normal 15-day recruit training now last 30 days because there are not enough weapons to send new troops into the field." [11]

This is not some figment of the imagination contrived by the Reagan Administration. It is an established fact. As Mr. Calero concludes in his Washington Post article,

"Genuine concern for the well-being of the Nicaraguan people can only translate into support for the democratic opposition and its struggle to return Nicaragua to the values that guided us in removing the Somoza dictatorship." [12]

The question before Congress is not whether to approve or refuse $14 million in aid for the contras. The question before Congress is this: Will Congress' action contribute to the enslaving of the people of Nicaragua and, by extension, the people of Central America, or will Congress do all in its power to free them?

The same question applies to our news media, for implicit in the news media's power is the ultimate responsibility for how it uses that power. The exercise of power is never neutral. It contributes either to the greater good of a free society or to its undermining, weakening and destruction. The news media will either use their power to hasten the demise of Central American freedom, or it will give new hope to a free Central America. Faced with such a disaster in the making, there can be no neutral observers.

For the Congress of the United States, the struggle is already joined and the confrontation can no longer be avoided. No matter how unsatisfactorily or unpersuasively the Administration may seem to articulate its policy, the facts remain irrefutable.

The communist-Sandinistas are militarily consolidating their power to enslave the Nicaraguan people. They make it clear that as soon as that is accomplished, they intend to enslave the rest of Central America.[13]

REVOLUTION: 1776 AND 1985

Historically, the most successful and enduring revolution was that of 1776 through which the United States of America prevailed in the proclaiming of its independence. It is a standard against which all revolutions can be measured. It permanently elevated a people from a condition of subservience, to one in which freedom was successfully proclaimed and upheld throughout the land. This was primarily because of the nature of the rvolution's leaders, and because it was carried out in accordance with law.

There is an interesting lesson to be drawn from the American Revolution. In those days, too, there was a foreign power willing to support the patriots in their legitimate struggle. After the Continental Congress and its armed forces had demonstrated their will to fight and win,[14] France recognized the colonial government's legitimacy and threw its military weight into the war on the American side.

Both the French army and navy fought alongside the American patriots. When the war was won, the French forces were recalled and the Americans were left to sort out their own affairs.

Fortunately for our nation, the French were not squeamish. If they had operated under the constraints currently imposed by our Congress against the Administration's Central American policy, the war would have been lost and the United States would have remained a British colony. And if Congress does not modify its stand, that is what will happen today. Central America will lose.

There is another important lesson to be drawn from the example of 1776. No nation can do for another nation what that nation could or should do for itself. French commitment and armed forces could not be substituted for American effort and commitment.

Similarly, the United States of America cannot win freedom for El Salvador, Nicaragua, or any other Central American nation. These nations must define their own freedom. We can and must be prepared to help them in significant ways, but they must provide their own solutions—Central American solutions to Central American problems.

The Nicaraguan patriots facing the communist-Sandinistas even now are demonstrating that they are capable of fighting and winning on their own. It is not the numbers of Nicaraguans fighting for freedom that will turn the tide; it is the quality of their commitment to freedom that will ultimately prevail.

And to prevail successfully against the communist-Sandinista dictatorship these patriots must, at some point, form their own civil government, one that can demonstrate the capability of controlling military leaders and duly constituted armed forces. To be believable, they must do it in a way that shows that they, not the communist-Sandinistas, are the legitimate government of Nicaragua.

Forming such a central government will require that they place national interest above personal interest, gain, privilege and prestige. If they are unable or unwilling to do this, their cause will not succeed. As a practical matter, should the Nicaraguan patriots win and no effectual government be prepared to take its proper place, Nicaragua will find itself in chaos once again.

What should the United States of America do? Disparate approaches may be equally effective. But we suggest the following as a possible course of action.

First, the United States should start treating the communist-Sandinistas like the illegitimate government they are. Diplomatic relations should be terminated and all reasonable diplomatic, economic and political sanctions should be taken against them, short of a declaration of war. Free nations throughout the world should be encouraged to join us in these actions.

Second, the United States should encourage freedom-loving Nicaraguans to form a legitimate civil government. This would not be a guerrilla government in exile. It would be similar to the DeGaulle government in Great Britain while France was suffering under a Nazi dictatorship.

The freedom movement cannot consist merely of those willing to fight in the field. Now is the time for the many opinion-making leaders who have fled the country to become directly involved in forming a legitimate Nicaraguan civil government.

We also suggest that prominent persons, elites and others recognized to have national-level leadership ability or influence should be encouraged to leave Nicaragua and join this new civil government. All possible actions should be taken not to simply cloak the new government in legitimacy, but to make it, in fact, the civil government of Nicaragua. Such a government would legally merit the support of the Nicaraguan people, the United States and other freedom-loving nations.

The United States should then be prepared to provide the same support to the legitimate government of Nicaragua that France and others provided us during our Revolutionary War. That is to say, we should be prepared to provide moral and financial support plus civil and military advisers of the caliber of Lafayette and Baron von Steuben. Many are squeamish today over military involvement in Central America. They rush to cite the recent Viet Nam War experience. They forget about the Boat People of South Viet Nam, who brave ocean storms and overcrowded boats under a blistering tropical sun, who suffer starvation and dehydration and face murder and rape and slavery in their efforts to escape communist slavery. To these people, the Viet Nam War was not the wrong war fought in the wrong place at the wrong time for the wrong reason. It was the right war, and the only wrong things came after it was lost.

CONCLUSION

The spirit of human slavery endemic to communism and the spirit of freedom permeating the hearts, souls and minds of the people of Central America are mutually exclusive. The struggle taking place there is not between communism and capitalism; it is over whether the people of Central America and their children's children will live free or be enslaved.

There is no historical example of a nation falling under communist rule and having its freedoms improved and enhanced. Certainly, a communist takeover will not profit Central Americans.

Our founding fathers believed that all people have a lawful right to resist tyranny and to fight to secure freedom to themselves and their nation. Since the communist-Sandinistas are enslaving Nicaragua, they are not the legitimate government of the Nicaraguan people. As a result, the Nicaraguan people have a legal right to form a legitimate government and to remove the communist-Sandinista dictators, by force if necessary.

Based on the French contribution to our own Revolutionary War effort we should help Central Americans, including those patriots fighting for freedom in Nicaragua, to resist all who would enslave them. That includes dictatorships of both Left and Right.

History's indictment of the government of the United States of America may well be based on whether or not Congress did all in its power to secure freedom for Central

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

NATIONAL BUREAU OF STANDARDS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1986

GORE AMENDMENT NO. 32

Mr. BYRD (for Mr. GORE) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 796) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal year 1986, and for other purposes; as follows:

In section 2, insert "(a)" immediately after "Sec. 2. ", and add the following at the end:

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, of the total amount authorized under subsection (a) of this section, $50,000 is authorized only for the purpose of assisting the creation and maintenance of data bases on structural failures.".

STATUE OF JEANNETTE RANKIN

MATHIAS AMENDMENT NO. 33

Mr. SIMPSON (for Mr. MATHIAS) proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 37) providing for acceptance of a statue of Jeannette Rankin presented by the State of Montana for placement in National Statuary Hall, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 2, line 16, strike out "Joint Committee on the Library" and insert in lieu thereof "Joint Committee on Printing".

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

THURMOND AMENDMENT NO. 34

Mr. SIMPSON (for Mr. THURMOND) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 45) to designate "National Child Safety Week"; as follows:

Strike all after the title and insert in lieu thereof:

Whereas more than 1.5 million children have been reported missing in the United States;

Whereas many of these children are never found;

Whereas missing children are often innocent victims of physical and sexual abuse;

Whereas many local volunteer groups already are working enthusiastically to promote child safety;

Whereas the Missing Children Act and the Missing Children's Assistance Act have facilitated the investigation and prosecution of crimes involving missing and exploited children;

Whereas there is now a national clearinghouse, The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and a toll-free hotline to centralize the efforts to locate missing children;

Whereas The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children provides educational child safety materials and information about identification procedures, such as voluntary fingerprinting, dental charting and photographing of children;

Whereas information received through the toll-free hotline is disseminated to appropriate law enforcement agencies;

Whereas the protection, safety, and security of all children should be one of our highest priorities;

Whereas it is essential that we continue to increase public awareness and provide information and assistance to combat and prevent the increasing problem of missing and exploited children: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May, 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month," and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate programs, activities, and ceremonies for the better protection, security, and safety of all children.

Amend the title so as to read: "designating the month of May, 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month."

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, last week, in a letter to our colleagues, my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] and I expressed our intention to offer an amendment to the budget resolution that would maintain funding for Amtrak, Mass Transit and the Urban Development Action Grant Program at fiscal year 1985 budget authority levels and freeze funding at that level for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

For the convenience of our colleagues, we submit the amendment for printing in the RECORD. Thus far, the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER], our colleagues from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE and Mr. LEVIN] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] have agreed to cosponsor the amendment.

Mr. President, our amendment is essential to maintain our national rail system and to ensure the continuing economic revival of our towns and cities.

The amendment has thus far been endorsed by the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the National Association of Railroad Passengers.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed the letters of endorsement of the two organizations that I mentioned.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RAILROAD PASSENGERS,
Washington, DC April 23, 1985.

Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: The National Association of Railroad Passengers strongly supports the Lautenberg-Dodd budget amendment. Amtrak is a vital part of America's infrastructure, a $4 billion investment that the Administration's zero budget and the Senate Budget Committee's $474 million funding level would effectively throw away.

Our airports and highways are increasingly choked as it is, and would suffer even more intolerable congestion if Amtrak shuts down. In the Northeast Corridor alone, Amtrak in FY '84 handled an average daily ridership of 29,480, and expects to exceed 31,000 this year. An estimated 48% would divert to automobile and 26% to air travel. (Comparable figures for the entire Amtrak system are 45% to auto and 29% to air.)

Across the nation, Amtrak is vital to millions of people who are permanently or temporarily unable to fly for medical reasons or are afraid to fly. In addition, many smaller cities which lack alternate—or effective alternate—public transportation depend heavily on Amtrak.

In fact, fully 75.5% of travel (passenger-miles) and 68.3% of passenger revenues were generated outside the Northeast Corridor in FY 1984.

In heavy snow, rain, and fog conditions, Amtrak is often the only passenger transportation moving; it is certainly the safest.

Amtrak's federal grant request of $684 million reflects a 24% decline since FY 1981 and is Amtrak's lowest funding level since FY 1977.

We support your efforts to maintain Amtrak as a strong element of America's transportation system.

Sincerely,

ROSS CAPON,
Executive Director.

U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS,
Washington, DC, April 23, 1985.

Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
Senate Hart Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: The U.S. Conference of Mayors is pleased to support your amendment to freeze funding for public transportation, the Urban Development Action Grant, (UDAG) and Amtrak at the Fiscal Year 1985 levels, during forthcoming deliberations on the first budget resolution.

In early March the Conference adopted policy calling for an across the board one-year freeze for all programs, except means-tested entitlements, as an effective and responsible method to achieve significant deficit reduction. The Conference also called for non-personal income tax increases specifically dedicated to deficit reduction.

Freezing these programs is preferable to the large cuts in transit and the elimination of UDAG and AMTRAK contained in both the Administration's initial FY86 budget and in the White House Senate leadership budget agreement. As the attached excerpts from our recent survey of proposed budget impacts indicate, loss of this funding would have a very severe impact on the mobility, economic development and infrastructure prospects of the nation's cities. Recent testimony covering UDAG and transit, presented by Conference Vice President Joseph Riley, Mayor of Charleston, also underscores this impact.

The Conference of Mayors appreciates your leadership in this area and we look forward to working with you towards successful retention of these vital programs.

Sincerely,

ERNEST N. MORIAL,
Mayor of New Orleans,
President.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of two hearings before the full Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

On Wednesday, May 1, 1985, beginning at 10 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the full committee will consider S. 979, the Energy Policy and Conservation Amendments Act of 1985. Testimony will be received from administration witnesses. Others wishing to testify or to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

On Friday, May 3, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the committee will consider the following nominees to be members of the board of directors of the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation: Tom Corcoran, of Illinois; Eric Reichl, of Connecticut; and Paul Webster MacAvoy, of New York. Those wishing to testify or to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

For further information regarding these hearings, you may wish to contact Mr. Richard Grundy, 202-224-2564.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, April 23, to receive testimony from Senate committees on their 1985 committee budget requests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Environmental Pollution of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, April 23, 1985, to mark up the extention of S. 652, amendments to the Clean Water Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 107, which designates the month of May 1985 as "Older Americans Month." I commend my dear friend and colleague, the junior Senator from Florida, for introducing this resolution which recognizes the significance of our Nation's elderly to our society.

The 65 years and older age group is the fastest growing segment of our population. Because of healthier living and advanced medical technology, the life expectancy of the average American is rising rapidly.

The Federal Government has been responsive to the needs of the elderly. With such programs as Social Security, Medicare, and the services provided under the Older Americans Act, senior citizens are better able to enjoy their retirement years.

But there is much more to be done. We are just now coming to realize the significance of our growing elderly population. New threats from health problems, such as Alzheimer's disease, and social problems, such as mandatory retirement, must be addressed. Other important issues, such as housing, transportation, income security, inflation, and crime, all of which affect the elderly more than any other age group, also must be addressed.

Senate Joint Resolution 107 is an important step in helping the elderly better cope with their problems. I believe if the Government and the general public become more aware of the problems that face the elderly on a daily basis, then it would be easier as a nation to solve these problems.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important resolution.●

RULES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD the Rules of the Special Committee on Aging.

The rules follow:

RULES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING OF THE U.S. SENATE

RULE 1. CONVENING OF MEETINGS AND HEARINGS

1.1 Meetings. The Committee shall meet to conduct Committee business at the call of the Chairman.

1.2 Special meetings. The members of the Committee may call additional meetings as provided in Senate Rule XXVI(3).

1.3 Notice and agenda.

(a) Hearings. The Committee shall make public announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing at least one week before its commencement.

(b) Meetings. The Chairman shall give the members written notice of any Committee meeting, accompanied by an agenda enumerating the items of business to be considered, at least 5 days in advance of such meeting.

(c) Shortened notice. A hearing or meeting may be called on not less than 24 hours notice if the Chairman, with the concurrence of the ranking minority member, determines that there is good cause to begin the hearing or meeting on shortened notice. An agenda will be furnished prior to such a meeting.

1.4 Presiding officer. The Chairman shall preside when present. If the Chairman is not present at any meeting or hearing, the ranking majority member present shall preside. Any member of the Committee may preside over the conduct of a hearing.

RULE 2. CLOSED SESSIONS AND CONFIDENTIAL MATERIALS

2.1 Procedure. All meetings and hearings shall be open to the public unless closed. To close a meeting or hearing or portion thereof, a motion shall be made and seconded to go into closed discussion of whether the meeting or hearing will concern the matters enumerated in Rule 2.3. Immediately after such discussion, the meetings or hearing may be closed by a vote in open session of a majority of the members of the Committee present.

2.2 Witness request. Any witness called for a hearing may submit a written request to the Chairman no later than twenty-four hours in advance for his examination to be in closed or open session. The Chairman shall inform the Committee of any such request.

2.3 Closed session subjects. A meeting or hearing or portion thereof may be closed if the matters to be discussed concern: (1) national security; (2) Committee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure; (3) matters tending to reflect adversely on the character or reputation or to invade the privacy of the individuals; (4) Committee investigations; (5) other matters enumerated in Senate Rule XXVI(5)(b).

2.4 Confidential matter. No record made of a closed session, or material declared confidential by a majority of the Committee, or report of the proceedings of a closed session, shall be made public, in whole or in part or by way of summary, unless specifically authorized by the Chairman and ranking minority member.

2.5 Broadcasting. (a) Control. Any meeting or hearing open to the public may be covered by television, radio, or still photography. Such coverage must be conducted in an orderly and unobtrusive manner, and the Chairman may for good cause terminate such coverage in whole or in part, or take such other action to control it as the circumstances may warrant.

(b) Request. A witness may request of the Chairman, on grounds of distraction, harassment, personal safety, or physical discomfort, that during his testimony cameras, media microphones, and lights shall not be directed at him.

RULE 3. QUORUMS AND VOTING

3.1 Reporting. A majority shall constitute a quorum for reporting a resolution, recommendation or report to the Senate.

3.2 Committee business. A third shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of Committee business, other than a final vote on reporting, providing a minority member is present. One member shall constitute a quorum for the receipt of evidence, the swearing of witnesses, and the taking of testimony at hearings.

3.3 Polling. (a) Subjects. The Committee may poll 1) internal Committee matters including those concerning the Committee's staff, records, and budget; 2) other Committee business which has been designated for polling at a meeting.

(b) Procedure. The Chairman shall circulate polling sheets to each member specifying the matter being polled and the time limit for completion of the poll. If any member so requests in advance of the meeting, the matter shall be held for meeting rather than being polled. The clerk shall keep a record of polls; if the Chairman determines that the polled matter is one of the areas enumerated in rule 2.3, the record of the poll shall be confidential. Any member may move at the Committee meeting following a poll for a vote on the polled decision.

RULE 4. INVESTIGATIONS

4.1 Authorization for investigations. All investigations shall be conducted upon a bipartisan basis by Committee staff. Investigations may be initiated by the Committee staff upon the approval of the Chairman and the ranking Minority member. Staff shall keep the Committee fully informed of the progress of continuing investigations, except where the Chairman and the ranking Minority member agree that there exists temporary cause for more limited knowledge.

4.2 Subpoenas. Subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records, or any other materials shall be issued by the Chairman, or by any other member of the Committee designated by him. Prior to the issuance of each subpoena, the ranking minority member, and any other member so requesting, shall be notified regarding the identity of the person to whom the subpoena will be issued and the nature of the information sought, and its relationship to the investigation.

4.3. Investigative Reports. All reports containing findings or recommendations stemming from Committee investigations shall be printed only with the approval of a majority of the members of the Committee.

RULE 5. HEARINGS

5.1 Notice. Witnesses called before the Committee shall be given, absent extraordinary circumstances, at least forty-eight hours' notice, and all witnesses called shall be furnished with a copy of these rules upon request.

5.2 Oath. All witnesses who testify to matters of fact shall be sworn unless the Committee waives the oath. The Chairman, or any member, may request and administer the oath.

5.3 Statement. Any witness desiring to make an introductory statement shall file 50 copies of such statement with the Chairman or clerk of the Committee 24 hours in advance of his appearance, unless the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member determine that there is good cause for a witness's failure to do so. A witness shall be allowed no more than ten minutes to orally summarize his prepared statement.

5.4 Counsel. (a) A witness's counsel shall be permitted to be present during his testimony at any public or closed hearing or deposition or staff interview to advise such witness of his rights, provided, however, that in the case of any witness who is an officer or employee of the government, or of a corporation or association, the Chairman may rule that representation by counsel from the government, corporation, or association creates a conflict of interest, and that the witness shall be represented by personal counsel not from the government, corporation or association.

(b) A witness who is unable for economic reasons to obtain counsel may inform the Committee at least 48 hours prior to the witness's appearance, and it will endeavor to obtain volunteer counsel for the witness. Such counsel shall be subject solely to the control of the witness and not the Committee. Failure to obtain counsel will not excuse the witness from appearing and testifying.

5.5 Transcript. An accurate electronic or stenographic record shall be kept of the testimony of all witnesses in executive and public hearings. Any witness shall be afforded, upon request, the right to review that portion of such record, and for this purpose, a copy of a witness's testimony in public or closed session shall be provided to the witness. Upon inspecting his transcript, within a time limit set by the committee clerk, a witness may request changes in testimony to correct errors of transcription, grammatical errors, and obvious errors of fact; the Chairman or a staff officer designated by him shall rule on such request.

5.6 Impugned persons. Any person who believes that evidence presented, or comment made by a member of staff, at a public hearing or at a closed hearing concerning which there have been public reports, tends to impugn his character or adversely affect his reputation may;

(a) file a sworn statement of facts relevant to the evidence or comment, which shall be placed in the hearing record;

(b) request the opportunity to appear personally before the Committee to testify in his own behalf; and

(c) submit questions in writing which he requests be used for the cross-examination of other witnesses called by the Committee. The Chairman shall inform the Committee of such requests for appearance or cross-examination. If the Committee so decides, the requested questions, or paraphrased versions of portions of them, shall be put to the other witnesses by a member or by staff.

5.7 Minority witnesses. Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee, the minority on the Committee shall be entitled, upon request made by a majority of the minority members to the Chairman, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify or produced documents with respect to the measure or matter under consideration during at least one day of hearing. Such request must be made before the completion of the hearing or, if subpoenas are required to call the minority witnesses, no later than three days before the completion of the hearing.

5.8 Conduct of witnesses, counsel and members of the audience. If, during public or executive sessions, a witness, his counsel, or any spectator conducts himself in such a manner as to prevent, impede, disrupt, obstruct, or interfere with the orderly administration of such hearing the Chairman or presiding Member of the subcommittee present during such hearing may request the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, his representative or any law enforcement official to eject said person from the hearing room.

RULE 6. DEPOSITIONS AND COMMISSIONS

6.1 Notice. Notices for the taking of depositions in an investigation authorized by the Committee shall be authorized and issued by the Chairman or by a staff officer designated by him. Such notices shall specify a time and place for examination, and the name of the staff officer or officers who will take the deposition. Unless otherwise specified, the deposition shall be in private. The Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to criminal or civil enforcement proceedings for a witness' failure to appear unless the deposition notice was accompanied by a Committee subpoena.

6.2 Counsel. Witnesses may be accompanied at the deposition by counsel to advise them of their rights, subject to the provisions of Rule 5.4.

6.3 Procedure. Witnesses shall be examined upon oath administered by an individual authorized by local law to administer oaths. Questions shall be propounded orally by Committee staff. Objections by the witness as to the form of questions shall be noted by the record. If a witness objects to a question and refuses to testify on the basis of relevance or privilege, the Committee staff may proceed with the deposition, or may, at that time or at a subsequent time, seek a ruling by telephone or otherwise on the objection from a member of the Committee. If the member overrules the objection, he may refer the matter to the Committee or he may order and direct the witness to answer the question, but the Committee shall not initiate procedures leading to civil or criminal enforcement unless the witness refuses to testify after he has been ordered and directed to answer by a member of the Committee.

6.4 Filing. The Committee staff shall see that the testimony is transcribed or electronically recorded. If it is transcribed, the witness shall be furnished with a copy for review. No later than five days thereafter, the witness shall return a signed copy, and the staff shall enter the changes, if any, requested by the witness in accordance, with Rule 5.6. If the witness fails to return a signed copy, the staff shall note on the transcript the date a copy was provided and the failure to return it. The individual administering the oath shall certify on the transcript that the witness was duly sworn in his presence, the transcriber shall certify that the transcript is a true record of the testimony, and the transcript shall then be filed with the Committee clerk. Committee staff may stipulate with the witness to changes in this procedure; deviations from this procedure which do not substantially impair the reliability of the record shall not relieve the witness from his obligation to testiy truthfully.

6.5 Commissions. The Committee may authorize the staff, by issuance of commissions, to fill in prepared subpoenas, conduct field hearings, inspect locations, facilities, or systems of records, or otherwise act on behalf of the Committee. Commissions shall be accompanied by instructions from the Committee regulating their use.

RULE 7. SUBCOMMITTEES

7.1 Establishment. The Committee will operate as a Committee of the Whole, reserving to itself the right to establish temporary subcommittees at any time by majority vote. The Chairman of the full Committee and the Ranking Minority Member shall be ex officio members of all subcommittees.

7.2 Jurisdiction. Within its jurisdiction, as described in the Standing Rules of the Senate, each subcommittee is authorized to conduct investigations, including use of subpoenas, depositions, and commissions.

7.3 Rules. A subcommittee shall be governed by the Committee rules, except that its quorum for all business shall be one third of the subcommittee membership, and for hearings shall be one member.

8. Reports. Committee reports incorporating Committee findings and recommendations shall be printed only with the prior approval of the Committee, after an adequate period for review and comment. The printing, as Committee documents, of materials prepared by staff for informational purposes, or the printing of materials not originating with the Committee or staff, shall require prior consultation with the minority staff; these publications shall have the following language printed on the cover of the document: "Note: This document has been printed for informational purposes. It does not represent either findings or recommendations formally adopted by the Committee."

9. Amendments of Rules. The rules of the Committee may be amended or revised at any time, provided that not less than a majority of the Committee present so determine at a Committee meeting preceded by at least 3 days notice of the amendments or revisions proposed.●

REVERENCE FOR LIFE

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been honored to address this chamber on numerous occasions on the issue of abortion. When I have been fortunate enough to have those opportunities, I have attempted to present my colleagues with the most compelling facts and insights available to me on this crucial topic. You have heard me express the view that abortion generally is the immoral practice of terminating the lives of innocent unborn babies, and you have heard me support this belief with facts. I have listened to my colleagues state their positions on abortion as well. However, it is wise for the Senate to hear opinions and viewpoints of people who do not serve in this body; indeed it pays us to listen to those we represent.

In that spirit, Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues here a speech which was recently delivered by Elder Russell M. Nelson, a member of The Council of Twelve of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. I have found that the opinions of members of the clergy are often among the most reasoned and thoughtful views that we can consider. The thoughts with which our religious leaders provide us are views which are sufficiently independent from the heated debate of the Senate. They also offer us the moral perspective which we must keep in mind even when we address the most temporal matters. Elder Nelson's remarks are no exception to this. In his speech he lucidly expresses the horrors of abortion and refutes, both factually and ethically, the primary arguments abortion advocates have relied on for years.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues in the Senate to read Elder Nelson's address. After they do so they will know many of the compelling reasons why America must end abortion, a practice which has cost 16½ million lives since 1973 and which has denied the precious gift of life to 4,000 unborn babies since this time yesterday.

The address follows:

REVERENCE FOR LIFE: GENERAL CONFERENCE, APRIL 6, 1985

(Russell M. Nelson)

Unitedly, we thank the Almighty for the wondrous prolongation of the life of Elder Bruce R. McConkie, enabling him to preach that powerful sermon. Our gratitude is profound!

I pray for the Spirit of the Lord to help me communicate his mind and will on a very vital and sensitive subject. I apologize for the use of words repugnant to me and illsuited to this hallowed pulpit. I do so only for clarity of communication regarding reverence for human life.

As sons and daughters of God, we cherish life as a gift from him.

A heavy toll on life is included among the evils of war. Data from all nations are appalling. For the United States of America, 100,000 were killed in World War I. Over 400,000 died in World War II. In the first 200 years as a nation, the lives of over one million Americans were lost due to war.

Regrettable as is the loss of loved ones from war, these figures are dwarfed by the toll of another war that annually claims more casualties than the total number of fatalities from all the wars of this nation.

It is a war on the defenseless—and the voiceless. It is a war on the unborn.

This war, labeled abortion, is of epidemic proportion and is waged globally. Over 55 million abortions were reported worldwide in the year 1974 alone.[1] Sixty-four percent of the world's population now live in societies that legally sanction this practice.[2] In the United States of America, over 1.5 million abortions are performed annually.[3] About 30 percent of all pregnancies now end in abortion.[4] In some metropolitan areas, there are more abortions performed than live births.[5] Comparable data also come from other nations.

Yet society professes reverence for human life. We weep for those who die, pray and work for those whose lives are in jeopardy. For years, I have labored with other doctors here and abroad, struggling to prolong life. It is impossible to describe the grief a physician feels when the life of a patient is lost. Can anyone imagine how we feel when life is destroyed at its roots, as though it were a thing of naught?

What sense of inconsistency can allow people to grieve for their dead, yet be calloused to this baleful war being waged on life at the time of its silent development? What logic would encouage efforts to preserve the life of a critically ill 12-week-old infant, but countenance the termination of another life 12 weeks after inception? More attention is seemingly focused on the fate of a life at some penitentiary's death row than on the millions totally deprived of life's opportunity through such odious carnage before birth.

The Lord has repeatedly declared this devine imperative: "Thou shalt not kill."[6] Recently he added, "nor do anything like unto it" (D&C 59:6).

Even before the fullness of the gospel was restored, the enlightened understood the sanctity of life. John Calvin, 16th century reformer, wrote:

"If it seems more disgraceful that a man be killed in his own home than in his field—since for every man his home is his sanctuary—how much more abominable is it . . . to kill a fetus . . . who has not yet been brought into the light.[7]"

But what impropriety could now legalize that which has been forbidden by the laws of God from the dawn of time? What twisted reasoning has transformed mythical concepts into contorted slogans assenting to a practice which is consummately wrong?

These slogans begin with proper concern for the health of the mother. Infrequently, instances may occur in which the continuation of pregnancy could be life-threatening to the mother. When deemed by competent medical authorities that the life of one must be terminated in order to save the life of the other, many agree that it is better to spare the mother. But these circumstances are rare, particularly where modern medical care is available.

Another sympathetic concern applies to pregnancies resulting from rape or incest. The tragedy of this despoilment is compounded because, in such relationships, freedom of choice is denied the woman who is innocently involved.

But less than three percent of all abortions are performed for these two reasons.[8] The other 97 percent are for what may be termed reasons of convenience.

Some argue for abortion because a malformed child may result. The harmful effects of certain infectious or toxic agents in the first trimester of pregnancy are real.

The experience of a couple whom I shall identify as Brother and Sister Brown* is instructive. Sister Brown was only 21 years old at the time, a beautiful woman and a devoted wife. In her first trimester, she contracted the dreaded German measles.

Abortion was advised because the developing baby would almost surely be damaged. Some members of her family, out of loving concern, applied additional pressure for an abortion. "Don't burden yourself financially with a handicapped child," they argued. "You are too young and too poor."

Devotedly they consulted their bishop. He referred them to their state president, who listened to their serious concern and counseled them not to terminate the life of this baby, even though the child might have a problem. He quoted this scripture:

Trust in the LORD with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths. (Prov. 3:5-6)

They chose to follow that counsel and permit their child to be born—a beautiful little girl, normal in every respect, except for total hearing loss that became evident later. After an evaluation at a school for the deaf, Brother and Sister Brown were advised that this child had the intellect of a genius. Now some 20 years later, she attends a major university on a scholarship.

When recently asked how they felt about their once-weighty decision, the mother quickly responded, "She is one of the great joys of my life! She is such a choice spirit! Though she lost the sense of hearing, she has compensated with augmented ability otherwise. Her eyes are alive with constant attention. She excels in dancing, even though she perceives the sounds of music from vibrations. She has served as an officer in school. But most significant is her guileless spirit—her unconditional love. She has taught us to serve and to share. Her spiritual insights have helped us to know God and his purposes. My husband and I are so grateful that she is one of our children."

Consider another individual weighing the consequences of her pregnancy. She was beyond the normal age for bearing children. She announced to her doctor that her husband was an alcoholic with a syphilitic infection. One of her children had been born dead. Another child was blind. Another had tuberculosis. Her family had a history of deafness. Finally she confessed that she was living in abject poverty. If this true historical situation were posed today, many would recommend abortion. The child born from that pregnancy became the renowned composer, Ludwig van Beethoven.

But the principle involved extends beyond those who may become great. If one is to be deprived of life because of potential for developing physical problems, consistency would dictate that those who already have such deficiencies should likewise be terminated. Continuing then, those who are either infirm, incompetent, or inconvenient should be eliminated by those in power. Such irreverence for life is unthinkable!

Another contention raised is that a woman is free to choose what she does with her own body. To a certain extent this is true for each of us. We are free to think. We are free to plan. And then we are free to do. But once an action has been taken, we are never free from its consequences. Those considering abortion have already exercised certain choices.

To clarify this concept, we can learn from the astronaut. Any time during the selection process, planning, and preparation, he is free to withdraw. But once the powerful rocket fuel is ignited, he is no longer free to choose. Now he is bound by the consequences of his choice. Even if difficulties develop and he might wish otherwise, the choice made was sealed by action.

So it is with those who would tamper with the God-given power of procreation. They are free to think and plan otherwise. But their choice is sealed by action.

The woman's choice for her own body does not validate choice for the body of another. The expression "terminate the pregnancy" applies literally only to the woman. The consequence of terminating the fetus therein involves the body and very life of another. These two individuals have separate brains, separate hearts, and separate circulatory systems. To pretend that there is no child and no life there is to deny reality.

It is not a question of when "meaningful life" begins or when the spirit "quickens" the body. In the biological sciences, it is known that life begins when two germ cells unite to become one cell, bringing together 23 chromosomes from both the father and from the mother. These chromosomes contain thousands of genes. In a marvelous process involving a combination of genetic coding by which all the basic human characteristics of the unborn person are established, a new DNA complex is formed. A continuum of growth results in a new human being. The onset of life is not a debatable issue but a fact of science.

Approximately 22 days after the two cells have united, a little heart begins to beat. At 26 days, the circulation of blood begins.[9]

Scripture declares that the "life of the flesh is in the blood" (Lev. 17:11). Abortion sheds that innocent blood.

Another slogan relates to population control. Many in developing nations unknowingly ascribe their lack of prosperity to overpopulation. While they grovel in ignorance of God and his commandments, they may worship objects of their own creation (or nothing at all) while unsuccessfully attempting to limit their population by the rampant practice of abortion. They live in squalor, oblivious to the divine teaching, stated in the scriptures not once, but 34 times,[10] that people will prosper in the land only if they obey the commandments of God.

How can God fulfill his promise to prosper his children in obedience if they worship idols or destroy life created by him—destined to be in his very image?

They will prosper only when their education includes faith in and obedience to the God of this world, who said,

I, the Lord, . . . built the earth, my very handiwork; and all things therein are mine. And it is my purpose to provide . . . . But it must needs be done in mine own way. . . . For the earth is full, and there is enough and to spare. (D&C 104:14-17; emphasis added.)

Now, as a servant of the Lord, I dutifully warn those who advocate and practice abortion that they incur the wrath of Almighty God who declared, "If men . . . hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, . . . he shall be surely punished" (Ex. 21:22).

Of those who shed innocent blood, a prophet declared:

The judgments which [God] shall exercise . . . in his wrath [shall] be just; and the blood of the innocent shall stand as a witness against them, yea, and cry mightily against them at the last day. (Alma 14:11.)

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has consistently opposed the practice of abortion. One hundred years ago the First Presidency wrote:

And we again take this opportunity of warning the Latter-day Saints against those . . . practices of foeticide and infanticide.[11]

Early in his presidency, our beloved President Spencer W. Kimball said, "We decry abortions and ask our people to refrain from this serious transgression." [12]

Why destroy a life that could bring such joy to others?

Now, is there hope for those who have so sinned without full understanding, who now suffer heartbreak? Yes. So far as is known, the Lord does not regard this transgression as murder. And, "as far as has been revealed, a person may repent and be forgiven for the sin of abortion." [13] Gratefully, we know the Lord will help all who are truly repentant.

Yes, life is precious! No one can cuddle a cherished newborn baby, look into those beautiful eyes, feel the little fingers and caress that miraculous creation without deepening reverence for life and for our Creator.

Life comes from life. It is a gift from our Heavenly Father. It is eternal as he is eternal. Innocent life is not sent by him to be destroyed! This doctrine is not of me but is that of the living God, and of his Divine Son, which I testify in the name of Jesus Christ, amen.●

COST OVERRUNS AND PROGRAM DELAYS IN DEFENSE PROCUREMENT

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I was reading a clipping out of the New York Times last week on the problems of cost overruns and program delays in Defense procurement. It was an op-ed piece written by Thomas V. Jones, board chairman and chief executive officer of the Northrop Corp. Tom addressed the need for creative and well-managed defense companies—companies operating in a free competitive environment and held accountable for their commitments.

With all the attention focused lately on defense contractors—on overpricing, questionable billings, inefficiencies, and the like, this seems to be a timely article.

But it was written a decade ago.

Mr. President, Tom Jones' views are just as relevant today as they were in 1976. I think there is a wisdom in his views that has not been heeded by all elements of the defense contracting industry.

I ask that the New York Times article by Thomas V. Jones be printed in the RECORD, complete with the 1976 copyright date, to demonstrate there is nothing really new under the Sun—and to suggest it is never to late for the defense industry to follow some good advice.

The article follows:

FOR A SOUND DEFENSE INDUSTRY

(By Thomas V. Jones)

LOS ANGELES—The General Accounting Office's recent report on the status of the country's major weapons-systems procurement programs revealed that nearly 80 percent are suffering cost overruns. Some program costs have increased more than 200 percent. Some are delayed a year or more. This sad record has become so repetitive there seems to be a tendency to consider cost overruns, schedule delays and technical disappointments part of the price we must pay for national security.

This is simply not the case. There is no reason why the defense industry cannot be as efficient as any other sector of the economy. The Government, the Congress the public, the investment community and the defense industry must get rid of the notion that defense companies are somehow different, that they cannot be confined within the same standards of competitive performance by which we measure the rest of our market economy. It is wrong to believe that, regardless of performance, a defense company has a right to exist simply because it serves national security; a defense company must earn it way by the manner in which it serves that national security.

Defense has been dealt with as if it were apart from the rest of our national objectives, when, in fact, defense, social progress and economic stability are essential and constant elements of our national well-being.

When there was a clear and present danger to the country, before 1950, nothing was spared to provide defense, regardless of cost. When the crisis passed, our defense forces and the defense industry were cut back rapidly. The greatest example of this "crisis management" was the massive effort of World War II, followed by the near-total dismantling of our defense establishment, including the industry that served it.

The Berlin blockade, the invasion of Korea, and the advent of the intercontinental ballistic missiles changed all that. We could no longer afford the luxury of waiting for a crisis before building up our defense capability at the expense of other national objectives, and then eliminating it in periods of calm to free funds again for other programs.

The Government and the Congress decided than that strong defense forces must be maintained on a permanent basis, and that national security should be accommodated within the Federal budget, together with social and economic programs as interrelated elements of our long-term national policy. This new concept called upon us to meet all our national objectives together while maintaining the integrity of the national budget as a whole.

Unfortunately, the significance of this change and the accompanying opportunity to improve effectiveness have been overlooked. The bad procurement habits and the tradition of crisis management persisted. They need not, and should not be allowed to continue.

In the past, a defense company was not judged by the same standards of sound planning, performance, financial strength and efficiency that were applied to other businesses. In today's environment of defense stability, defense companies must be held accountable for their commitments. The advantage of stability should bring with it the responsibility of management performance. The free competitive environment that has worked so well to achieve the social and economic standards that we enjoy today can now contribute to meeting our defense requirements efficiently.

Considerations of politics, geographical self-interest, and the availability of Government-owned plant and equipment—frequently poorly suited to the particular job—do not produce efficiencies. There must be competition based on the quality of a company's products, its demonstated ability to commit itself to cost and schedule guarantees, and its capacity to provide sufficient financial strength to back those commitments.

Creative, well-managed defense companies should represent some of the most attractive investments available and should compete in the financial community on that basis for capital needed for new plants and equipment. They should not expect the taxpayer to carry this burden or the Government to provide subsidies to protect them from the rigors of competition. Those companies that respond to the challenge and meet their commitments will be profitable. Those that do not will deservedly fail.

The responsibility is squarely before the industry: Use the creativity and the management techniques of our free economy to provide the highest level of national security within the allocated budget and be judged on the way these goals are met. If the procurement process does not insist on the responsibility of individual companies, it will weaken the defense industry as a whole and ultimately the security of the nation it serves.

Our defense is important; it deserves the best our competitive system has to offer. It is time to bring the defense industry into that system.●

PETER M. WEGE RECEIVES ASIAN BENEVOLENT CORPS AWARD

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the Asian Benevolent Corps was founded in 1963 as a nonprofit, multiservice organization providing charitable, cultural and community services and programs. Ambassadors, Members of Congress, and distinguished educators have served on its Advisory Council.

The Asian Benevolent Corps presented its first Pioneer of the Decade Award on April 11, 1985, to Mr. Peter M. Wege, a prominent citizen of Grand Rapids, MI. Mr. Wege serves as vice chairman of Steelcase, Inc., one of the world's largest office furniture manufacturers.

Mr. President, I ask that the following material—consisting of award presentation remarks by Dr. Dwan Tai, Board Chairperson of the Asian Benevolent Corps, and the text of the Award Proclamation—be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

REMARKS BY DR. DWAN TAI

Many of us who have known Mr. Peter M. Wege over the past decades respect and appreciate the multitude of good works he has done—and the number of people he has helped. Indeed, in many cases, he has changed whole lives.

Tonight, we would like to take this opportunity to honor Mr. Wege, the man, and his many creative contributions.

As the chairperson of the Asian Benevolent Corps of New York and Washington, DC, and on behalf of its Board of Trustees, I hereby present to you, Mr. Peter M. Wege, the Asian Benevolent Corps' Pioneer of the Decade Award. The citation on this silver engraved plaque reads:

"For being an innovative pioneer, having the vision and courage to invest in people and projects to make this a better world,

"For being a unique role model of compassion and commitment, and

"For bravely leading the way by inspiring and supporting new approaches to education, economic development, and world understanding."●

PEACE CORPS AND NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, at a time when most Americans think of retirement and leaving the work force, Lynn Blaylock and his wife Jean of Minneapolis, MN, signed up with the Peace Corps to give 2 years of their lives helping the residents of Barbados to improve their quality of life.

And Mr. Blaylock, 63 years old, with a wealth of education, experience and lifetime skills, was selected one of Peace Corps' 1985 Volunteers of the Year for his exceptional work in animal nutrition in the Caribbean. He has made numerous surveys and has worked with local farmers to increase and improve sheep and cattle feeds to increase the production of meat and dairy products available for consumption.

He has involved the people of his community, too, in the work he is doing. Appealing to the Hillcrest Methodist Church in Minneapolis, Mr. Blaylock raised funds to purchase the materials for enlarging the sheep pen of a handicapped sheep breeder, and physically assisted with the construction. As a result of the larger pen, the quality of the herd will improve and the small farmer will have the opportunity to earn more income. Not only will this farmer be helped through the efforts of Lynn Blaylock, but the people of Lynn's hometown community have already participated in the type of cross-cultural exchange for which Peace Corps is noted.

Through the interpersonal link formed by the Blaylocks, the peoples of Barbados and Minnesota are learning more about what each is really like.

Mrs. Blaylock is also serving as a Peace Corps Volunteer, drawing upon her long experience as a librarian to work at the Barbados library and for the school library bookmobile service. She also has developed a regional library system for the Peace Corps/Eastern Caribbean.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Blaylock will be honored in Washington during National Volunteer Week, April 22-26, by the Peace Corps and by the President in a White House ceremony. I know the residents of Minnesota will join me in recognizing Lynn Blaylock for his inestimable contribution to the people he serves and we all salute his hard work and dedication to the ideals of international friendship and understanding.●

THE BIBLE IN INAUGURAL HISTORY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the inauguration of the President on January 21, 1985, was the 50th such ceremony in American history. It was a significant moment in the bicentennial cycle, and a time to recall fundamental American values.

When General Washington took the office of President of the United States 196 years ago, he solemnized his spoken oath by laying his hand upon the Bible, and each of his successors has followed that tradition. While many details of the ceremony of oath-taking and its attendant national celebrations have changed over the years, this fundamental tradition endures.

I am indebted to Judge Edward S. Delaplaine for his illuminating article recalling the role of the Bible in American Presidential inaugurations, which appeared in the Frederick, MD, News and Post of February 22, 1985.

Mr. President, I commend the article to my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE BIBLE HAS HAD INTRINSIC ROLE IN ALL PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATIONS

(By Judge Edward S. Delaplaine)

With the aid of the miracle of television, countless millions saw and heard Ronald Reagan both in the White House and in Statuary Hall take the oath of office for the second term as President. Likewise, they saw and heard George Bush take the oath for the second term as Vice President. During the commentary on the ceremonies, John Chancellor remarked in conversation with Tom Brokaw that he wondered why President Reagan put his left hand on the Bible when taking the oath from Chief Justice Warren Burger.

Some years ago, during the restoration of the Roger Brooke Taney Home on Bentz Street in Frederick, Henry Roben, a Baltimore artist, was commissioned to paint a portrait of Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney administering the oath of office to President Lincoln. The artist asked the logical question whether Lincoln raised his right hand or placed it on the Bible.

For several months research was conducted in search of the answer. The decision was finally reached that Lincoln had placed his right hand on the Bible.

It was not until after President Reagan's second inauguration that a similar question arose as to this formality at the inauguration of George Washington.

Actually the question is not of intrinsic importance, except for an artist who is portraying the scene. The unimportance of ceremonial form in swear-in ceremonies has been illustrated by the change in custom in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court for Frederick County. For many years former Clerk of the Court Ellis C. Wachter requested that the left hand be placed on the Bible, but a short time before Charles C. Keller succeeded him as Clerk of the Court the use of the Bible was abandoned entirely.

When I took the oath before Maryland's 50th Governor, Harry W. Nice, in the Governor's mansion to serve as Judge of the Maryland Court of Appeals, I held an open Bible while the Governor, who was a Methodist minister's son, pointed to a favorite passage in the Bible, Joshua 1:28, which he said he believed would be helpful to keep in mind.

For the inaugural of a President of the United States, use of the Bible is in accord with the practice established by George Washington 196 years ago, and is unquestionably impressive and appropriate for the inauguration of the highest official of the world's leading nation.

Very striking is the contrast between Washington's inaugural in 1789 and Ronald Reagan's in 1985. With the exception of President Reagan, who was prevented by zero weather from having his inaugural ceremony outdoors, most of the Presidents in recent years have taken the oath of office in front of the Capitol in Washington. But on April 30, 1789, George Washington was inaugurated in the City of New York, at that time the capital of the nation, where the United States Senate and the House of Representatives were holding their sessions.

At many of the inaugurations it has been the custom of the President to invite the Chief Justice of the United States to administer the oath. When President Washington was inaugurated, no member of the Supreme Court had yet been appointed. It was not until the following September that President Washington appointed John Jay as the first Chief Justice of the United States.

The inaugurations have dramatized the contrast between the leisurely life of the American people in the early days of the nation and life in the age of speed. It was on the 14th of April, 1789, when George Washington was notified at Mount Vernon that the Electoral College had elected him by unanimous vote to be President of the United States. On the 16th of April he departed from Mount Vernon with great reluctance, giving farewell to "private life and domestic felicity," and leaving his wife to come to New York whenever she was ready. The General was now a private citizen, and though he had been out of the Army for five years he was welcomed triumphantly at every stage of his journey to New York. His arrival there on the 23rd was like the triumphal return of Caesar to his Capital.

In 1789 the first Congress was meeting in Federal Hall on Wall Street at the head of Broad Street. This building had been the meeting place of the Continental Congress, and when the Congress decided to meet in New York City, the building became the Nation's Capitol; alteration had to be made to provide two rooms for the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The Franklin House at No. 3 Cherry Street, which had been the residence of Presidents of the Continental Congress, was chosen as the home of President Washington.

After Washington's arrival in New York City, Congress, deciding to install him on the 30th of April, appointed a Joint Committee of eight members to escort him from the President's home to Federal Hall.

About noon the eight assistants of the Joint Committee riding horseback conducted several hundred militia to the President's home to escort him to his inauguration. It was about half past twelve when Washington entered the state coach with four horses, and the parade started on the way to Federal Hall. Washington was alone in the coach. Behind him were his two secretaries riding in Washington's own coach. Then came Robert R. Livingston, the Chancellor of the State of New York, who had been chosen to administer the oath of office. Following the Judge were city, county, and national officials, and the diplomatic representatives from Great Britain and Spain.

The procession moved slowly between lines of cheering crowds. When it came to a stop about 200 yards south of Wall Street, Washington and all the others emerged from the vehicles and walked up Broad Street to Federal Hall.

Federal Hall had recently been remodeled, and the Senate Chamber on the second floor, where the members of Congress were waiting for the President-elect, had been newly decorated. At the north end of the room were three windows draped in red damask. Below the central window was a high dais on which were three chairs, the central one under a canopy with drapery similar to that over the windows. At the south end of the room were red curtains draped around three doors that opened to a half-enclosed portico overlooking Wall and Broad streets.

Before Washington walked toward the dais, the Senators, diplomats, and other guests were seated on the west side of the aisle, while members of the House of Representatives were on the east side. All immediately arose, and Washington bowed to both sides as he walked toward the dais. In front of the dais stood the Vice President of the United States, John Adams, of Massachusetts, the man with acid tongue and pen, who had been elected by only 34 votes out of 69 votes cast by the Electoral College. Adams escorted the General to the central seat under the canopy. The General sat silently between the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, Frederick A.C. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania.

After a brief pause the Vice President arose and bluntly addressed the General:

"Sir, the Senate and the House of Representatives are ready to attend you to take the oath required by the Constitution. It will be administered by the Chancellor of the State of New York."

"I am ready to proceed," said Washington. Adams then led the way through the arched central door to the portico.

On entering the portico Washington saw a small table draped in red and an armchair beside it. On the table was a large leather-bound Bible on a red velvet cushion. There had been excitement when no Bible could be found in Federal Hall. At the last moment the leather-bound Bible was hastily borrowed from St. John's Masonic Lodge nearby.

Even before Washington took the oath of office, there were cheering crowds in the streets. There also were many gazing through open windows and from roof tops. The cheering did not cease until after the General had bowed time and again and finally had walked back to the chair beside the table. By this time the portico was crowded, somewhat like Statuary Hall where Reagan took the oath of office as President and Bush took the oath as Vice President. In the protico places had been reserved for Chancellor Livingston, Vice President Adams and George Clinton, Governor of New York.

The historic moment had arrived. The great hero, with powdered hair, made an impressive appearance in brown broadcloth suit and white stockings and silver buckles on his shoes. One oil painting shows him holding a sword. It was noticed that Washington at 57 was showing his age. The terrible strain throughout the Revolutionary War and his great anxiety in the fight for adoption of the Constitution and the long struggle for its ratification had put deep lines in his face.

Chancellor Livingston in black robe stepped forward. Unlike Chief Justice Taney, who was 30 years older than Lincoln at the inauguration in 1861, Livingston at the age of 41 was 16 years younger than Washington. However, Livingston had been an active Patriot for many years. On June 15, 1775, he had a seat in Congress at Philadelphia when Thomas Johnson, a member of Congress from Maryland, nominated Colonel George Washington of Virginia for Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army. Livingston was also one of the members of the committee that was appointed in 1776 to draft a Declaration of Independence from Great Britian, but necessary absence from Congress prevented him from signing it.

One difference between the first inauguration and recent ones is the type of person holding the Bible for the President. At the first inauguration, the Bible was held by Samuel Otis, the Secretary of the Senate. At the inauguration of Lincoln in 1861, the Bible was held by the Secretary of the Supreme Court, William Thomas Carroll. At the inauguration of President Reagan, the Bible was held, in accord with the custom in recent years, by the wife of the President—a sign indicating the entry of women into the field of politics and government.

At the ceremony on the portico of Federal Hall, the Secretary of the Senate lifted the cushion and Bible from the table and stood between the President and the Judge. When the Judge was ready to administer the oath, Washington placed his right hand upon the Bible. The Judge, quoting the provision in Article II of the Constitution, asked Washington "Do you solemnly swear that you will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of your ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States?"

"I solemnly swear," Washington repeated, adding "So help me God." At that moment he bent forward and kissed the Bible.

"It is done," Livingston exclaimed and, turning to the crowd in the street, he made a broad gesture and shouted, "Long live George Washington, President of the United States!"

While Washington's head was still bowed, the crowd roared: "God bless our President!" Louder and louder were the cheers. Presently there came the raising of the American flag to the cupola of Federal Hall. It was the signal to the Battery for the firing of a 13-gun salute in tribute to the 13 States, notwithstanding that two of the States—South Carolina and Rhode Island—had not yet joined the Union by ratifying the Constitution. Finally the bells of the churches of New York rang out in tribute to the newly elected President.

Again and again Washington acknowledged the cheers of the crowd. At last he returned to the Senate Chamber and took his seat on the dais while the Congressmen and others returned to their chairs.

Washington needed no introduction. After a short pause he arose and began the reading of his inauguaral address. There was a marked difference, of course, between his address and the address of President Reagan. Mr. Reagan had the advantage of having served for a number of years in high public office and having gained experience in public speaking, whereas Washington had limited experience in office and speech. Washington frankly acknowledged in his inaugural address that he was conscious of his "inferior endowments" and his lack of practice in "the duties of civil administration." He promised that he would rely upon "that Almighty Being who rules over the Universe."

In speaking of the duties of the office, he said that he would rely largely upon the judgment of the Congress. In concluding, he said again that he would resort to "the benign parent of the human race" for divine blessing on wise measures upon which the success of the American Government must depend.

American History gives us the familiar picture of George Washington praying in desperation for divine help during the terrible winter at Valley Forge. Yet almost entirely overlooked is the story that he walked seven blocks on Inauguration Day to attend a religious service in a small chapel in New York to pray there for divine guidance.

The Congress had voted to hold their religious service in Trinity Episcopal Church after the inauguration, and the Chaplain of the Senate, Rt. Rev. Samuel Provoost, Rector of the church and Bishop of New York, was chosen to conduct it. Destiny wrought a change in the plans.

A fire broke out in the church and seriously damaged it, and the repairs had not yet been completed. Accordingly, arrangements were made to hold the service in St. Paul's Chapel. The little chapel was poorly lighted and it contained only a few dozen pews. It was a contrast to the National Cathedral in Washington, where President Reagan and Vice President Bush attended a service before their inauguration. While St. Paul's Chapel was not large enough to accommodate all of the members of Congress and their guests, nevertheless it served the purpose for President Washington, a staunch Episcopal churchman, who was delighted to attend the religious service.

Washington was delighted also to have a chance to relax by walking the entire distance to the chapel. At the end of the walk, he immediately entered the chapel for a moment of meditation. The Bishop offered numerous prayers for the President and for the success of the new Republic. There was little music and no sermon. However, Washington had an opportunity to pray for divine guidance and for courage such as that which sustained him in the Revolution.

On emerging from the chapel after the brief service, Washington and his companions found coaches waiting for them. The President was escorted by the Joint Committee to his home. There he had a chance to reflect upon the unusual events of the day and to meditate upon what might face him in the years ahead.

REMEMBRANCE OF THE HOLOCAUST

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in the commemoration of the 40th anniversary of the end of the Holocaust. It is difficult to capture with mere words one of the darkest periods in the history of mankind. The very concept of the concentration camps, the gas chambers, and the massive slaughter of helpless victims brings shock and disbelief to any civilized human being. We can never allow ourselves to forget that 6 million Jews and millions of others perished in the Nazi's systematic program of extermination.

We can never forget that they died, and we can never forget why they died—they died victims of the tyranny and single minded bigotry of the Third Reich. The genocide committed by the Nazi regime is not simply a lesson in history now passed forever from our view. It is a lesson of the present and future. It is imperative that we remain the watchdog against such atrocities.

The liberation of the concentration camps at the end of the Second World War bears witness to the fact that the forces of destruction and oppression can be overcome, and the people of the world can triumph in the name of humanity. Let us use this time in history to remember those events of the past. Let us use this time in history to insure that mankind will never again stand idly by in the face of such horror. ●

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE OF MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to speak on behalf of Senate Joint Resolution 101. My colleague from Michigan, Senator CARL LEVIN has introduced this legislation to commemorate the victims of the Armenian genocide and I am proud to be a cosponsor.

From 1915 to 1923 the Armenian people fell victim to one of the most horrible crimes in our history. Over 1½ million men, women, and children were brutally and senselessly slaughtered.

Millions were relocated and forced to march hundreds of miles without food or water. Hundreds of thousands perished from exhaustion, thirst and starvation on these death marches. Thousands more were drowned at sea, or stoned to death in burial pits.

Henry Morgenthau, Sr., who was the Ambassador to Turkey at that time observed,

I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

As horrible as these atrocities were we cannot afford to blot this memory from the conscience of mankind. That would be the easy path, but it is a path that leads in a dangerous direction.

History has a terrifying way of repeating itself if no one stops to take notice. Less than 20 years after the Armenian genocide, Hitler began his massacre of millions of European Jews. In the past decade we have seen the terrible specter of genocide again in Cambodia.

The lessons of these atrocities must never be forgotten. Only through the peaceful remembrance of these events can we ensure a future that will be free of similar terror. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 101, and recognize April 24, 1985, as a "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."

The many brave Armenian men and women who have survived the massacres of 70 years ago, as well the generations that succeeded them, and have come to live peacefully and prosperously in this country deserve our support and recognition on the anniversary of this terrible event.●

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 12 NOON

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the close of business today the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 12 noon, Wednesday, April 24, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders tomorrow under the standing order, that there be special orders, not to exceed 15 minutes each, for the following Senators: Senator PROXMIRE, Senator LEVIN, Senator SPECTER, Senator D'AMATO, Senator BOSCHWITZ, and Senator METZENBAUM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1:45 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, pursuant to the provisions of Senate Resolution 100, the official photograph of the Senate will be taken at 2 p.m. tomorrow afternoon. All Senators are asked to be in the Chamber in their seats by 1:50 p.m. tomorrow.

Following routine morning business, it will be the intention of the majority leader to turn to Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution, and any items on the Legislative or Executive Calendars cleared for action by unanimous consent.

Let me indicate on the budget resolution that with the President addressing the Nation tomorrow on the deficit, I doubt that there will be any votes tomorrow. I would hope that I may be able to work out some arrangement with the minority leader in the morning to permit us to have general debate on the budget resolution with no amendments being offered on either side tomorrow, but at least discussing the budget, and asking that the time used be counted against the 50-hour statutory time.

RECESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 12 noon, Wednesday, April 24, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at 9:11 p.m., rececessed until Wednesday, April 24, 1985, at 12 noon.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 23, 1985:

THE JUDICIARY

J. Frederick Motz, of Maryland, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Maryland vice a new position created by Public Law 98-353, approved July 10, 1984.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Gary L. Bauer, of Virginia, to be Under Secretary of Education, vice Gary L. Jones, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Douglas A. Riggs, of Alaska, to be General Counsel of the Department of Commerce, vice Irving P. Margulies, resigned.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate April 23, 1985:

IN THE COAST GUARD

The following-named captain of the Coast Guard Reserve to be a permanent commissioned officer in the Coast Guard Reserve in the grade of commodore:

Capt. Bennett S. Sparks, USCGR.

The above nomination was approved subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, April 23, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, April 22, 1985)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

RECESS

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House recess for 5 minutes in order that the Reverend Andrew Brown, an apostle of peace and dean of ministers in Indiana, might give the opening prayer for April 23, 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House now stands in recess for 5 minutes.

Accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 48 minutes a.m., April 23, 1985), the House stood in recess for 5 minutes.

□ 950

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOLEY] at 9 o'clock and 54 minutes a.m.

PRAYER

The Reverend Andrew Brown, St. John's Missionary Baptist Church, Indianapolis, IN, offered the following prayer:

Grant us Thy love, O gracious Heavenly Father, that we as a nation may overcome our impatience with the seeming slow results of the redemptive work in which we are engaged. We pray, O God, that our Representatives may not grow impatient in their work against the ignorance or prejudices of our friends; our enemies; or fellow workers. Help us to be militant without being unkind, uncompromising without being intolerant, devoted without being bigoted. Strengthen and embolden these Thy servant's spirits, O God, who art power, seize and possess all of us, that we all will no longer be unsteady in our faith or unsure of the end result of the work we undertake. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Be with us now and forever. Amen.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 239, MAKING APPROPRIATIONS FOR AID TO NICARAGUA

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 136 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 136

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into a secret session of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with, and all points of order against the consideration of the joint resolution are hereby waived. Pending the Speaker's declaration, he is authorized to declare a recess of the House in order to make appropriate arrangements for a secret session. General debate in the secret session of the Committee of the Whole shall continue not to exceed five hours, to be equally divided and controlled by a Member in favor of the resolution and a Member opposed thereto. At such time as the secret session of the Committee of the Whole shall terminate, the Committee of the Whole shall rise and the Speaker is authorized to declare a recess of the House to make appropriate arrangements for the reconvening of the House in open session. All proceedings in the secret session shall be kept secret unless otherwise ordered by the House on recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. At any time after the House has reconvened in open session the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution H.J. Res. 239. Further debate on the joint resolution shall continue not to exceed five hours plus any part of the five hours not actually consumed during debate in the secret session, and during the further consideration of the joint resolution the procedures contained in subsection 8066(c)(5) of Public Law 98-473 (98 Stat. 1936) shall apply.

SEC. 2. If the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) is rejected on final passage, the Speaker may at any time thereafter, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of a joint resolution relating to Nicaragua to be offered by, and printed in the Congressional Record of April 22, 1985, by Representative Barnes of Maryland, the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with, and all points of order against the joint resolution and against its consideration are hereby waived. There shall be no general debate on the joint resolution, which shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No admendment to the joint resolution shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall be considered as having been read, shall be in order any rule of the House of the contrary notwithstanding, shall be considered only in the following order, and shall not be subject to amendment: (1) the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative Hamilton of Indiana, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Hamilton and a Member opposed thereto; and (2) the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative Michel or his designee, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Michel or his designee and a Member opposed thereto. If both of said amendments are adopted, only the second such amendment shall be considered as having been finally adopted and reported back to the House. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendment as may have been finally adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and such amendment thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

□ 1000

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for consideration of House Joint Resolution 239, to approve the obligation of funds under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. Under House Resolution 136, the House may take up to 10 hours of general debate on House Joint Resolution 239, with the time equally divided and controlled by a Member in favor of the joint resolution and a Member opposed to it.

The rule provides for a secret session of the Committee of the Whole in which up to 5 hours of general debate may be consumed. The rule also authorizes the Speaker to declare recesses prior to and after the secret session to make appropriate arrangements for the secret session and for reconvening the House in open session. The rule provides that all proceedings of the secret session shall be kept secret unless otherwise ordered by the House on recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

After the Committee of the Whole reconvenes in open session, general debate may continue up to 5 hours plus any part of the 5 hours of debate time not consumed in the secret session.

Mr. Speaker, the procedures contained in subsection 8066(c)(5) of Public Law 98-473—the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1985—will govern further consideration of the joint resolution in open session. These provisions provide that a motion to limit debate is in order and not debatable. These provisions further provide that no amendment, motion to postpone, motion to proceed to consideration of other business, or motion to recommit the joint resolution is in order.

Section 2 of House Resolution 136 provides that if House Joint Resolution 239 is rejected on final passage, it shall be in order to consider a joint resolution relating to Nicaragua to be offered, and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1985, by Representative BARNES of Maryland. All points of order against the joint resolution are waived. The rule provides that there shall be no general debate on that joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, the rule further provides that no amendments shall be in order to that joint resolution except two amendments, which shall be considered only in the following order:

First, an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative HAMILTON of Indiana, with the amendment to be debated for no more than 2 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by Representative HAMILTON and a Member opposed to the amendment, and second, an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative MICHEL or his designee, with the amendment to be debated for no more than 2 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by Representative MICHEL or his designee and a Member opposed to the amendment.

These amendments shall be considered as having been read, shall be in order any rule of the House notwithstanding, and shall not be subject to amendment. If both of the amendments are adopted, only the second amendment adopted shall be considered as having been finally adopted and reported back to the House. Finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, this is a somewhat complicated rule. To make certain that everyone understands what this rule entails, let me repeat the basic provisions.

The rule provides for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 239, which would approve the obligation of $14 million for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, pursuant to the continuing resolution passed last year. The rule provides for 10 hours of debate on that joint resolution, no more than 5 hours of which may be in secret session. At the conclusion of this debate, there will be an up or down vote on House Joint Resolution 239.

If House Joint Resolution 239 is defeated, it will be in order to consider a joint resolution offered by Mr. BARNES. No general debate will be in order on this resolution. The rule makes in order two amendments in the nature of a substitute to this joint resolution: First, a substitute by Mr. HAMILTON; and second, a substitute by Mr. MICHEL or his designee. There will be an up or down vote on both of these substitutes. The rule establishes what is sometimes known as king of the mountain procedure, whereby, if both substitutes are adopted, only the second one is considered to have been finally adopted.

Mr. Speaker, this rule allows the Members of the House to consider fully the major alternatives on one of the most critical foreign policy issues of our time. I urge its adoption.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to go over exactly what the rule does. The gentleman from Michigan just went over it, but I want to make sure the Members fully understand what the procedure will be for the rest of the day, and I presume tomorrow, as to how these resolutions, the substitute and the original resolution, will be handled.

The Speaker is authorized to declare the House in secret session in the Committee of the Whole for up to 5 hours for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 239, approving the expenditure of $14 million for military and paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. I want to emphasize that it says secret session up to 5 hours. That does not mean necessarily, obviously, that we will take the full 5 hours, and I need to emphasize that if we do not take those full 5 hours, the time remaining will be carried over into regular session.

So we will have 5 hours that could be in secret session, and then the next 5 hours will be in open session, plus any time that is left over from the secret session.

All points of order are waived against the consideration of the resolution. The resolution is not subject to amendment and is not subject to a motion to recommit.

If the Michel resolution is defeated, and I want to emphasize that, if it is defeated, the Speaker may resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole to consider a resolution by Representative BARNES of Maryland printed in the RECORD on Monday, April 22. All points of order are waived against the resolution, and the resolution is not subject to further debate.

It first shall be in order to consider an amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. HAMILTON of Indiana, printed in the RECORD on Monday, April 22. The amendment shall not be subject to amendment but shall be debatable for 2 hours, equally divided between Representative HAMILTON and a Member opposed, and all points of order are waived against the amendment.

Even if the Hamilton amendment is adopted, it shall next be in order to consider an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution printed in the RECORD on Monday, April 22, and offered by Mr. MICHEL of Illinois or his designee. All points of order are also waived against this amendment, and the amendment is subject to 2 hours of debate divided between Mr. MICHEL or his designee and a Member opposed, and the amendment is not subject to an amendment.

If both amendments are adopted, both Hamilton and Michel, the last one adopted shall be reported back to the House as the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole and would be subject to a separate vote, of course, in the House.

One motion to recommit is permitted, although the rule does not specify with or without instructions, meaning that if either substitute is adopted, the resolution cannot be further amended in a motion to recommit with instructions, although general instructions would still be in order. If both substitutes are defeated, it would still be in order to offer a germane amendment to the Barnes amendment in the motion to recommit.

Let me assess the rule. If you look at this rule in a vacuum, by itself, it is not too bad.

I have to say that the members of the Rules Committee on the majority side made the best effort possible to make a fair rule out of a bad situation and a bad process. But we did have a considerable amount of discussion about how to frame this rule, and after meeting in the Rules Committee and in caucus and after a lot of discussion, I think this is about as fair a process, as far as what the rule allows, as we could come up with. Everybody has an opportunity to offer their substitute and make their case. There is adequate time for debate, it is equally divided, both the 10 hours and the 2 hours on the Barnes substitute and the 2 hours on the compromise substitute offered by Representative MICHEL or his designee.

So I have to grant that to my colleagues on the majority side on the Rules Committee. They tried to make the best of a bad situation, and for that reason, while I object to the process and I object to a rule that in effect approves this kind of process, I think that at least we will have our chance to offer a substitute and be heard fairly in the debate.

But let me tell the Members a little bit about how this thing evolved. It is a kind of a part of a rolling arrogance that we went through last week in the way the schedule was changed and altered and rules were violated or waived or ignored. Earlier in the week the Rules Committee met, and there was even some resistance by members of the Rules Committee and others, including the distinguished gentleman from Florida, to taking up two bills from the Science and Technology Committee where we did not even have a committee report. I was frantic during the Rules Committee meeting, trying to find a Xerox copy of the report, because I wanted to go through the report. But we ignored committee rules and rules of the House, and we took up the National Science Foundation and the National Bureau of Standards bills because we had to have something to do later in the week.

Well, that was not so bad, I guess, in and of itself, but it was part of what got to be the way we were doing business last week. Changes in the schedule were made without the basic courtesy of notifying the leadership on the Republican side of the aisle.

Then on Thursday, I had been working on behalf of the leadership on this side of the aisle watching what was happening in the Appropriations Committee, which was required to act by the action we took last year. We fenced these funds for Nicaragua at $14 million, but we said in what we passed that the Appropriations Committee would reconsider the unfencing of that money. And so on Thursday the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee started a meeting on this issue. I assumed the subcommittee would act, then the full committee would act, and then there would be the normal 3-day layover when the House would act. But somehow or other, that did not seem to suit the Democratic leadership, because 2 days seemed to have made an awful lot of difference in this body. Instead of the normal order of events in the sequence of processes required under the law and the rules of the House, the leadership and the Chair apparently did not want us to take this up on Wednesday or Thursday. They wanted it Tuesday. Regardless, it was going to be Tuesday. So if they could not force it through the Appropriations Committee, as was set out in the law, they said we would just ignore that, we would go straight to the Rules Committee and do whatever was necessary or waive whatever was necessary to get this thing out on Tuesday because we were going to get it considered on this particular day.

So somewhere around 2 o'clock on Thursday afternoon I got about 45 minutes' notice and we had an emergency meeting of the Rules Committee to yank this thing away from the Appropriations Committee and set up the process to get it to the floor. Usually there is plenty of notice to the membership, but in this case I cannot say that was the case. Some of the Members on our side of the aisle had already left the city and were going home because they were under the impression we were finishing the business of the day. The Rules Committee had no notice that we would be meeting.

Was the ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee notified of this Rules Committee meeting? No. Was the distinguished gentleman from Arizona, the ranking member of the Intelligence Committee, notified of this meeting? No. Was the Republican leader notified? I think there is even question about that.

As a matter of fact, when the Rules Committee was meeting, the leadership was here on the floor talking about the schedule for this week, and so when I got to the Rules Committee meeting, I was the only Member from this side of the aisle in the room. The Republican leader was not there, the ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee was not with us, the ranking member of the Intelligence Committee was not there, and the ranking member of the Appropriations Committee was not there.

So I started asking questions about what we were doing, what was the process, what we were considering, and I found that the only Member who was testifying was the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES], not the ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, not a member of the Appropriations Committee. He was the Member who was testifying about what kind of rule he thought we should have. And after asking a series of questions over about 15 or 20 minutes, it finally dawned on me that nobody had bothered to ask about what the substance was of what we were considering.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, on the point the gentleman was making just a moment ago, I sat on the floor with some of the Republican leadership on Thursday afternoon. In a very specific conversation it became my understanding that there had been a discussion between the ranking member of the Appropriations Subcommittee and the Speaker's people and there had been agreement that the bill would come to the full committee, and that the 3-day rule would apply. So I went back to my home and spent the weekend getting prepared for the debate before the full Committee on Appropriations. And then suddenly on Monday morning we find that the Speaker and those who run this place had decided to arbitrarily exercise their power to fundamentally violate what we understand to be the rules.

I think the gentleman raises a very important point for the membership to know that, that for some reason 2 days were critical; there was not going to be time for Members to prepare themselves, and for some reason it had to be done now. It seems to me at best that it is an arbitrary exercise of power.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the gentleman and say that it was also my impression on Thursday morning that it was going through the normal process at the subcommittee level and the full committee level, and I thought everybody was proceeding on that basis.

I realized that there was a possibility or even a likelihood that the Rules Committee might have to meet at some point on Monday or Tuesday of this week to make in order the substitutes. I understood that, and I basically was in agreement with it. But all of a sudden that apparently was not good enough, so we were summoned to the Rules Committee to carry this deed through to its completion.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's yielding, and I wonder if he would yield further to me.

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that this is just another illustration of what is becoming a pattern during this session, an exercise of power almost for the sake of demonstrating it. The American public, I think, is quite sensitive to that. There is no small reason for the public's beginning to react and look again at what is going on in this House. So my colleague on the Rules Committee raises a very important point, and I appreciate that.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Getting back to that meeting in the Rules Committee, I started asking the gentleman from Maryland, "Could we see the substitute?"

Well, apparently there was no substitute that we were about to grant a rule on. It was not in writing. I could understand that there were negotiations going on, but why did the Rules Committee have to meet right then to report this rule on a substitute that we had not yet seen?

So I thought, well, OK, it is not in writing. Let me ask him, what are his parameters? What is he really thinking about? And I was floored at what I found as I started asking questions. He really was not sure.

I was told one thing in the Rules Committee, and I find that what is actually in this substitute offered by the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] is quite different from what we were hearing in the Rules Committee.

I understand that we set up a process that allows for changes to be made. But now just envision that. We were in the Rules Committee on that Thursday afternoon—by then it was 4 o'clock—to make in order a rule on a substitute that we had not seen, that in fact was not written down, and the gentleman from Maryland did not really know what it was going to be.

So at that point we were able to get our leader, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOB MICHEL, in the committee, along with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], to start asking some questions and try to keep this process from being a complete steamroller, where at least there would be some orderly process for substitutes to be developed and offered and so that the compromise that will be offered by Mr. MICHEL and others would at least have a chance.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] had magnanimously indicated that he would have no objection to Republicans offering an alternative in a motion to recommit with instructions. But, when it was pointed out that we just might need a germaneness waiver because we were interested in providing some kind of assistance to the freedom fighters inside Nicaragua, it was suddenly suggested that we should have our motion ready to file by 8 o'clock that evening. Our poor Republican leader had found himself in attendance at a surprise party in his honor, to which he had not been invited in the first place, and was then being asked to go back home and put on his tuxedo. It all begins to sound a little Kafkaesque, when you think about it. The Rules Committee had become the twilight zone.

Fortunately, I was able to persuade our colleagues on the committee to permit both Mr. BARNES and Mr. MICHEL to file their amendments in yesterday's RECORD, and also to permit the minority to have an equal shot with a substitute, rather than being relegated to just 10 minutes on a motion to recommit. For that small favor I am sincerely grateful. So what we have here today is probably the best bad rule we could hope to get. It's like being fed a toad instead of a snake: they're both hard to swallow.

All this confusion, irregularity, and flouting of House rules and orderly process could have been avoided if we had followed the procedure prescribed by the continuing appropriations resolution last year, requiring the Appropriations Committee to first report a joint resolution approving the $14 million.

The continuing resolution also contains language permitting each House to adopt additional procedures and rules, and this would have allowed a special rule to permit both the majority and minority to offer more detailed substitutes which better reflect the administration's current request and the current thinking of those on the other side.

So I just emphasize to the Members that the process stinks, the way this has been handled. Why not the regular process? It would have made 1 or 2 days' difference. So what? Well, I am told in confidence that it is because we want to act the same day the Senate acts.

Is there something magical about that? Do we violate all rules of normal process around here just to make sure we are not influenced by the other body? Come now.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield once again?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's yielding.

An item has just come to my attention that is very appropriate to the comments that the gentleman has been making, and it is most appropriate that the Speaker is in the chair as I review this comment. I say this:

> I pledge to be prompt and impartial in deciding parliamentary questions. I pledge to be patient, good tempered and courteous toward the individual Members. I pledge best to employ the talent of the House for full and fair consideration of issues that come before us. In "those moments of agitation from which no deliberative assembly is always entirely exempt," I pledge to "remain cool and unshaken, guarding the permanent laws and rules of the House from being sacrificed to temporary passions, prejudices, or Interests."

That quote is from our Speaker, TIP O'NEILL, upon being sworn in during this session. I must say that I believe the Speaker means those words. From time to time around this place, however, our staff members sometimes get in the way and interfere with our ability to control passions, and sometimes they overreact. I certainly hope that we would keep those words in mind as we go forward with our debate today.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS].

I would like to urge my colleagues briefly in this time for debate under the rule to look today at the substitutes that were printed in the RECORD yesterday. I do not know now whether we will try to get to those substitutes tonight or whether they will come up tomorrow. I presume and I hope that we will have a vote tonight, probably around 7 o'clock, on the Michel resolution, and that then tomorrow we will take up the Barnes substitute and the Michel compromise that has been printed in the RECORD. But I ask the Members to look at these compromises so they will at least know what we are talking about.

□ 1020

The Barnes substitute, as I understand it, would provide nothing for the Contras, nothing for Nicaragua. It would provide aid and the dollar amount has changed, but I presume now about $10 million for refugees outside of Nicaragua, which has already been basically described as the Refugee Incentive Act. Let us encourage them to come on out of Nicaragua right across the border and get in on the refugee funds that will be available, and then $4 million will go to the Contadora countries after an agreement is reached to help pay for the implementation of the process.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very unusual substitute, I must say. I have to ask, what does it contribute to trying to get the parties inside Nicaragua to talking with each other?

I have a few other questions that I would like to ask on the substance and we will later in general debate; but please, my colleagues, take a look now at the substitute substance before we get to it so that you can ask legitimate questions.

The compromise that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will offer has also been printed in the RECORD, but the parameters are basically this. There is $14 million for humanitarian aid and humanitarian aid is described and defined as food, clothing, medicine and other humanitarian assistance.

It says specifically that it is not to be used to provide arms, munitions or other weapons of war to any person, group or organization directly or indirectly. These funds will be administered through the Agency for International Development and the President is strongly urged and encouraged to take steps necessary to impose an embargo on trade between the United States and Nicaragua if the Government of Nicaragua does not enter into good faith negotiations with the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

This compromise is asking for humanitarian aid without a trigger, a carrot or a stick. Humanitarian aid to those people who are fighting against the Communists in Nicaragua—and that is so bad?

I cannot understand really the turn that this debate has taken.

Now, it is especially unfortunate, I think, when we are talking about countering Communist aggression and expansion in the Americas, if we cannot agree on the nature of the threat in our own front yard and how to deal with it, how can we hope to remain the shining beacon of freedom for the rest of the world?

We hear a lot of hyperbole about our policy toward Central America. Some would have us believe that supporting the President's peace initiative is tantamount to voting for a Gulf of Tonkin resolution; but I would suggest that the opposite is the case. The real danger lies in turning our backs on the problem, covering our eyes and hoping it will go away; or that others will somehow fix it and make it right for a few Yankee dollars; or that a little refugee assistance will somehow salve our consciences. That is not the way to deal with Communist expansion.

Let us not kid ourselves. Do we really want more Cubas?

Mr. Speaker, let me conclude my remarks on this rule by saying that I hope the next time we have such an important issue before us that we will not resort to the type of process that we have had here. Let us go through the normal procedure so that Members will fully understand how it is coming to the floor, when it is coming, what committee has jurisdiction, so that there will be some hearings on what we are taking up on the floor. I think it would serve us all better.

Our country's foreign policy is too serious a matter for such petty jockeying and political pointmaking. We have established orderly procedures in this House for very sound reasons, including the assurance of a truly deliberative process that includes the benefit of a committee report, the protection of minority rights, and the maintenance of a civil environment in which to conduct our debates. When we short-circuit any of these procedures and protections, we risk losing the comity on which democracy is dependent. We can ill afford such a breakdown on an important foreign policy debate with the rest of the world watching. Let us demonstrate in the future that we are capable of better.

I have to say if we do not report this rule, then we will be I guess right back at the gate as far as trying to devise a process to consider it on the floor. At least our substitute will have a chance to be considered under this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge my colleagues to express themselves against this process, but I have to acknowledge that the rule is probably the best that we could get under the worst possible conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 286, nays 127, not voting 20, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Ortiz for, with Mr. Grotberg against.
Mr. Rogers for, with Mr. Crane against.

Messrs. BOULTER, HUNTER, and McMILLAN changed their votes from "aye" to "nay."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAIVING REQUIREMENT FOR SECRET SESSION IN CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 239

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the requirement in House Resolution 136 for a secret session be waived and that 10 hours of debate proceed under the provisions of section 8066 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Act, 1985, as incorporated in Public Law 98-473.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present for the votes yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, had I been present I would have voted "yes" on rollcall No. 59 concerning the Journal, I would have voted "yes" on rollcall No. 60, the Nicholson resolution, and I would have voted "no" on No. 61, the Chilean resolution.

MAKING APPROPRIATIONS FOR AID TO NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Resolution 136 and rule XXIII the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239).

□ 1047

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, with Mr. REID in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the joint resolution is dispensed with.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 5 hours and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] will be recognized for 5 hours.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset of this historic debate, I would like to say a few words about the parlimentary situation that shaped the course of these votes.

Our first vote today will be on language which, if I had the choice, I would not have introduced. I would have preferred language which would implement the essence of the President's peace plan, based on the San Jose Declaration.

But I was precluded from offering such language. Let me explain why:

You will all recall that when the continuing resolution was passed in the last Congress and the funds for the Contras were fenced off as we did similarly with the MX, there was specific language written into that resolution which obliged us or anyone introducing the resolution to fence it in, to specifically read as follows: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua."

Mr. Chairman, this first vote is, in essence, an artificial contrivance, designed to put the President's position in the worst possible light.

I think our Members should know that this first vote will be held on language which distorts the President's wishes.

Later we will introduce an amendment that will allow Members to make a realistic decision as to where they stand.

And the issue is this: Do you want to help the forces of democratic pluralism in Nicaragua or do you want to consolidate the power of the Marxist-Leninist dictatorship?

Recently, the Sandinista leader Mr. Ortega insulted the Congress by holding out a carrot. He promised a ceasefire if we would just do his bidding and abandon the democratic forces in his country.

This is the kind of cyncism one expects from such a source. I can understand Ortega saying it; what I can't understand is anyone in the Congress believing it.

If you have a sense of deja vu about all this, so do I. Today we are repeating a ritual that we have gone through many times.

It goes something like this:

The United States goes to the aid of a group or country that is fighting Communists. The cry is raised that our side isn't good enough to support. It is corrupt. It is immoral. It commits atrocities. A propaganda campaign is mounted against the allies of the United States.

Then the critics of the administration tell us the Communists are open to change if only we would be more generous in our treatment of them.

When the true facts of Communist tyranny become inescapably clear, the administration's critics tell us they oppose what the Communists are doing. But they don't like the means the administration has chosen to stop it. They offer no realistic alternative themselves.

Does this sound familiar? It should. We have been through this scenario over and over again in the past 30 years. And in every case the Communists proved to be worse than forces we had originally supported but then abandoned. Millions of innocent men, women, and children have paid the price of our refusal to acknowledge that communism is the worst form of tyranny.

In the present case, we even have some critics of the President who do not want to call the Sandinistas Communists.

But the Sandinistas are self-proclaimed Marxist-Leninists. And if someone can point out the substantive differences between Marxist-Leninists and Communists I'd sure like to hear it.

Gertrude Stein said "A rose is a rose is a rose." I say a Sandinista is a Marxist-Leninist is a Communist. So I'm going to call them what they are.

They believe in their ideology the way religious people believe in God. They will ultimately sell their nation to the Soviet Union the same way Castro sold Cuba if we give them the chance.

We will hear a lot today about the real and alleged sins of the democratic forces of Nicaragua.

I'll let other Members correct these distortions.

As for myself, I don't care if the democratic forces of Nicaragua are good enough to go to Heaven. I'm interested in seeing that they are strong enough to save their country from a Communist hell.

We are told we should not be supporting a group that wants to overthrow the Government of Managua.

Overthrow the Communists in Nicaragua? Fat chance, the way we're providing aid.

Fourteen million dollars worth of aid isn't going to help them overthrow an armed force of 62,000 active duty personnel, a total force of 119,000, including reserves and militia.

This Sandinista force has Soviet MI-24 hind attack helicopters. It has 150 tanks, 200 other armored vehicles and some 300 to 400 surface-to-air missiles. The Sandinistas have nearly completed a runway long enough to service any aircraft in the Soviet or Cuban inventory.

But, we are told that if we give $14 million worth of aid—in any form—to the democratic forces, they will suddenly run into Managua and take over.

What nonsense! I for one wish this country could make a decision to give the democratic forces what they really need to make a difference in Nicaragua. But the political facts dictate we argue about $14 million to help those engaged in a struggle with the largest standing army in Central America.

We are not faced with a choice between force and dialogue. We are faced with a choice between a mixture of force and dialogue on one hand and inevitable Marxist-Leninist consolidation of power on the other.

Saying you are against the Sandinistas but don't want to help the democratic forces is not enough. That's like saying you are against a disease but unwilling to treat it. It's like saying you are against arson but don't want to fund the fire department. It's like saying you are against crime in the streets but want to provide the police with food stamps and not weapons.

The bishops of Nicaragua, in their Easter pastoral letter, condemned the Sandinistas and asked them to enter into negotiations with the democratic forces.

Those religious groups closest to the scene recognize the true character of the Sandinistas. Listen to Jews whose synagogue was closed and were forced to leave the country. They'll tell you about freedom of religion in this new Communist state. Listen to the Miskito Indians whose clergy were killed by the Sandinistas.

One newspaper columnist recently wrote that the Sandinistas can't be all bad because they like baseball and they even jog.

This is the same kind of argument that we heard when Andropov became head of the Soviet Union. He drank scotch and liked jazz.

Sometimes you wonder how these scotch-drinking jazz-loving baseball-playing, jogging, lovable Communists ever find the time to read Karl Marx and to do away with dissenters.

Let me read to you one of their goals as outlined in the definitive statement of principles of the Sandinistas, in 1969. They have never repudiated this goal.

> Struggle for a true union of the Central American peoples within one country beginning with support for national liberation movement in neighboring states.

Stripped of the Communist jargon that means the ongoing revolution.

They said it themselves.

We should at least pay them the tribute of acknowledging they believe deeply in their own principles.

If the United States doesn't believe we have the moral and political right to aid the democratic force fighting communism, then God help the future of freedom in this hemisphere.

The Communists have no legitimacy. Their legitimacy comes through the barrel of a gun. Why do critics of the President insist that they are legitimate rulers? The people didn't give them power. They took power from the people.

Let me read to you the report of the Bipartisan Commission on Central America, still the most definitive and objective study of the current tragedy in Central America. This is what the Commission had to say about Nicaragua:

> The consolidation of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Managua would be seen by its neighbors as constituting a permanent security threat. Because of its secretive nature, the existence of a political order on the Cuban model in Nicaragua would pose major difficulties in negotiating, implementing, and verifying any Sandinista commitment to refrain from supporting insurgency and subversion in other countries.

Let me now tell you what I believe the real issues are:

I believe, with the bipartisan commission, that the current Communist government in Nicaragua is a threat to peace and stability in the region. I believe the Communists are ideologically committed to human rights violations as matter of Marxist-Leninist principles. I believe they will aid the Soviet Union in establishing an enclave in this hemisphere.

Because of that threat I believe the United States, along with its democratic allies in the region, has the moral, diplomatic, and geopolitical right and duty to aid Nicaraguans who wish to have a pluralistic, democratic society in Nicaragua.

I believe that to abandon the signers of the San Jose Declaration would constitute a grave historic and irrevocable error that we will pay for dearly in the years ahead.

I believe it is not enough for Members of this House to state they don't like what the Communists are doing, but are unwilling to take action against them. This is de facto handing over of Nicaragua to allies of the Soviet Union.

Spare us the stale, ritualistic, generalized criticisms of the Communists. We'll believe you are sincere about them when you do something about them.

I am reminded of an old saying:

> Things are what they are. The consequences of them will be what they will be. Why then do we seek to delude ourselves?

I hope the debate that follows discusses some of the points I have raised, for I sincerely believe that if all the facts are taken into consideration, a bipartisan majority in this House will do the right thing and continue to help those democratic forces of Nicaragua.

□ 1050

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my opposition to renewal of U.S. military aid to the Contras fighting against the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, the issue of how the United States can best protect its own national interests in Central America is the subject which is often debated and discussed in simplistic terms—communism versus freedom, right versus wrong, good versus evil. In reality, America's long-range national interest in Central America is an extremely complex subject involving issues such as how poverty can be ameliorated in the Third World; what is the proper mix of foreign policy initiatives to free the Third World from the yoke of dictatorships of the right or left.

□ 1100

What can effectively be done to counter high infant mortality rates and health problems. How can social justice be achieved in an evolutionary way.

Mr. Chairman, I too, am concerned at the growing Soviet and Cuban adventurism in Central America. The Soviets and/or their surrogates have a long history of seeking to exploit economically, socially, and politically depressed areas of the world. We have had a lot of experience in dealing with their "fishing in troubled waters."

In countering previous attempts by the Soviet Union to subvert depressed or troubled areas, the United States has frequently implemented programs such as the Marshall plan, the Truman Doctrine and the Alliance for Progress. We used the "arsenal of democracy" and the riches of our country to build up the infrastructure of the threatened areas that they would ward off the seductive appeals of Marxism. But this tradition appears to have been abandoned in the implementation of certain aspects of our Central American policy.

Now we seem to feel that the way to combat such Soviet "fishing expeditions" is to overthrow the government which has allowed the Soviets a foothold. I know and I have heard it all before that our policy is not to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. Even if the Contras publicly state that is their goal, we are to believe our goal is to interdict arms, bring the Sandinistas to the negotiating table, and restore the original principles of the Sandinistas' revolution.

Mr. Chairman, do any of us really believe that our ultimate goal is not the replacement of the Sandinistas with a government more to our liking? It is surprising we do have diplomatic relations with the present government, we even have a most-favored-nation trade agreement with the incumbent government. Is it the American way to covertly or overtly overthrow them? I think not and I hope not. Even if we were successful, would not the Sandinistas merely take to the hills and become the Contras themselves? We supported the Sandinistas and the Contras were the ones under Somoza, and we threw them out. Now, would that not be reversed?

I fully recognize the burden of being a great and powerful nation dictates that many tough decisions must be made in the international arena. I also recognize that the moral high ground can be a lonely and sometimes frustrating position in the hardball game of international relations. However, I believe that totally abandoning the moral high ground through actions such as mining of the Nicaraguan harbors is a step which simply must not be supported by the people's branch of the American Government.

Mr. Chairman, the response to the covert war of the Contras has been a significant expansion of Soviet arms pouring into Nicaragua. Escalation of the violence and bloodletting is ongoing. We hear in the press that the President proposes that initially the additional aid should be for humanitarian purposes, but it is clear to me that the escalation of violence and bloodletting would continue since this nonlethal aid would simply permit other resources going to the Contras to be used for arms.

Let us look at the main problem facing Congress if it approves this joint resolution. Notwithstanding all the other negative factors involved, there is an impression that the initial assistance to the Contras, if approved, will consist of humanitarian aid.

However, my colleagues, when you look at the exact language contained in the formal documents presently pending before the Congress, the documents pending before this Committee today, you find no mention, no mention of humanitarian assistance. There is no distortion; the language is absolute and clear. If you had read and if you have not read, you should read the President's classified report, you will find no distortion as to the meaning of the resolution presently before this House.

The letter transmitting the classified report to Congress on April 3, 1985, reads as follows, and this is what is before us today.

The letter reads:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of Title VIII, Section 8066 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 98-473, enacted October 12, 1984; 98 Stat. 1935), I herewith—

And this is the President's message to the Congress, and I am quoting exactly—

I herewith transmit a classified report on U.S. support for the democratic resistance movement in Nicaragua. On the basis of this report, I have determined that assistance for military or paramilitary operations now prohibited by section 8066(a) of that Act is necessary.

No distortion; pure and simple language. Military aid.

Then we look at the resolution which we will be voting on later today. House Joint Resolution 239, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois on April 15, 1985. Again, the resolution reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

I repeat, gentlemen, at no place in the letter of transmittal, the classified report or the joint resolution is mentioned "humanitarian assistance." If we vote for this resolution, we are giving military aid, we are voting for another Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

Again, all that has been mentioned specifically, not by inference, but specifically, is military and paramilitary assistance. If the Congress approves this joint resolution, we are approving nothing else but arms assistance to the Contras.

Mr. Chairman, I recommend the disapproval of House Joint Resolution 239.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, on Monday, Secretary of State Shultz summarized our dilemma and our goals in Central America very simply. He said:

We confront a fundamental challenge, challenge to our national interests and to the freedom and security of our neighbors. Our goals in Central America are clear: We seek peace, security, economic progress, and the growth of freedom and democracy in every country.

Nothing could be more clear or reasonable.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I have the feeling we are not listening to the lessons of history and are eager to repeat the mistakes of our own past.

Unless we are prepared to tighten our belts and get behind the President's policy, history will record this debate as just another footnote to the long chapter entitled: "American Foreign Policy Shoots Itself in the Foot—Again."

Forty years is half a lifetime for most of us but little more than a blink of the eye in history.

With a few notable exceptions, the dominant theme of the last 40 years has been one of unprecedented Soviet expansion in the face of remarkable U.S. foreign policy vacillation, weakness and wishful thinking.

Cuba, Cambodia, Iran, Vietnam were foreign policy disasters for the United States in which many of the major battles were fought and lost right here at home rather than on overseas battlefields.

If Harry Truman is watching, he is spinning in his grave at the prospect of another self-imposed setback in a long list of foreign policy defeats since World War II to which he provided the strongest exception.

He stood up to Communist expansion in Western Europe in a way that has helped contain the Soviets and maintain the status quo there as nowhere else in the world.

Had he not been the strong exception to modern U.S. history, Western Europe might well have gone the way of the Eastern bloc nations.

As the dominoes continue to topple in the Southeast Asian vacuum we helped create, we are preparing the same sort of free-fire zone Communist aggression in Central America.

And, while our policy weaknesses are the same as in the past, this time the revolver is clearly in the hands of the Congress and aimed squarely at America's achilles heel.

Central America is not Southeast Asia or even Western Europe—it is our own front yard.

Even our isolationist forefathers had the good sense to recognize the Western Hemisphere as an area in which America's vital interests were permanently at risk.

Let's face the facts. To some people in this Congress, it is more important to defeat the President's program in Central America than to save democracy in that nearby region. To some, it is more important to politicize this issue than to understand the reality of Central America today.

By failing to understand what the Contras represent, many in this Congress are missing the big picture. They fail to see what is developing in Central America and what the future will bring.

What kind of neighbors do we want to have in this hemisphere? It is easy to criticize a program. Many of you oppose the President. I challenge you to come up with a workable and realistic alternative to what we are doing in Central America.

It is easy to see that the Sandinistas are dyed-in-the-wool Marxist-Leninists who continue to talk like Soviet-style dictators. They have attacked the church in that country, the press, small businessmen, unions, independent farmers and the poor Miskito Indians.

The poor neighbors in Nicaragua have suffered from the Sandinistas' efforts to export their revolution. With Soviet and Cuban help, Commandante Ortega and company are still working to consolidate their power. Their goals and objectives remain the same. They will soon turn Nicaragua into a full blown Communist state. Should they succeed, we would face a second Cuba in this hemisphere, this time on the mainland of the Americas.

Can any of you deny the strategic dangers that this implies? If Cuba can be a guide to Communist intentions, Nicaragua would intensify efforts to undermine its neighbors in the name of revolution.

The first casualty of a Communist consolidation in Nicaragua would be the freedom and hopes for democracy of the Nicaraguan people. They have already suffered too much. The second casualty would be the security of the region.

Our efforts have succeeded in Central America. Our Government's policy in the region is designed to build Democratic institutions and to avoid a second Cuba as well as a second Vietnam, with American troops mired in combat. On the whole, our policy is working. Nicaragua, however, continues to destabilize its neighbors and deny human rights to its own people.

In April President Reagan made an appeal in the name of peace. He called upon the government and the armed opposition to stop fighting and to begin talks on reconciliation. He asked for the restoration of democracy and an end to tyranny. The call for peace included a cease-fire and church-mediated talks. The funds provided for the Contras would be used for humanitarian purposes for a specific period of time. After a 60-day period, the President could restart military assistance to the Contras.

Sad but true, the Sandinistas have so far turned a deaf ear to the calls for dialog, for peace and democracy. While our Government is trying to get Nicaragua to move toward peace with its own people, with its neighbors, and therefore, with the United States, only Congress can give the President the means to make peace work by supporting the President's efforts.

All too often, Congress embroils itself in critical foreign policy issues. Some in this body like to micromanage what America is doing around the world. More often than not, our meddling in these sensitive matters has made a mess out of what the executive branch was trying to do.

Just a few days ago, a number of Senators were in Managua receiving peace overtures from the Sandinistas. Our own Embassy in that country was unaware of the Sandinistas' latest peace ploys. How can a world power turn the conduct of its foreign policy over to the 500-or-so Members of Congress? Chaos would reign supreme. The Contra issue is a case in point.

The Sandinistas are tough and determined. They are street fighters who will use every trick in the book to win over popular sentiment in our own open democratic society.

The recent public relations campaign is a case in point. Throughout their years in power, the Sandinistas have been flexible only when they were convinced they had no choice. They have made solemn pledges in the past to the OAS, but failed to keep them.

The Sandinistas themselves have admitted that opposition from the Contras forced them to hold an election. Hesitation or neglect now on our part will allow the Sandinistas the time they need to consolidate their totalitarian control.

We must keep the pressure on the Marxist Nicagarguan Government.

I have urged the President to go even further and consider the immediate cutoff of trade with that nation.

Why should we continue to subsidize a government which is promoting revolution among its neighbors and denying basic rights to its people by buying its exports?

Why should we help sustain its economy and its military machine by providing it hard-to-get American products, including spare parts?

The time for a trade cutoff is now.

As a cosponsor of the joint resolution before us, I strongly urge my colleagues to vote for funds for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. Should we approve these funds, they will be used for humanitarian purposes if the Sandinistas accept the offer of the Democratic opposition for dialog, peace and democracy.

A vote for this resolution is a vote for peace. A "Yes" vote on this issue is a commitment to democracy and stability in our front yard. A vote for funds for the democratic resistance is a frank acceptance of freedom and democracy for future generations of Central Americans. Now is the time for this Congress to decide.

This is not the time to take a cheap shot at the President, central America cannot afford another setback.

As Secretary Shultz said yesterday:

The choice before Congress is grave and cannot be avoided.

We are at a pivotal moment that will help determine the future of Central America and directly affect the national security of the United States.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman for a fine speech, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] for a fine speech, and the minority leader for a fine speech.

The gentleman from Michigan heard Mr. ADDABBO's statements about the classified information that had been transferred to the Intelligence Committee about this, saying that none of this aid was for humanitarian purposes.

What is the gentleman's response to Mr. ADDABBO's statement? As I understand Mr. ADDABBO, he said that the Michel resolution does not refer to humanitarian aid. The transmittal of the request to Congress does not refer to humanitarian aid, or economic aid, and puts all the emphasis upon military aid.

Does the gentleman agree with Mr. ADDABBO on that?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I would say to my good friend, the gentleman from Florida, that the resolution before us was set up last October. What we are really considering here is the personal commitment of President Reagan that the money would be used solely for humanitarian purposes, and there was a deadline set up. It has been indicated that it would go to the end of the fiscal year and then if there was not any movement on the part of the Sandinistas, then the money could be used for lethal weapons.

Mr. GIBBONS. I thank the gentleman for his clarification. Would the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I would be very happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. In the earlier part of the debate, the gentleman mentioned President Truman and what he had done for Europe and Japan immediately following World War II in order to prevent them from going Communist. Obviously that was a very important move on the part of the President.

As I remember it, it was essentially three things that were done.

One, there was a Marshall Plan which called for the appropriation of relatively small amounts of money considering what we spend today.

□ 1120

No. 2, there was a deliberative tilting of the value of the dollar at Bretton Woods so as to encourage the building of infrastructure in both Europe and Japan, allowing them to revitalize their industrial base and go immediately into the export market and earn currency.

No. 3, there was a deliberative tilting of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade rules at that time in order to encourage those countries to revitalize their economies.

Now, those are the three important things that I remember Mr. Truman did. How does that comparison of Truman then and this program now parallel each other?

I recognize that we have done something through the Caribbean Basin Initiative, and that is beginning to work in the rest of the Caribbean. But, of course, it is denied to Nicaragua because of the statute we passed.

Is there anything that we can hope for in the future that the administration will try to do in order to build a greater amount of private infrastructure in these economies than just humanitarian aid or pure military aid?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is hitting on a very important point of the entire problem down there. I think that while the Caribbean Basin Initiative is a good first start, it is not the only solution to the problem down there.

The National Bipartisan Commission on Central America issued an extensive report recommending economic and military assistance for the countries in the region. Last year, Congressman MURTHA and I offered an amendment to the foreign aid bill to implement the Commission recommendations which was accepted by this House. We need to maintain this strong commitment to economic development to help solve the serious economic problems faced by the countries in the region.

Obviously we cannot do much when we have a government like that Sandinista whose overall objective is really regional domination. It is obvious to me that it is much more than just the country of Nicaragua.

If the Sandinista hold free elections, stop exporting their revolutions and so forth, I think it would be incumbent upon our Congress to take another look to see if there is something further we can do to benefit the people of that country. I think the whole region has been ignored for too long.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his question.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has consumed 14 minutes.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND], the former chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution. I do so, not simply as one who has opposed aid to the Contras in the past. During my service on the Intelligence Committee, I made a sincere effort to understand the facts that underlie the situation in Central America. And I saw to it that those facts were provided to the House.

The facts were that the Government of Nicaragua was providing arms, ammunition, communications, logistics, training, and safe haven to insurgents attempting to topple the Government of El Salvador. The facts were that the Government of Nicaragua was on a Marxist-Leninist drift. The facts were that the Cubans had a large presence in Nicaragua and a great deal of influence with the Nicaraguan Government. The facts were that there was a military build up in Nicaragua.

I no longer serve on the Intelligence Committee, but my information is, that these are still the facts. But, the issue before us today cannot be limited to those facts. There are other facts—ones which supporters of the Contras like to forget—ones which the Intelligence Committee pointed out years ago—ones which the administration ignores.

Those facts are, that no matter what you call the Contras—freedom fighters, brothers, or brigands—theirs is a particularly vicious war. Its casualties are not only combatants, they are coffee pickers, medical workers, evangelical workers. The facts are, that the Contras can operate effectively in only a very small part of Nicaragua's mountainous areas. They have no hold in the cities and with the population at large. And the result is that the Contras have little likelihood of defeating the Sandinistas.

That is not just my judgment, or that of our Intelligence Committee, it is the judgment of Gen. Paul Gorman, until recently, commander in chief of the U.S. Southern Command in Panama.

Overthrow of the Sandinistas is "not feasible in the near future," he said.

Mr. Chairman, those are the facts. Those are what we have to work with, and from them, we must somehow mold a policy that meets the goals on which we all agree. And let us make no mistake—we all want the same goals in Central America: peace, democracy, economic development, and an end to a possible threat by Nicaragua to its neighbors.

The proposal before us today offers only one alternative—armed conflict, and armed conflict with a terrible hidden cost. It is conflict, to which we would be committed in the most public and painful way, a conflict which cannot succeed without the use of U.S. forces.

I know of no one, no Member of this body, who would stand up today and endorse the use of American forces in Nicaragua. Yet, that is what this commitment could well mean, and that would be a tragedy for both Nicaragua and the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this commitment—this war—is supposed to produce a political opening in Nicaragua. It seeks the beginning of genuine democratic pluralism.

Mr. Chairman, 3 years of this conflict have brought us no closer to that goal. In fact, as this administration points out in great detail, we are farther from that goal. The war has failed, as an instrument of pressure on the Sandinistas. It has not encouraged them to do what we want them to. It has driven them into a corner, from which they place increasing reliance and dependence of the Soviet Union and Cuba. In sum, our efforts have turned counterproductive.

We do not want to see a Soviet-dominated Nicaragua. We do not want to see increased Cuban military presence. Yet, the war has brought us both.

It has also brought us a draft, increased censorship, and harassment of the church. And perhaps, most troubling of all to this Member, having spent 7 years attempting to rebuild the strength and image of the Central Intelligence Agency, this war has brought down public scorn upon that great agency. Worse, the Contra war has so politicized some elements within the CIA, that the objectivity of its analytical judgments in this area are now subject to question.

Mr. Chairman, U.S. policy must seek to encourage and develop viable political processes in Nicaragua that can ensure popular democracy and a renewed economy. The Contras do not offer us that. All they offer us, or their fellow Nicaraguans, is a means of striking back at the Sandinistas.

We must develop a policy for the region, that does more than lash out at the Nicaraguans. We must devise a policy that creates real, but positive, pressures on them, and we must realize that a commitment solely to force cannot avoid the further use of force.

What is the solution to the problem that Nicaragua represents to this country? This House offered the opportunity to the President in the last Congress on several occasions. At every turn, we gave the President opportunities to slow down this program, to rethink, to develop additional alternatives, to pursue diplomatic means. The cutoff, in funding the Contras, gave him the opportunity to restructure support for democratic forces in the region.

Yet, the proposal before us today, differs little from the failed policies of the last 3 years. Instead of demanding that the Sandinistas cry "uncle," now we are giving them 60 days—or else.

I want to support the President and his foreign policy initiatives in Central America, and I must say I have in the past. I want U.S. policy to be effective and enlightened for that region. I would like to see successful completion of the Contadora process, a disarmament of the Central American nations, and a revitalization of their economies.

But, I cannot see in the proposal before us a way toward any of those goals. I oppose this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, let us realize one thing about this debate and about the proposal to keep funding the Contras—whether we give them guns or not. This is not a way out of the problems which beset U.S. interests in the region, this is not a way to achieve a better Nicaragua. This is a way into a morass, into a commitment that can only lead to a deepening of civil war in Nicaragua, and further frustration of American goals.

Mr. Chairman, this House will have the opportunity tomorrow to vote on two particular amendments. There is an opportunity there to resolve the problem in a better way than we would resolve it with this resolution, and I would hope that the House would use its best judgment in adopting that the Hamilton-Barnes amendment which seeks the goals which we all want in Central America.

□ 1130

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOLAND. I am delighted to yield to the very distinguished gentleman.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the gentleman's statement concerning General Gorman's belief that $14 million would not suffice in order to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua, is the gentleman aware that also General Gorman supported increased funding to the Contras and that General Gorman felt that aid to the Contras was an integral and most vital part of the pressures that we need to exert on the Nicaraguan Government in order that they may install the democratic institutions which they promised to the Nicaraguan people?

Mr. BOLAND. I am glad the gentleman raised that question. What the gentleman says, incidentally, is correct, but let me say that in the hearings we had with Gen. Paul Gorman, I hope I am not divulging any classified information, because it was a statement that he gave to the Intelligence Committee; that particular hearing lasted I think almost 3 hours.

Frankly, I have never listened to a better witness in my life in the long years I have served in this Congress than General Gorman. He did indicate that the $14 million would not be enough, that there would be additional funding. He knew what the situation was down there as the commander of the Southern Command in Panama. He was responsible, as the gentleman knows, for all the intelligence of the area. His operations included that and a number of other things in that area.

During the course of that hearing, I was asking myself, what would be the real question to ask General Gorman? What country really is the country that would give some stability to Central America?

I said to my staff, "I think I'll ask General Gorman what his judgment is on what country would stabilize Central America."

They said, "No, don't do that. Don't ask that, because I'm sure—we are sure that he will probably say Nicaragua."

But as the hearings came to a close, I thought perhaps it would be a good time to ask, so I said, "General, how important is El Salvador to the interests of the United States in Central America?"

He said, "Terribly important."

I asked him, "Would you say that El Salvador is a linchpin to the stability of Central America?"

And he said, "Absolutely."

El Salvador with a population of almost 5 million people, as the gentleman knows, and I know of no one who is more knowledgeable about the area than the gentleman who is now on his feet, El Salvador with 5 million people has a lot of problems; but this House dared to have some confidence in the President of El Salvador, Mr. Duarte, and gave some military assistance to that country last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. BOLAND. So my feeling is that we are in the wrong pew in the wrong church in the wrong area by providing military assistance to the Contras.

I think that what will be offered tomorrow by this side can be agreed to by the membership of this House, that we can adopt the Hamilton-Barnes amendment. I think that offers a real chance for a more successful U.S. policy in Central America.

All of us on this side and everyone on that side agrees that Central America is important. The sea lanes of the Caribbean practically could be controlled by the countries in that area. It is really the bridge to South America. We all know it and if we cannot get stability in Central America, we are not going to have stability anywhere in that area. I am conscious of this; so I have some very deep feelings about it. I have expressed those deep feelings in the past.

I also want to say that I want to express my deep appreciation and respect to the Members on both sides who served on the Intelligence Committee during the term that I served as chairman for 7 years; it was a committee that was run in my judgment in a nonpartisan manner. There was no better Member of this Congress than the distinguished ranking minority member from Virginia, my friend, KEN ROBINSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I believe that the admiration shared by both sides of the aisle for the gentleman's outstanding service as chairman of the Intelligence Committee is without question.

I also believe we are voting on another resolution tomorrow, proposed by our distinguished minority leader, that I believe would more closely align with the thinking of General Gorman, who you mentioned earlier.

I think it is very important when we quote a general of the distinguished reputation of General Gorman not just to say that he said Contra aid was not enough to overthrow the Sandinista government. It is also important to add to that that he is in strong support not only of that aid, but of increased amounts of aid.

I think if asked, he would say that the linchpin, El Salvador, cannot survive very long if we enact the Barnes-Hamilton amendment tomorrow, unless we allow some kind of humanitarian aid to be given to the Contras along with a cease-fire, along with mediation by the bishops, and most of which I believe that we are in agreement with.

The tragedy I think of what is going on now is that we are voting on what is obviously a moot point, that is the resolution that is before us, instead of getting to whether we adopt the Hamilton-Barnes amendment or the Michel amendment, which is really what this debate should be all about.

But please make no mistake about the admiration and respect all of us have for the services of the gentleman from Massachusetts as chairman.

Mr. BOLAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the ranking member of the Select Committee on Intelligence, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, the President's plan is clear, specific, and designed for success in Central America.

The President has asked both the Sandinista government and the Nicaraguan resistance to lay down their arms and to accept church-mediated talks on internationally supervised elections and on ending repression of the church, the press, and individual rights. The President also has asked the Congress to release the $14 million it conditionally appropriated for aid to the Nicaraguan resistance.

The President has pledged that, during the period that the cease-fire offer is on the table, the released funds will be used solely for humanitarian support to the Nicaraguan resistance groups, which specifically excludes arms and munitions.

The President's plan combines the key elements of a successful policy. The cease-fire stops the bloodshed in Nicaragua. Mediation by the church ensures that the mediators will have the trust and confidence of the people of Nicaragua.

The Governments of Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador have endorsed the President's plan. On April 12, President Suazo of Honduras informed a House Intelligence Committee delegation that his country supports the President's plan, especially since it goes hand in hand with the Contadora process.

On April 13, Acting President Arauz and Foreign Minister Gutierrez of Costa Rica told the committee delegation that Costa Rica supports the President's initiative.

In addition to Honduras and Costa Rica, El Salvador has expressed its support for the President's plan. President Duarte recently wrote to President Reagan, stating in part:

> Your initiative and approach have my complete support and I strongly urge all of the friends of Central America in your Congress to give it their full backing. It is the right step at the right time in our quest for peace and democracy in this region.
> We remain concerned, as we have been for some time, by the continuing flow of supplies and munitions from Nicaragua to Guerilla forces here in El Salvador which are fighting against my government and our programs of reform, democracy, reconciliation, and peace.

Mr. Chairman, our friends and allies who are most directly affected, support the Reagan plan for peace. The plan is a carefully balanced approach to a difficult situation and every element in the plan is critical to its success, including the release of the $14 million for the Nicaraguan resistance. Congress must do its part to give a just peace a chance by supporting the President's plan and releasing the funds.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR].

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is an issue which the House has debated extensively in the past. It is an issue on which the House has acted repeatedly, with conviction and courage. Today, the American people are once again looking to this body for decisive leadership.

The current administration's policy of financing, organizing, training, and arming counterrevolutionaries fighting to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government is leading this Nation into a widening war in Central America. This is a policy that is illegal, unjust, and does not have the support of the vast majority of the people of this Nation.

Today, we debate far more than whether the United States should provide an additional $14 million to the Contras. We face, instead, the larger question of whether the United States will continue to seek an ever-increasing military role in the region.

A recent New York Times article clearly documents that the administration views this $14 million as part of an effort to expand the U.S.-supported guerrilla forces to a 35,000-member army. This enlarged army will require substantially increased U.S. funding of at least $100 million per year. Even more disturbing, the administration sees aid to the Contras as part of a policy which considers the "direct application of U.S. military force" as an "eventual option."

Mr. Chairman, Americans do not shrink from battle when the cause is just. Around the globe, there are places of honor, where Americans have fought bravely for the values we hold. There are ever-present reminders of the wars we have won when principle was on our side. But our policy in Central America today has confounded those values, and clouded those principles.

We are asked to embrace as freedom fighters paramilitary forces who burn homes, and destroy crops, who murder, torture, rape, and kidnap innocent civilians.

We are asked to accept as spiritual descendents of our Founding Fathers, a counterrevolutionary army in which 46 out of 48 leaders in the command structure—including the entire general staff, 5 out of 6 regional commanders, and all 30 task force commanders— are former members of Anastasio Somoza's National Guard. This is the same national guard that, during 1978, its last year in power, was condemned by the OAS for its "numerous artrocities" including "mass murders of minors and summary executions of civilians * * *."

We are asked to endorse a policy which is so out of control that, in order to rein in the very forces we are supporting, the CIA published and distributed its infamous special operations manual giving instructions for hired assassins, and sanctioning numerous violations of the laws of war.

We are asked to resume funding for a policy that has encouraged state-sponsored terrorism in the mining of Nicaragua's harbors; a policy that this administration has refused to defend before the World Court; a policy that has undercut not only our own standing in the international community, but the very foundation of international law itself.

This policy is neither just nor justifiable. In the past 2 years, we have watched its architects fumble for a rationale. First we were told, the goal was to interdict arms, then, to pressure the Nicaraguans toward internal reforms, and now we are told that we will not be satisfied until the Nicaraguan Government says "uncle."

Lacking a foundation in principle, law or reason, the administration has recently tried to use the prestige of others to cloak its own weakness. We were told by the White House that President Betancur of Colombia, a leader of the Contadora peace process, had endorsed U.S. policy. We were told this, until President Betancur himself came forth to repudiate directly any renewed aid to the Contras as "intervention in the internal affairs of the continent."

Next, we were told Pope John Paul II endorses U.S. policy in Central America. We were told this, until the Vatican, too, came forth to state that the church does not favor increased military aid to the region. Indeed, Archbishop John O'Connor, speaking for the U.S. Catholic Conference, has warned that military aid to the forces seeking to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua "* * * undermines the moral standing of the U.S. in the world community."

Finally, in a move that can only be interpreted as a sign of profound desperation, the administration has turned its attacks on those who oppose its policy. It has accused its critics of being tools of foreign governments, and it has called upon the FBI to investigate U.S. citizens who dare to see for themselves the full force of our policy in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the President was correct in invoking the spirit of our Founding Fathers in this most important debate. For that spirit is very much alive in this country today. It has been kept alive by a people who remember that our Founding Fathers fought for a government of laws, for human dignity, and for the sovereignty of nations. And, I am proud to say, that spirit had also been kept alive by this House, which over the past 2 years has voted time and time again to end a policy which so cynically betrays these principles. I hope the Members of this body will keep that spirit in mind today, and vote no further funding for the Contras.

□ 1140

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 3 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] will respond in a colloquy, particularly about the figures he stated earlier concerning the Somoza leadership within the resistance forces, the democratic resistance forces.

I was there in their main logistical headquarters somewhere near the border of Honduras, and so was a distinguished Member on your side of the aisle who is a foreign affairs subcommittee chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. STEPHEN SOLARZ. He was there 3 weeks before the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. VIN WEBER, and I visited the headquarters 3 weeks ago.

I have a list put in my hands by the resistance commanders of whom you spoke, giving Mr. WEBER and me each one of the 56 regional commanders' names and their background by profession. There is 1 former university student, 1 medical student, 1 evangelical pastor, 1 radio technician, 12 campesinos, that is peasant commanders, 27 Sandinistas who feel that their revolution was betrayed, and only 13 members of the former Somoza Guardia Nationale.

Of those 13 former Guardia members there are 5 former first lieutenants, 3 former second lieutenants, 2 sergeants, 2 privates, and Commandante Michael Lima who was a 19-year-old student in the military academy in Managua in July of 1979 when No. 1 hero Eden Pastora led the victorious revolutionary forces into Managua, driving out the Somoza Guardia.

There is not a single former captain or major or colonel in the command structure of the resistance left over from the Somoza Guard.

Enrique Bermudez, commander of the FDN forces in the north of Nicaragua, as you well know, was in this city, Washington, DC, as the military attaché assigned to the Nicaraguan Embassy. He was here because he was an enemy of Somoza, and Somoza had virtually banished him by sending him up to Washington, DC, for over a 3-year period.

I do not know what wall you plucked your figures off. I am sure you honorably believe they are correct. But they are just not the facts.

Since the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] also visited this command headquarters and was introduced, the first Member of this body so introduced, to a little girl whose throat had been severely scarred by Sandinista soldiers. In that same command headquarters with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. VIN WEBER, we were introduced to a little 10-year-old girl and her mother. The younger brother had been killed and the little girl had been shot in her arm by Sandinistas. Why? Because they were at a prayer meeting. If we are going to trade atrocity for atrocity in this Chamber we at least should first make statements as clear and as straightforward as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] made. Then we can deal with these fraudulent and bloated figures about former Somosistas. I do not know where you are getting these figures unless it is from the disinformation campaign that the Sandinistas have beat us over the head with on this Hill for over 3 years.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding. The figures were obtained from the arms control and foreign policy caucus of the U.S. Congress, of which we have Members of both parties, headed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH] and the vice chairman is Senator MATHIAS.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I am a member of the official House Subcommittee on Arms Control and International Security, but not of that caucus he mentions. We have had no figures like these ever come before our Committee on Foreign Affairs that so grossly twist the truth. A 180° twist. I can gladly make available to the Member, as I have done to every member on the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, every single one of these resistance commanders' names, which I am sure puts them in jeopardy. But they were willing to let me bring this command structure list up here to the Congress, and they said, "No, we do not want you to keep the list secret. We know that it jeopardizes our lives, but we are out there in the hills fighting anyway. We are more jeopardized, our cause is more jeopardized, by the disinformation lies that come out of Managua orchestrated by Cuba and the East Germans."

□ 1150

So please, I yield to you to continue.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Well, I do not think these are lies. I do not think Senator MATHIAS or Congressman PETRI would take as gospel what comes out of East Germany or Havana. I mean this is a part, this is a report by Members of the U.S. Congress from both parties.

The gentleman suggested in his statement earlier that these people were schoolteachers, ministers, and other things.

I suggest to you that one can easily have two vocations. One can certainly be a laborer, one can certainly be a camposino but one can also be a former member of the guard and have participated in the atrocities that I alluded to that the OAS condemned them for.

Mr. DORNAN of California. My friends, any one of these resistance leaders would be made available to us for questioning, if we would give them a month's notice before our trip they would bring these men out of the field, it takes up to a month to cycle into combat areas by foot, to come up to these camps in Honduras to meet with Congressmen because the resistance fighters now realize that they are losing severely a propaganda war. I am sorry for using a harsh indictment but it is true so I must. We are witnessing the Joseph Goebbels technique of the big lie, the massive big lie, the unrelenting 180° twisting of truth stated over and over and over and over again. You find naive nuns going down to Managua on the so-called revolutionary tourist trips. The nuns and naive ministers and naive priests return here and spread these Marxist lies. We've had 4 years of this baloney so of course you are going to get Members of Congress accepting figures off the wall and putting them into semiofficial reports. I just believe that there are real figures and our embassies have them and deserve to be trusted. We should at least try to participate in this debate on the high level of disagreement that Mr. BOLAND started it off.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to applaud the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] on his statement because actually every time that we have ever made an attempt to confirm these alleged atrocities on behalf of the Contras, we strike out. Let me not refer to us; let me refer to an unbiased source: Two missionaries, experienced young missionaries, one Wesley Smith, a 23-year-old senior studying international relations at Brigham Young University who served as a missionary to Spanish speaking people in Argentina and Arizona and Richard Rygg, a 28-year-old receiving his MBA from Pennsylvania State University in the year 1985.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes additional to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield further to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Mr. Rygg served as a missionary in Nicaragua and in Costa Rica and Honduras in 1977 to 1979. They went down between December and January just a few months ago to Nicaragua and they interviewed hundreds of people. These are Mormon missionaries who went down there and interviewed hundreds of people throughout the countryside in Nicaragua.

They found absolutely no evidence of systematic abuses conducted by the Contras from the people they interviewed, no accusations were received which spoke of Contra forces intentionally killing, torturing or raping civilians or Sandinista war prisoners. In fact, they found almost the opposite was true. Of those Nicaraguans who spoke of civilians being killed, nearly all mentioned that only the Sandinistas were participating in such activities, indiscriminate bombing, shooting, torture, and so on.

And of the abuses that they allege against the Sandinistas which is documented in a 30-page report ad nauseam and with some degree of distaste I might add, there were allegations, documented by Nicaragua citizens of forced recruitment of Nicaraguan youth by the Sandinista military, religious persecution, indiscriminate shelling of villages, mistreatment of prisoners, forced voluntarism in the co-op system which is forced labor, and repression of the opposition. That is an authoritative well-documented report. I think it really does much to negate a lot of the statements that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has made.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a serious mistake if we allow this debate to degenerate into who has perpetrated the most atrocities because the tragedy of civil war is that there are atrocities committed on both sides.

I would submit to the gentleman from Michigan that I would like to see him recheck his facts as to the leadership of these freedom fighters in Nicaragua because I think it is a very important part of this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues not to get into a debate as to who has perpetrated the most atrocities because that would put us into an endless dialog which is based on a difference of opinion.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEWIS of California. I appreciate my colleague yielding.

Frankly I would strongly endorse the comments of the gentleman from Arizona. I present my facts quite as colorfully as the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] but I submit for the record the following, a list of 56 of the most prominent Nicaraguans from all walks who in 1979 worked with the Sandinistas to overthrow Somoza, showing the present situation of each person. Twenty-seven of those are currently in exile, 23 inside Nicaragua are opposing the FSLN. There are six who remain within that government movement. The fact is that there has been a significant shift among those who originally opposed Somoza and supported the Sandinistas.

Following that is a list of some of the prominent or senior members of the FSLN who are now calling for its removal from power.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that for the RECORD:

WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman. I do not know what part of my remarks he finds too colorful but the Joseph Goebbels big lie technique has prevailed in this country for 4 years. There was a network of disinformation orchestrated by the country called Nicaragua. Those nine commandantes owe their allegiance to Leninist philosphy, not the truth.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] to respond to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I just want to respond briefly: There is no question that some of the political leadership of the Contras, Mr. Robelo, Mr. Cruz, Mr. Colero, obviously were not members of Somoza's National Guard. They made a break with Somoza, I acknowledge that.

The question is are these facts right? They are. The military leadership of the Contras are former National Guardsmen. There can be no dispute about that.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I take the floor only to ask a question of Mr. MICHEL, the author of House Joint Resolution 239.

Mr. MICHEL, I am disturbed by just the pure wording of the resolution and I want to ask the gentleman what his interpretation of this is. It says "that the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua." Now, Mr. MICHEL, let me ask the gentleman: First of all, are we declaring war on Nicaragua?

Mr. MICHEL. Well, of course not. And the gentleman, if he will just refer to my earlier remarks when I said I was obliged to introduce it in this form as a result of the continuing resolution. Had I my own volition this morning, it would have been other words. But we were obliged to do it this way. No matter who would have made it.

Mr. GIBBONS. I want to make it clear: You are not giving to the President any power or authority to commit American troops?

Mr. MICHEL. Of course not.

Mr. GIBBONS. To combat in Nicaragua?

Mr. MICHEL. That is the furthest thing that any leadership meeting which I have attended with the President; he has never ever talked about infusion of military forces on our part in that area.

Mr. GIBBONS. I want to make it clear. I am not accusing the gentleman of doing that. I am just trying to establish the clear, unequivocal history of this language.

□ 1200

I do not want somebody coming back here a few years from now and saying, "Oh, this is what Mr. MICHEL intended."

Mr. MICHEL. I understand that. And, as a matter of fact, that is why, in prefacing the debate, I made it very clear that this was the strictured kind of tightly structured rules under which I had to frame the resolution. As I said, had I my druthers, it would have certainly taken a different form that would have been consistent with what the President has been talking about to implement the San Jose agreement in Costa Rica.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. I see Mr. BROOMFIELD, Mr. MCDADE, and Mr. STUMP here on the floor. Do all of you agree with the statement that is made by Mr. MICHEL, the principal sponsor of this resolution, that, one, this is not a declaration of war and, two, it does not give the President the authority to introduce U.S. military forces into Nicaragua? Is that your interpretation of this resolution?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. That is my interpretation.

Mr. GIBBONS. And yours, Mr. STUMP?

Mr. STUMP. I concur completely.

Mr. GIBBONS. And yours, Mr. MCDADE?

Mr. MICHEL. He is not on the floor.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. With all due respect to our colleagues, their interpretations are of little value because what it does is in fact give the President the authority either directly or indirectly for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. That is what the law would say, that is what the resolution would say if passed. I assume that is why the House and the Senate and the American people have found it to be so disagreeable, because it may only allow a little $14 million war, but nevertheless it allows that war either directly or indirectly by the U.S. Government.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the President recently referred to the Contras as the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers—this comparison may have moved many Americans who venerate George Washington, Ben Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and their cohorts who risked everything to found our Nation.

But those of us who honor our own Founding Fathers will find it difficult to reckon their high-minded ideals with the barbaric tactics of the Contras in Nicaragua.

The April 29 issue of Newsweek shows in graphic detail a Sandinista prisoner digging his own grave, then lying down in it as one of these so-called freedom fighters sticks a knife through his throat. Another purported Founding Father then stabs the Sandinista collaborator in the stomach and leaves him to bleed to death.

During a recent visit to Nicaragua I met a woman whose young daughter was gunned down by one of these Contra freedom fighters as she walked up a hill to teach in a rural school.

Reckoning the finest traditions and the noblest heroes of the American Nation will not enhance the image of terrorism which now characterizes the Contra effort. This loose language by the administration serves only to besmirch the memory of our own noble patriots. Profaning that memory cannot legitimize or enhance the bloody tactics which the administration's policy in Nicaragua would have us endorse and finance with American dollars.

The spectacle of American foreign policy supporting the Contras and inflicting grievous damage on the lives of poor and helpless people produces reactions by millions around the world detrimental to the image we would like them to hold of this country.

As the President's characterization of the Contras falls so far from the facts, so also do his statements concerning the realities of Nicaraguan life and the image of our country in the minds of Nicaraguans.

The United States has invaded Nicaragua three times in this century. We had troops stationed in this tiny, impoverished country for 21 years, from 1912 to 1933. Our foreign policy was not impelled by any evangelical fervor for the spread of democracy—we were determined to protect American companies doing business in Nicaragua and to guarantee that any government in that country would be our client. We presided over the installation of the Somoza family into power and the United States nurtured that family's corrupt takeover of the economy of Nicaragua. We turned a blind eye to the degrading poverty in Nicaragua so long as our companies and diplomats were welcomed.

Is it any wonder that we are now reaping the bitter harvest of a century of foreign policy decisions in Central America which stifled any nationalistic aspirations or any hope of breaking the chains of poverty?

In February I traveled to Managua and met in Managua with a peasant woman, standing barefoot, in a dirt street in a barrio in that city, and I asked her: "Is life different or better since the Somozans are out of power and the Sandinistas are in power?" She said: "It is better. We have electricity, our children are in school, they have been immunized." She said the prices of milk were going up and she conceded that was a worry, but there were not the same reports of corruption in the government of the Sandinistas that she had heard of the government under Somoza.

The Contras in Nicaragua have a long road to travel before they can win the hearts and minds of people like this peasant woman.

I harbor no delusions about the Sandinistas. I left their country with grave concerns over their treatment of the Catholic Church, press censorship, the militarization of their nation and their treatment of the Miskito Indians. But despite these obvious failings, by any objective, democratic standard, the Sandinistas still have a society where the private business community can meet openly and criticize their government; where the Catholic Church, despite harassment, can publish pastoral letters encouraging Nicaraguans to defy the draft; and where a principal newspaper in Managua can accept financial aid from the United States and continue to publish articles critical of the Sandinistas. If the Sandinistas do not fit easily into any democratic mold, neither do they conform with any image of a totalitarian Communist state. The real question is how the United States can force the Sandinistas closer to our democratic values. Lending our financial support to the Contra effort which is doomed to fail does not serve our strategic or national goals. We must push forward with a regional response, working with our allies to bring stability to Central America and seek nonmilitary methods to encourage and force change in the Sandinistas government.

I left Nicaragua realizing that our challenge there is substantial; it is clear that our present policy only serves to drive the Sandinistas closer to the Soviets and Cubans.

We continue to assess the Nicaragua situation in terms of preconceived, fixed notions while ignoring any contrary signs. No experience of the failure of our policy can shake our belief in its essential value.

I am troubled by our role in Nicaragua and the smell of the swamp we are getting into.

Denying the sovereignty of Nicaragua, investing our Nation's resources in prolonging the death and suffering in that nation, escalating our military role in the region are the key elements in this hopeless enterprise.

The House of Representatives by denying the President's request for $14 million in aid to the Nicaraguan Contras does not endorse the Sandinistas. But by our actions today we make it clear that we are not so woodenheaded as to deny our history or so savage as to follow a policy which will leave the blood of innocents on our hands.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DURBIN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. It is my understanding that your statement is that we wish to encourage change through regional activity; is that correct?

Mr. DURBIN. That is correct.

Mr. McCAIN. Would the gentleman be a little bit more specific as to what form these actions might take?

Mr. DURBIN. I will use two specific examples. I recently had an opportunity to reread the history of the Cuban missile crisis. The Kennedy administration, before embarking on their policy, vis-a-vis the Soviet Union and Cuba, initially made contact with the OAS, to make certain that we had the regional support of our allies in the activities we were undertaking. I think that is an essential element and one that this administration has ignored.

Second, I believe that we should invest more of our political capital in the Contadora process. We have all heard the President of Mexico come before this House and ask the United States to stop militarizing the conflict in Central America. If we are concerned about the spread of communism into Texas or the southern United States, certainly the Mexicans must share that concern. I think we should invest our capital into supporting the Contadora process for our strategic purposes and our strategic security.

Mr. McCAIN. If the gentleman would yield further, I believe that this administration and all of us here strongly are supportive of the Contadora process, as has been displayed, and I would hope that we would continue in that effort, too.

Mr. DURBIN. If I might reclaim my time for just a second, the conversations which I had with the Mexican Government during that trip, as well as the people in our Embassy, really betrayed the statement which the gentleman just made. There was an open skepticism that anything would come of the Contadora process from our Embassy officials in that part of the world. That kind of a cynical attitude suggests to me that we really have not told the countries in that region that we are prepared to stand by any regional pact.

Mr. McCAIN. If the gentleman will yield for just one more question, does the gentleman believe that an important part of this settlement should be a dialog between the government and the Contras or freedom fighters?

Mr. DURBIN. Yes, I do.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DURBIN. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, the security of the United States depends on our ability to counter the spread of Marxist-Leninist regimes, whether in Cambodia—14,000 miles away, in Afghanistan—10,000 miles away, or in Nicaragua—900 miles away.

Our security also depends on our ability to assure our allies that our commitment to their security is just as strong as to our own, whether to the ASEAN nations, to NATO or to the Organization of American States.

For those who look at the threat represented by Nicaragua and state they are worried about involving U.S. troops in another Vietnam or who say they are concerned about human rights, then the most appropriate action is to support the President's proposal.

If we do not support the Contras with American funding now in their opposition to the Sandinista regime then we may well have to use American manpower later to stop the spread of Marxist-Leninist regimes in this hemisphere.

As a recent Washington Post commentary explains: Even the Mig scare last November demonstrates that—

> Nothing is more likely to force American military intervention than the consolidation of an aggressive, highly militarized, pro-Soviet regime in the area. The Contras want to do their own fighting. Cut them off and the only body in the hemisphere able to restrain the Sandinistas will be the U.S. Army.

If the concern is truly for respect for human rights, then we must vigorously oppose a system, as represented by the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua, whose sole means of survival is the implementation of a policy that institutionalizes the repression of human rights.

For those who now say we should accept the promises of the Sandinista regime for their latest peace proposal, we need only remember the promises of the Sandinistas to the OAS in 1979 to doubt their sincerity once again.

Migual Bolanos is a former Sandinista intelligence official who has described the Sandinista view of negotiations:

> We wanted dialogue. The strategy is that we are willing to dialogue to allow more time for clandestine operation. Especially with the U.S. with dialogue there is more political space that is advantageous to Nicaragua. . . . But dialogue is more a political tool than anything else; you can use it as a cover.

The Sandinistas use whatever tactics they believe will serve their own political or propaganda purposes. Their invitation to visit military installations in their country to confirm they are not intended for offensive use was a pure propaganda ploy. As Congressman MIKE DEWINE and I, and several others who have visited Nicaragua, can attest to, the Sandinistas refused to let us visit their military bases. That is one more example of the insincerity of the Sandinista motives.

Last week, our Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs held a series of hearings on U.S. support for the Contras. A long list of witnesses testified at length on both sides of the issue. In spite of the deep divisions among the witnesses and the members of the subcommittee on support for the Contras, one general conclusion was apparent from those hearings. Almost everyone agreed the Sandinistas are repressive, have exported revolution, and that something must be done about them Adm. Stansfield Turner agreed in his testimony saying:

> I am not supporting the Sandinistas, sir. I think they are terrible. It is how to get rid of them.

As Dr. John Silber, president of Boston University and a Democrat who served on the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America told us last week:

> The island of Cuba has become a massive Soviet forward base from which revolution is exported to Central America . . . [is] the United States . . . prepared to tolerate in our hemisphere the consolidation of a second Soviet satellite[?].

Jean Francois Revel, the distinguished French political commentator, recently wrote "Can the Democracies survive?" In his commentary he describes a Soviet official's statement to a cabinet minister under former French President Giscard D'Estaing. The Soviet official said:

> We took Angola and you did not protest. We even saw that you could have beaten us in Angola—the Government was on our side, but it was within an ace of giving up—and that you did nothing to win; on the contrary. And when, to save ourselves, we sent in 30,000 Cuban soldiers, Ambassador Andrew Young, a member of the American Cabinet, said it was a positive step and an element of stability. All right, we noted the fact and included it in our analyses. Then we took Mozambique. Forget it, you don't even know where it is. Then we took Ethiopia, a key move. There again we noted that you could have replied via Somalia or Eritrea or both. No reply. We noted that and put it into our analyses. Then we took Aden and set up a powerful Soviet base there. Aden! On the Arabian peninsula! In the heart of your supply center! No response. So we noted: We can take Aden.

You can add to the list by including Nicaragua and Afghanistan.

Revel also describes the irony that "democratic civilization is the first in history to blame itself because another power is working to destroy it." That fits into the "blame America first" school of thought. Revel goes on to say:

Not only do the democracies today blame themselves for sins they have not committed, they have formed the habit of judging themselves by ideals so inaccessible that the defendants are automatically guilty. Clearly a civilization that feels guilty for everything it is and does and thinks will lack the energy and conviction to defend itself when its existence is threatened . . . Strategic necessity is regarded as justification enough for a Soviet presence in another country, or a Soviet alliance with or aid to that country . . . A democracy, on the other hand, is not granted the right to defend the vital barricades of its own security unless the democratic imperative is obeyed . . . Progressive and even centrist opinion throughout the world granted North Vietnam "popular" legitimacy on trust, which its history after 1975 did not support, but which its totalitarian and aggressive behavior even before 1975 never seemed to diminish.

The lessons of history are clear for those who study them. Marxist-Leninist regimes are not isolationist. They have expanded their power wherever the opportunity has permitted. The Sandinista commandante communists have said they will export their revolution. Tomas Borge was quoted in the September 1983 Playboy in answer to a question about the domino theory. He said, "that is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that is absolutely true."

Again, as John Silber told our subcommittee:

Totalitarians do not stop; they must be stopped.

As he added—

All historical experience suggests that hopes of a merely diplomatic solution to the crisis posed by the Sandinistas are almost certain to be disappointed. The only solution likely to come from diplomacy unsupported by intensive pressure is the sort reached at Munich in 1938. Diplomacy is a complement to, not a substitute for, the measured application of geopolitical pressure.

As Congressman MIKE DEWINE and I were told when we were in Nicaragua last month, the only way to prevent the Sandinista Communists from consolidating total control over their country and enabling them to export their revolution is to keep the pressure on them. The way to keep that pressure on them is to continue to support the Contras. It is only through that kind of pressure that you can expect meaningful negotiations with the Sandinista. Democratic opposition groups told us they had been public enemy No. 1. Now they are No. 2. The Contras are now public enemy No. 1. But they, the pluralistic groups, will again be No. 1. If the Contras disappear, many of the groups said we should support the freedom fighters. Even those who did not, said they would be in serious trouble if the Contras cease to be.

The security of the United States cannot wait until we have to fight at our own borders. We must stop the threat now. I urge my colleagues to support the President's proposal to aid the Contras and thereby protect our own national security.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, in listening to my colleague read that quotation, from whom did it emanate?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. John Francois Revel.

Mr. KEMP. In his book, "Why Democracies Perish."

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. It was a quote from "Can a Democracy Survive?"

Mr. KEMP. I was thinking how eerie it was to hear that comment. I do not think a lot of folks were listening, but how strangely reminiscent it was of the 1930's. This is the 40th anniversary of the liberation of Europe and the end of World War II. One could go back to the thirties and recall that some of the countries alluded to by the gentleman in the quotation from Revel's book, "Why Democracies Perish."

In 1935, when the Nazis were violating the Versailles Treaty and the Fascist Italian Government of Mussolini was invading Abyssinia, the argument was made that the West need not worry, Abyssinia was too far away and besides it does not affect us what an error to let Hitler and Mussolini think we didn't care. This is the 40th anniversary of the liberation of Europe, but it's the 50th anniversary of the passage by Congress of the Neutrality Act.

One of the previous speakers said that, "A vote against the aid to Contras would not be an endorsement of the Sandinistas." I agree, but let me tell you what it would be, it would be an act of neutrality as to what will be the final outcome in this hemisphere of the struggle going on not only in the Isthmus of Central America, but in the eastern Caribbean between freedom and communism. It seems to me the gentleman's statement is right on target when reminding us that we must learn a basic lesson of history. That is that weakness is provacative and that we can't turn our back and declare our neutrality about what happens in Central America. Neutrality and isolationism is going to affect every other country in that region of the world, and ultimately the whole hemisphere in an adverse way detrimental to freedom, peace and democracy.

I compliment my friend from California for his remarks, and I particularly appreciate his allusion to the historical significance of what failures the West made in Africa and the third world in the seventies. I wanted to rise and not only compliment the gentleman, but to suggest that I had the eerie feeling that I was living through another repeat of some of the same mistakes of the thirties as well.

Let me say that I support this resolution because I believe it is morally right for the United States to help people who are fighting for democracy.

As Charles Krauthammer has written:

The great moral dilemmas of American foreign policy arise when the pursuit of security and the pursuit of democracy clash. "Contra" aid is not such a case.

We have vital strategic interests in maintaining the security and stability of Central America. And we have a deep and abiding interest in seeing democracy flourish in our own hemisphere. In supporting the resistance in Nicaragua, we support both our security interests and the cause of freedom.

It has been said that there is no man so blind as one who will not see. Similarly, there is no country so powerless as one that will not act. Managua is almost precisely the geopolitical center of our own hemisphere. If we cannot muster the national will to help those who would resist communism here, who beyond our shores can be confident of our support?

I do not understand how it is that we can reach a bipartisan consensus on the need to help El Salvador and Costa Rica and Honduras and the other countries of the region defend themselves, while remaining so divided on the central question of what to do about Nicaragua. So long as the Nicaraguan Government remains free to continue its weapons buildup and to promote subversion against its neighbors, the security of all nations in the region will be threatened. All our efforts to bring peace and democracy to El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica will come to naught if we create a sanctuary next door—guaranteed by congressional legislation—for those who bring war and totalitarianism to El Salvador.

Many opponents of covert aid to Nicaragua have argued that it is wrong for us to intervene in the internal affairs of another country. Yet just last year, we approved $250 million in aid to the Afghan freedom fighters. Here, we are arguing over less than one-tenth that amount for freedom fighters in our own hemisphere.

And we have stood by in anguish over our inability to help the cause of solidarity in Poland. Are there any in this Chamber who would have refused to help, if we had the means to do so?

Today, in Nicaragua, a country so close to our borders, we do have the power to help. Will this Congress vote to turn our backs on these people struggling for their basic human rights? And if we do turn away, how will we erase our callousness from our conscience?

The Sandinistas have rejected every effort at a negotiated peace:

Earlier this year, the different factions among the freedom fighters joined together in a show of unity at San Jose. In an appeal to end the war, and to begin to resolve the grievances that brought Nicaraguans to arms, they proclaimed a unilateral ceasefire and called on Daniel Ortega to join in negotiations for peace. But Ortega rejected their overture for peace, just as he rejected the pleas of the Catholic bishops last year for negotiations with the resistance.

This month, when President Reagan renewed this appeal for negotiated reconciliation, placing the good faith and credit of the United States behind the offer, the Sandinistas impugned his motives and scorned his appeal, just as they repudiated their promises to the OAS to hold free and fair elections and to respect the rights of the people of Nicaragua.

We must not reward Sandinista intransigence by abandoning the freedom fighters.

After the sham elections in Nicaragua last year, there are no responsible internal voices that view the Sandinista government as having any moral legitimacy. Nicaragua's most respected national leaders, who fought with the revolution—men like Arturo Cruz and Adolfo Calero, and Eden Pastora—are the most ardent advocates of the freedom fighters' cause. They know perhaps better than anyone the great gap between the promises of the revolution and the betrayal by the Sandinista regime.

The Catholic bishops, in a display of courage and leadership, have denounced the abuses of the Sandinista regime, and have criticized the control and guidance it is receiving from Cuba. On Good Friday last year, 100,000 Catholics took to the streets in Managua, in a demonstration of defiance against the Sandinista regime. And their ranks are growing.

It is this resurgence of the spirit of freedom that our aid to the freedom fighters helps keep alive. If we withdraw that support now, we will certainly demoralize those who have dared to oppose the ruling dictatorship.

I have heard some say that things are not as bad as they seem, that there is still a measure of freedom in Nicaragua. But we are only 5 years into the rule of a new totalitarian government, in a country new to Marxist controls. And in that short a time, Freedom House reports that:

Several thousand Miskito Indians have been forcibly resettled;

The Catholic Church intimidated;

There are thousands of political prisoners; many detainees—including labor leaders—are prisoners of conscience;

Killing and intimidation occur, especially in rural areas;

Thousands of disappearances have been reported;

Foreign travel is restricted;

Internal travel is restricted;

Enterprises and farms are being nationalized;

Newspapers and radio stations are mostly under Government control;

Private television is not allowed;

La Prensa is under consorship; and Political opposition is severely restricted; and Government gangs break up opposition rallies;

Freedom House also reports that Nicaragua is still freer than Cuba. But the history of totalitarian regimes has been tragically consistent: If the free world looks away, the Sandinista regime will consolidate its hold over the country, wiping out what vestiges of freedom remain and establish another Cuba in Central America.

There is no doubt that the Soviet Union and Cuba want to see communism spread further in Central America. The question is, Will the United States support those people that want democracy and are willing to fight for their own freedom?

The great liberal pilosopher John Stuart Mill believed that the desire for liberty was an irrepressible human drive. In this regard, the people of Nicaragua are no different from the people of the United States. With this vote, we will decide whether we will give them the assistance they need to establish their democracy, just as others two centuries ago were generous and compassionate enough to help us establish ours.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that at the end of the debate today we would come to the end of a long and tortuous road and end our involvement with the military actions by the Contras in Nicaragua.

These are actions that were conceived because of an absence of a policy by the Reagan administration, because they could not conceive of a policy to deal with the Sandinista government; to deal with what they viewed our security interests in Latin America to be. They decided that they would turn it over to the CIA Agency. They would allow them to get rid of this problem.

It is the absence of that policy that created the quagmire, the death, the violence that we now see in Latin America. Because when they were handing the CIA the possibility of putting together a small strike force to interdict arms, the CIA went to the Argentinians, procured the best of those who could train terrorists, hired them, went to the September 15th Brigade, who had formed after the ouster of Somoza, and put them together with American money and American know-how and created a terrorist organization that we now know as the Contras.

Those people who were high in the command of the National Guard continue to be high in the command of the Contras. Those people who engaged in the atrocities of Somoza continue to engage in the atrocities of the National Guard.

As we have heard on this floor time and again, as we have debated this issue, all of the precepts for this policy have disappeared. They have not interdicted any arms. They have not uncovered any massive flow of arms, personnel or material from Nicaragua to Salvador, but the forces continue to grow, and as that rationale evaporated, as our own Intelligence Committee started to question the continued buildup and the absence of results, as we debated again, as we spent $80 million to create this strike force, what we saw time and again was that we were creating a proxy force so we could engage in a war against the people and the government of Nicaragua.

That proxy war has now been in existence for some 3 years. It has brought discredit upon this Nation. It has brought discredit upon this administration. Hopefully by the vote of this Congress to end that proxy war, we will not concur in that operation.

We have said to this administration time and again that the Congress of the United States does not agree with this policy, we believe that it is bankrupt, we believe that it is counterproductive to what even the goals of this administration says that it desires in Nicaragua. But somehow, this administration has never gotten that message, so they have decided to continue to prosecute these acts of violence that are well documented, documented by church organizations, documented by independent observers, documented by nonpolitical observers, the acts of violence by the Contras as they roam northern Nicaragua, acts against the Nicaraguan economy, against the private sector, against anybody who can provide income for that government, those acts are well documented.

The tragedy is that it was planned for, it has been paid for, it has been assisted by the United States of America. We hold our hand in hand with the Contras. We are responsible for their actions because we continue to fund their actions, and apparently there is no level to the atrocities that can get us to reconsider our policies. There apparently is even now some rational for why we see the person who was on the pages of Newsweek who had his throat sliced and his stomach cut open, that somehow that was justified because the Sandinistas were in the area and they would have heard a shot had he simply been shot, suggesting that that would have been a more humane way to treat that prisoner.

What we must consider is that this is a basic policy decision for the Congress of the United States. I am sorry to see the compromises being offered both by the Democratic side of the aisle and by the Republican side of the aisle, because again we continue to indirectly be involved in the support of the Contras.

I would hope that for once this administration and this Congress would truly define what its security interests are. There is no support in the Congress of the United States for the Nicaraguan Government receiving advanced fighters from the Soviet Union or from Cuba or from Bulgaria or wherever. There is no support to seeing offensive weapons coming into Nicaragua for the purpose of invading their neighbors. And interestingly enough, we find that our Pentagon tells us that it is exactly what we expect, that the buildup that is taking place in Nicaragua is in direct response to the threat by the Contras posed by the funding of this administration for their efforts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we see that they are outdated tanks, that they could not survive the Honduran Air Force should they try to invade Honduras, so what we see is that once again President Reagan has been a little loose with the facts, a little loose with the rhetoric to suggest that, in fact, a massive buildup is taking place. We find out, in fact, that according to the Pentagon that the troops strengths in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, and Costa Rica vary very little between those nations; that these are not offensive, but that is the pretext on which we are seeking to rally the American people behind this policy.

This administration has never supported the Contadora process. They used the Kissinger Commission to undermine the Contadora process to suggest that we had the answer to the problem in Latin America, that the Contadora process had not really thought it through. When the Contadora process came very close to arriving at a peace initiative with the Sandinistas, to be signed by their neighbors, the White House immediately jumped into that process and prevented that from going forth.

So, Contadora has been held in a weakened state by this administration so, in fact, the goals of the Contadora that every Member of this House has gotten up and expressed support for have not been allowed to be realized, have not been allowed to go forward, and then the suggestion is that the failure of Contadora justifies the actions by the Contras. It is morally bankrupt. It is immoral for us to participate in it, and the Congress ought to get some backbone and understand what we understood many months ago: that the policy will not reach the objectives of a more democratic Nicaragua; this policy will not reach the objectives of a less military Nicaragua, it will reach all of the opposite of the concerns Members on both sides of the aisle have expressed over the years.

I hope that we vote down the President's request for the $15 million with a resounding no, and I will express my concern about the compromises when those debates arise.

□ 1230

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

As a member of the Intelligence Committee, let me say that we spent a lot of time on this issue over the last several days. I am disturbed this morning by what I see on the floor of the House as to the amount of misinformation that has been spread about with respect to the backgrounds and qualifications of the men who are the leaders of the opposition to the Sandinista Communist regime in Nicaragua. Therefore, I would like to take just a minute and review, if I may, for the record, the names of some of those key individuals, as well as their backgrounds, so that once and for all we can put to rest the notion that somehow the Contra movement is simply a collection of ex-Somozistas.

Of course, we have to begin with Adolfo Calero, a lifelong opponent of Mr. Somoza and commander in chief of the FDN since December 1983. He began his political career in the 1950's when he joined with Pedro Joaquin Chamorro, the great hero of the Nicaraguan revolution. After the fall of Somoza, Mr. Calero attempted to cooperate with the Sandinistas in rebuilding Nicaragua, but by the end of 1982 he had to flee into exile.

Indalecio Rodriguez is a doctor of veterinary medicine, a professor and president of the University of Central America inside Nicaragua. He participated in the anti-Somoza youth movement, was jailed twice in the 1950's for anti-Somoza activities, returned to a position at the University of Central America where he remained throughout the revolution in 1981, and abandoned the university and went into exile to take up the struggle against the Sandinistas.

Lucia Cardenal Salazar. Mrs. Salazar is the widow of a prominent Nicaraguan businessman. Her husband and she provided refuge for the Sandinista militants during the revolution. Her husband was ultimately shot by the Sandinista state security police. She fled into exile.

Alfonso Robelo, political coordinator of ARDE, head of the MDN, trained as a chemical engineer, director of the University of Central America in the early 1970's, president of the Nicaraguan Chamber of Commerce. After the revolution he was one of the five original members of the junta that governed Nicaragua under the Sandinistas. He resigned in 1980 over the Communist tendencies of the FSLN and complained about the ever growing Cuban presence.

Fernando "El Negro" Chamorro, leader of the FRN and commander of ARDE's military forces, a prominent anti-Somoza figure since the 1940's, participated in numerous military actions against the dictator, repeatedly jailed or exiled by Somoza. In 1979 he fought on the southern front with the Sandinistas.

Eden Pastora, the legendary Commandante Cero, leader of the FRS, the Sandinista Revolutionary Front. He was the Sandinistas' most popular hero and a senior official of the Government until he broke with them in 1982 and took arms up against his former colleagues.

The list is very long, and there is no doubt that anybody who has taken the time to study it would find that in fact the people that are in opposition to the Sandinista regime, both those within Nicaragua who were involved in peaceful opposition as well as armed resistance, are not ex-Somozistas. The overwhelming number of them were in fact opponents of Somoza, and a great many of them served in the Sandinista government after 1979. Charges to the contrary are part of the campaign of disinformation put forward by the Sandinista government.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest, if one starts at the top of the military command and works his way down, he will go some distance before, according to his own committee, the Intelligence Committee, before he runs out of former national guards and starting with Enrique Bermudez, who is a colonel in the guard and is now the strategic commander for the military actions in the field. Then he can go down to the No. 2 person.

I appreciate the political people, and it is these very people that caused Eden Pastora such difficulty in linking up and has caused such difficulty in trying to get the coalition within the Contras that the administration has always sought, because there is recognition that you will never win the hearts and the minds of the Nicaraguan people with these very people leading the military actions.

I would suggest that it is the leadership of these people that is reflected in the kinds of actions we have seen taken in the field by the Contras. So the accusations may not be 100-percent correct.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. So, Mr. Chairman, my point is that the accusation is not correct. Neither one of those accusations is in fact correct.

I recognize that many of the people in the political leadership of the Contras or, if not the Contras, in opposition to the Sandinistas are people who were former allies, either during the revolutionary struggle or afterwards. But by the same token, let us not suggest to this House that they have purged the people from the military leadership and from military involvement within the Contras of all the guardsmen or officers of the guardsmen. These were not all university students at the time of Somoza.

I think we have got to understand that at the very best we have a mixed bag, and when we understand again how this was put together in the very beginning in 1981 after the finding by the administration, what is very clear is that in fact these were people who left because they were non gratis in the country because of their involvement with the national guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

No one has suggested on our side, I would remind my friend, the gentleman from California, that there are no individuals in the FDN operation who were not previously involved in the national guard. Colonel Bermudez was indeed involved in the national guard, but at the time of the revolution he was the attaché of the Nicaraguan Embassy in Washington. He had no involvement in the conflict in Nicaragua.

Earlier today the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] put into the RECORD detailed information that the Intelligence Committee and others have collected on the backgrounds of the top echelon of the FDN forces. Of 56 members, I would remind my friend, the gentleman from California, 27 are former Sandinistas. They fought for the Sandinistas first. Thirteen formerly were members of the national guard, 12 were farmers, 1 doctor, 1 evangelical minister, 1 fourth-year university student, and 1 civilian radio technician. Those are the facts.

Less than 2 percent of the FDN troop total are former Somoza national guard members. Twice as many of the military leadership of the Contras fought against Somoza as were involved with the national guard on behalf of Somoza.

So the suggestion that we are somehow supporting ex-Somozistas trying to overthrow the Government——

Mr. MILLER of California. I would say to the gentleman——

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded. The time is mine.

Mr. Chairman, that frankly is simply not accurate. The bottom line is that the overwhelming number of people involved in overthrowing Somoza now have serious doubts about the Sandinistas. The number of people who have taken up arms against the Sandinista government is three times as great as the number who were involved in fighting on behalf of the Sandinistas against Somoza. This is truly a broad-based revolutionary movement, and it deserves the support of the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for yielding.

I would simply bolster his comments by reference to a Washington Post article dated February 28, 1985, which indicated that the Contra army was made up of 14,000 people, mostly peasants, of which only about 40 officers and about 200 fighters even served with Somoza's National Guard. If you figure that out, that is only 2 percent. And they go on to concede, as the gentleman has already pointed out, that Enrique Bermudez, who is the leader of the Contras in the field, was a Nicaraguan military attaché and had nothing to do with the atrocities under Somoza.

They go on, and there is abundant evidence that the leaders of the Contra movement really have very little, if any, relationship with Somoza. In fact most of the leaders were against Somoza and fought with the Sandinistas and stayed with the Sandinistas until they learned what they truly were.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I continue to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding further, because there is another point I want to make.

I was concerned when I was with the gentleman in Managua just a week or so ago that there seemed to be a continuing trend of well-intentioned American citizens trooping down to Nicaragua and all around the Nicaraguan countryside, I might add, at subsidized air fares and subsidized hotel rates paid for by the Sandinista government, and going around and viewing a dog and pony show. That is really how it could be described. They were getting information, as it was elaborated on by Sandinista representatives for their edification. They were being convinced that the United States is the wrong party in this conflict and that the Sandinistas are simply trying to provide peace and harmony for the future of Nicaraguan citizens.

Then we come back and we find that the so-called Brody report, which reaches similar conclusions, concocted by a 31-year-old lawyer, Reed Brody, was based on the same kind of a well-intentioned atmosphere and reached on the basis of a $320,000 grant paid by the Nicaraguan Government to the firm of Reichler & Applebaum right here in the District of Columbia.

□ 1240

Then we go on and we find other evidence that Mr. Brody, who was supposed to have concocted the Brody report which gives evidence for all these good intentioned people to come back with their conclusions that the United States was wrong, actually was a friend of the Sandinistas and was quoted by Bayardo de Jesus Payan Hidalgo, the head of the Human Rights Commission down in Nicaragua, who says:

I was struck by the kindness extended to them by (Sandinista) officials * * * they were provided with transportation, food, and lodging from the very beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman—

They were provided with transportation, food, and lodging from the very beginning. Mr. Brody was characterized by his fondness for the FSLN (the Sandinista government) for he made it known that he was a friend of Commander Daniel Ortega Saavedra, showing a picture of him hugging the Commander.

Now, this is the type of interrelationship of well-intentioned people who go down there and develop a friendship for Mr. Ortega or Mr. D'Escoto or other members of the junta and come back and presume to tell us the truth about what is happening in Nicaragua, totally overlooking the abuses of human rights, the imprisonment, the forced labor camps, the torture, the execution that is going on at the hands of the Sandinista government.

It concerns me greatly and I think that when we hear allegations such as have been brought out by the other side to the effect of how horrible the Contras are, we have to look to the source of their material.

I would hope everybody in this Chamber would question the source of the material that is being discussed today.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make another point here as some on the other side try to smear the entire leadership of the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua as though all so-called Contras were colonels in the Guardia Nationale and that all of them were part of that shameful segment of the Guardia that was guilty of human rights abuses.

Well, consider this fact. The very first Minister of Defense of the Sandinista government after July 1979 was a former full colonel in the Guardia Nationale named Bernardino Larios; when he saw the Government going Communist he resigned, but before he could leave the country he was arrested and thrown in jail for 4 years. He has just been released, and I suppose if we brought him up here and quested him in the Rayburn Room to talk to to some of the Members who attack the so-called Contras, our Members would say no." As one of the majority members said to me when I asked him to come off the floor to meet Enrique Bermudez, so that Senor Bermudez could testify to his face that he spent the 3 years of Somoza struggle here in Washington. "I won't dignify them with even talking to them."

That gentleman is on his feet right now at the leadership table on the Democratic side.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I think the fact remains that the military side of the operation clearly is still under the leadership of the National Guard and I think clearly you have got to understand that the fact still remains that the atrocities that we see committed in the field are being committed by the Contras.

We can argue the numbers of people who are in the positions of power back and forth, both on the political side and on the military side. The fact of the matter is that we see atrocities. These have not been, as the gentleman suggested, by patronizing American citizens who tried to go down and to develop the facts for themselves, but by independent organizations that have found atrocities on both sides; American Watch and other organizations.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. MILLER of California. When I am finished—that have clearly outlined that in fact the Contras are responsible for many atrocities. And those are not people who have gone down to swallow hook, line, and sinker, the Sandinista line. The fact of the matter remains that that is the case. There have been rapes, there have been kidnapings, there have been murders by Contras in the field.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I simply point out again that the two independent missionaries, Mormon missionaries, who have no allegiance to the Federal Government or the Sandinista government at all, who have experience as missionaries in the field, went down there for exactly that purpose, and point out very clearly in their report that they were unfunded by anybody. They went down at their own expense.

They found no evidence of Contras atrocities and abundant evidence of Sandinista atrocities, including forced labor camps, executions, religious persecution, indiscriminate shelling of villages, mistreatment of prisoners, forced voluntarism in the co-op system and repression of the opposition political parties, as well as forced recruitment.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, if I can reclaim my time, I think clearly this is the tragedy of the situation which has been created, and that is the overall violence in Nicaragua, which I must add was not there prior to the entrance of this policy.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, Joe Louis once said about one of his opponents, "He can run, but he can't hide."

My distinguished colleagues on the other side of the aisle have been dancing around and trying to hide from what really is the issue in this situation. The United States of America, through the Reagan administration, has waged war against a country with which we have full diplomatic relations and the people of the United States of America in every poll and survey that has been taken have said that they will not sit still for that and they oppose the President's policy. What the Congress of the United States and this House will be doing at the end of this debate is to transform into action, once again, the will of the people of the United States and keep Ronald Reagan from getting the United States directly militarily involved in Nicaragua.

I have been to Nicaragua twice now. I was there about a week and a half ago. I had occasion to speak, to witness, to listen to people at all levels, opposition as well as government people. I have also visited other Central American countries. I want to tell you something. If you are an average citizen in most of the Central American countries, if you are a citizen of El Salvador, if you are a citizen of Guatemala, you have nowhere near the capacity to openly criticize your government as you do if you are a citizen of Nicaragua, and there is no question about that.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. WEISS. No. When I finish, the gentleman will get time from his side of the aisle.

Let's talk about freedom of the press. Yes, the newspaper La Prensa, one of the largest newspapers in Nicaragua, is censored, and I oppose that; but if you are a press person in El Salvador and you owned an independent newspaper, nonsupportive of the military-government position, you no longer publish. You either had your plant bombed out from under you or you have been threatened with assassination or have been assassinated and you are no longer there.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] had occasion to mention before that the Sandinistas would not let him visit a military camp and that proved that they did not have an open government.

I want to tell my distinguished colleague from California——

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He used my name.

Mr. WEISS. No, I will not.

I want to tell my distinguished friend from California that on Friday a week ago, Congressman EDGAR of Pennsylvania and I were about to go to the country of Guatemala in order to observe a demonstration by the relatives of people who had disappeared or been killed in Guatemala and we could not go because word came through from the Government of Guatemala that death threats had been received against the life of myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR] if we were to go there.

It seems to me that we ought to be concerned about freedom and liberty everywhere, but we also ought to be concerned about how the United States of America supports freedom and liberty everywhere. One of our very fundamental constitutional principles is that the United States goes to war only upon a declaration of war by the Congress of the United States. It is a principle that we ought to abide by.

The President and the Secretary of State and just about every Government spokesman for this administration has twisted facts, has distorted facts, has lied about what in fact is going on in Nicaragua and who supports or who does not support their policy.

□ 1250

The President said baldfacedly that the Pope supports every aspect of his policy in Nicaragua, only to have the Vatican come forward to deny that representation.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. No. When the gentleman wants, he can get time from his side of the aisle.

From the various and wholesale disinformation provided by the Government of the United States of America, the people of this country have winnowed out the facts and said that they will not, we will not have our sons and our fathers and our brothers go to war in Central America.

Yes; we ought to be providing inducements and encouragements for a peaceful resolution. When we were in Nicaragua we met on the 11th of April with the President of Nicaragua who had just gotten a report back from the proceedings at the resumed Contadora hearings. The Contadora proposals presented that day for verification of all the various agreements as to the removal of advisers and the removal of military forces and the reductions of arms and so on in the conflicted areas of Central America had been drafted by the Contadora countries with the assistance and involvement of the Canadian Government. The Nicaraguan representative said—and this has been carried publicly in our newspapers—that his government would accept without any amendments whatsoever the recommendations of the Contadora countries and the Canadians.

We opposed it? Who is still quibbling about it and refusing to accept it? Honduras and El Salvador and Costa Rica; not because they do not like it, but because the Government of the United States, in spite of all of the protestations and representations about how we want a diplomatic settlement, in fact, have done everything within our powers to prevent a diplomatic settlement.

You do not have to love the Sandinistas, you do not have to support their reneging on commitments for a free press or for political pluralism and I do not, to know that the dirty war that the U.S. Government has been funding and directing and been engaging in without congressional or popular approval cannot be allowed to continue. It certainly ought not to be allowed to be continued by action of this House of Representatives. We have the right and the opportunity to set this country's policies back on the path of our Constitution. That is what we as a nation are about. That is what we ought to be doing.

In December 1981, CIA Director William Casey came before the House and Senate Intelligence Committees seeking $19 million he said, to interdict arms traffic from Nicaragua to the Salvadoran rebels. The beneficiaries were a 500-man paramilitary force. Most were former members of Somoza's national guard. The same national guard who maintained the Somoza dynasty's 40 years of iron-fisted terror. At the behest of our CIA, this paramilitary force was trained by the Argentine military. The same military responsible for disappearing 6,000 Argentines.

Four years later, Mr. Reagan is seeking another $14 million. Most will go to the FDN [Democratic Revolutionary Force], the son of that 500-man paramilitary force. Four years, and $80 million U.S. dollars later, the Argentine trainers have been replaced by the CIA. The same CIA whose only contribution to the Contras' democratic training has been providing them with a primer on assassination.

The FDN's military command are the same national guardsmen, who terrorized Nicaraguans for more than 40 years.

Enrique Bermudez, the Contra's self-proclaimed defense minister, served as Somoza's former military attaché in Washington. His second in command, Capt. Armando Lopez, was a guardista.

The heads of logistics, intelligence, operations, special warfare, and most key combat commanders are national guard alumni.

The Contras' former intelligence chief, Col. Ricardo Lau, who has been accused of directing the 1980 assassination of Salvadoran Archbishop Oscar Romero, was a guardista.

But don't just take my word for it. Let me quote from Arturo Cruz, former junta member, Nicaraguan Ambassador, and now a Contra supporter, who wrote in a 1983 Foreign Affairs article:

> The fact remains, however, that most of the persons in positions of military authority within the FDN are ex-members of the National Guard who unconditionally supported Somoza until the end, against the will of the Nicaraguan people.

This is the same national guard, who, according to Eden Pastora, "killed our people for 45 years. The guardsmen killed this guy's brother. They killed my father. Everybody in Nicaragua has a relative killed by the national guard."

These are the same guardsmen, who have pledged that—and I am quoting from one Contra officer—"Come the counterrevolution, there will be a massacre in Nicaragua. We have lots of scores to settle. There will be bodies from the border to Managua."

These are the same Contras whose killings and human rights abuses were so indiscriminate that the CIA had to prepare a manual to instruct them how to selectively assassinate.

These are the same guardsmen Mr. Reagan calls freedom fighters and compares to our Founding Fathers.

Neither the Congress, nor the American people, are immune from the lies and distortions this administration has used to promote its immoral war in Nicaragua.

Until last year, CIA Director Casey claimed we were supporting an interdiction operation. Four years of white papers, aerial photos, and secret documents have not provided hard evidence of arms shipments. A May 1983 House Intelligence Committee report stated "the program has not interdicted arms." According to former CIA analyst, David MacMichael, there has not been a verifiable interdiction of arms or anything else since 1981.

Then, the Contras were "bargaining chips" who would bring the Sandinistas to the negotiating table. In September of last year, the Nicaraguans not only came to the table, they signed a draft Contadora treaty. The proposal—drafted by the Contadora nations, not the Sandinistas—provided for free and fair elections, an end to the regional arms race, and the withdrawal of foreign military advisers. But just as soon as the Nicaraguans accepted the treaty, the United States, and its regional allies—after we coerced them—backed away. It should be apparent that until the Sandinistas are removed from Managua, Mr. Reagan will never see a Contadora treaty that he likes.

Now, Mr. Reagan, while still professing the fiction that he doesn't want the Sandinistas overthrown, claims he only wants them removed "in the sense of [their] present structure." The distinction between overthrowing someone and getting them to cry "uncle" is lost on Contra defense minister, Col. Enrique Bermudez, who has unequivocally stated: "We are Nicaraguans and our objective is to overthrow the Communists."

However sincere such recent Contra converts as Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo may be in their commitment to democracy, the fact is that the war is directed by former national guardsmen, who are terrorists, not democrats. They have promised to bring to Managua a reign of terror that will make the French Revolution look like a labor day picnic. Their methods are those of the Marquis de Sade, not the Marquis de Lafayette. And, according to Eden Pastora, "the Nicaraguan people will not support the National Guard."

For 4 years, Mr. Reagan has sacrificed our values, our respect for the law, our commitment to democratic institutions, and our international standing. It's our turn now, finally, to put a halt to his "dirty little war" against Nicaragua.

I thank the gentleman for yielding this time.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentleman very much for yielding me time.

I think at this point in the debate we should take a deep breath and ask ourselves what we are trying to achieve in Nicaragua.

Do we want to add to the suffering there? Do we want to add to the instability there? Do we want to strengthen the lack of freedom there?

If that is what we want to do in Nicaragua then we should vote for the package of military aid to the Contras that lies before us.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOXER. No; I am sorry. I have no time to yield to you.

But if we want to help the people of Nicaragua, if we want to bring stability, if we want to be in a position to strengthen democracy in Nicaragua, we should vote down the funds for the Contras. We should work for peace with the people of the region through the Contadora process.

We must learn from history. I say to my colleagues that in the 1950's the CIA backed a coup to overthrow the second democratically elected President in Guatemala because our country did not like his policy of land reform. We backed the rebels, and then when they were too inept to win that victory, the CIA people got involved in the combat and the military achieved its goal and the Government of Guatemala was overthrown.

I ask my colleagues: What has happened in Guatemala since that day in the 1950's dubbed as "Operation Success?"

Guatemala has yet to see a democratically elected government. There is suffering in Guatemala. There are problems in Guatemala.

We have to look for another way as we look at the situation in Nicaragua. So there must be something, something in between completely walking away, which I do not support, and using military means, which I do not support, to solve the problem in Nicaragua. That is something that we call the Contadora process. It is called diplomacy. It is called using America's strength to bring peace and democracy, not to prolong war, killing, and suffering.

Finally, I would say to my colleagues, I feel compelled to say that one of my colleagues from California, Mr. DORNAN, has several times in this debate referred to "little nuns" who have appeared in Members' offices to spread disinformation. I wonder if my colleague would describe Mother Theresa as a "little nun."?

I find it reprehensible, Mr. Chairman, that people with conviction, and concern, and love of God, and love of country, would be accused of spreading disinformation.

Those people have been in Nicaragua, they know the score and we know the score. Let us work for diplomacy and against giving aid to the Contras.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] to respond.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Of course, I assumed that the gentlewoman was speaking with a broad brush when she talked about people being reprehensible.

I have quite accurately, as a loyal and practicing Catholic, assessed that there are some nuns in Orange County of California and elsewhere who have made one of these revolutionary tourista trips down to Nicaragua and come back parroting the Leninist line of lies pumped out by the nine commandantes or the suspended former priest named Miguel d'Escoto who periodically plays the role of Foreign Minister. And I repeat what I said last week. d'Escoto is like the little man Tatoo on TV's Fantasy Island." He yells at this boss, Ortega, "Boss, De plane, de plane, de plane, here comes another bunch of naive fools," or what Lenin called useful idiots to be brainwashed with the Communist line.

Now, it is true that some of the nuns who have come back home have gotten themselves straightened out by talking to other nuns who have been persecuted down there in Managua. In other words they have recanted. I will send to the gentlewoman's office the recantations of the nuns who have become smarter than your average Congressman on Central America.

Mrs. BOXER. If the gentleman wants to call those nuns fools, that is his choice of words, not mine.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Useful idiots is what I also said. Useful to the Leninists who persecute their church, which is also my church which I love.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I would just make a couple of brief points.

While I was in Nicaragua at the same time as my colleague from New York [Mr. WEISS] we had occasion to have dinner with the Ambassador and a former labor minister who was the head of the liberal party down there. This gentleman, who affectionately touched the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], and said, "We as liberals share a great deal in common," said to Mr. WEISS that he would like for him to come down to Nicaragua for about 3 weeks to see what was really going on. He said, and I cannot quote him verbatim, but the gist of the conversation was that the present pressure and the censorship and the religious persecution had increased dramatically, and that if Mr. WEISS had an opportunity to see for himself really what was going on down there, Mr. WEISS would vote for aid to the Contras, because if aid for the Contras was not forthcoming the repression would increase, the Communists would solidify their positions, and the revolution would be extended throughout Central America.

Now this gentleman philosophically did not agree with me at all. He did with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], on most issues. But he told Mr. WEISS point blank that the aid to the Contras was absolutely essential if they were to have any chance at freedom in the future.

Mr. DEWINE. I thank my colleague for his statement.

If the American people had any idea, Mr. Chairman, of the intensity and the expertise of the Sandinista propaganda, I think they would be shocked.

There is an excellent article in the Wall Street Journal of April 23, and I invite all of my colleagues to read it. It is by Jim Denton and it details part of this propaganda.

I think all of us could have expected what we saw last weekend. The vote on the Contras was coming up. The Sandinistas' action was predictable. What did we think Daniel Ortega was going to do? He communicated a peace proposal, not to our Embassy or State Department, but rather to some Members of Congress.

□ 1300

What he did was to communicate to some Members of Congress a peace proposal, a bogus peace proposal, a last minute peace proposal. It was reported on NBC and ABC that same night in very, very serious tones that certainly this would make it more difficult for this House to support aid to the Contras. The networks were right. Daniel Ortega was right. He accomplished exactly what he intended to accomplish. The Sandinistas have constructed a huge propaganda machine. It was reported in this article that the Nicaraguans paid $320,000 per year to a Washington based law firm to lobby on their behalf. This $320,000, which I just cited, is only a drop in the bucket. As my colleague from California, Mr. DORNAN, has pointed out, this regime started in 1979 and in 1980 having people come down for trips. Everybody, everybody's congressional district has had people who have gone down there. Well-intentioned, goodhearted, sincere Americans. But what they have been shown has been an orchestrated campaign; what they have been shown is exactly what the Sandinistas want them to see. This article in the Wall Street Journal goes into two of the so-called objective reports that our colleagues on the other side of the aisle so frequently cite. The first one has been referred to. It was the Brody report, bought and paid for, and let us get the terms right, bought and paid for by the Communists in Nicaragua. Those are the facts, and nothing more needs to be said.

The Fox report was an attempt, an attempt as we heard in our committee last week, to make the first report valid. Even though it never came out in the report, never came out in any of the press releases, never came out in any of the press conferences, we found that Mr. Fox's wife's step-brother is a Sandinista, a high ranking Sandinista official. I do not question Mr. Fox's integrity, I will not do that at all. But isn't that a relevant fact? Isn't it important for this body to know that his brother-in-law is a Sandinista? We never would have known that except, quite frankly, for the investigation of Jim Denton.

So let us keep everything in perspective as we look at the propaganda campaign that is being waged right now in Members' offices.

Congressman LAGOMARSINO and I several months ago had the opportunity to travel to Nicaragua. I am not an expert, only being down there for a few days. I am not claiming to be an expert. But what has been described by some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle is not the Nicaragua I saw. The Catholic priest whom we talked to who told us that in the Catholic schools they have to teach Marxism. We asked, well, what happens if you don't teach Marxism? The answer was: "The schools don't run." Marxism in the Catholic schools, it just sickens me.

Now, the situation with La Prensa has been made light of La Prensa, to my knowledge, is the only independent paper left in that country. It has been made light of, the fact that 40 percent of that paper every single day is censored; 40 percent. Some days they do not even publish.

Private enterprise? There has been reference made to private enterprise. Let me tell you what we found out about private enterprise.

I asked one of the small businessmen who remains in the country about what percentage of the economy was private. He laughed at me. "Another dumb American question." He said "when the state buys everything and sells everything and controls everything and tells you what to do and when to do it, how much enterprise, private enterprise is left?" Congressman LAGOMARSINO and I talked to a little vendor, literally a little vendor, who had been selling produce on the street for a number of years. That very day the Communists, the Sandinistas told this vendor, "You can't sell anymore. No, you can't. You're out of business. The reason you're out of business is because it is all going to be sold through a state-run store."

We talked to labor leaders, we talked to political opposition, or what is left of it. We talked to people throughout the country who would turn on their radios because they knew for a fact, at least they told us, that they were being bugged.

Now that is the Nicaragua we have.

What conclusions do we bring back to this body that will help us make a decision? What did we learn? Several things.

Congressman LAGOMARSINO referred to this, let me refer to it again: This is a direct quote from my notes which I looked at today. "Things will be bad for us if the Contras go away." Nobody wanted to tell us or everyone was afraid to tell us, "Give aid to the Contras." They knew better than that. If your office is being bugged you do not want to say that.

But what they would say in a roundabout way, every single one of them, "Things will be bad for us if the Contras go away."

Now, another quote, "We used to be public enemy No. 1, now we're No. 2. If the pressure that the Contras are putting on the Sandinistas ever goes away they will turn on us in a moment, they will be back at our throats, they will eliminate us." What little bit of opposition, whether political or business, whether it is in the press or whether it is the church, will be gone.

My friends, it is clear what they will do. There are three things going to happen when we completely dry up the aid from the Contras, which it clearly looks like we are going to do today and tomorrow; three things are eventually going to happen. No. 1, they are going to consolidate their revolution. No. 2, they are going to move against and strike out all opposition.

And, No. 3, if that does not wake you up, maybe the third should, after consolidating the revolution they are going to go right back to what they have been doing, only they are going to do a better job of it, they are going to export the revolution. The ammunition, the arms going into El Salvador, which we found in El Salvador, and which we traced back to the Soviet bloc, is going to continue. We are going to have in Central America another Cuba, only this one is going to have two ports, one on the Pacific and in the Atlantic. They are going to be on land instead of surrounded only by oceans. That is a natural consequence of what we are doing. We have got to keep the pressure on them.

We are not faced in this body with easy choices, we never are. But I think today is probably the toughest but most important day for Congress since I entered Congress a little over 2 years ago. The choice is not easy. The easiest thing for me politically and probably for everybody else in this Chamber to do would be to say, wash our hands of it, stick our heads in the sand and say, "No, we don't want to give aid to the Contras. We don't want to have any part of what is going on in Central America. Let's walk away from it and use the excuse that we are avoiding another Vietnam."

Vietnam hangs heavy over this Chamber as it should.

It was a tragedy.

But I would submit to you today that what you are about to do today is going to result in one of two things. No. 1, you are going to consign that region of the world to communism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DEWINE. That is the first thing that is going to be done. The second potential is that you are risking, and I choose my words very carefully, by this action you are risking American lives. If there is one thing that I would hope everybody in this room could agree on it is that we want no more Vietnams and we want no more Cubas.

What in the world—and I have been listening for 3 hours, I guess, and have not heard anybody stand up at this mike from your side of the aisle and tell me how your plan—you have trashed the President's plan, you have trashed BOB MICHEL's plan—yet no one has told me how your plan is going to achieve peace.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. Let us finish, let me finish. I have the time. As you told Mr. LIVINGSTON, you will have ample time to answer.

Mr. WEISS. Well, the gentleman asked.

Mr. DEWINE. No; just as you did for Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is fair for one side is fair for the other.

Now, what is the proposal? What have we heard from your side of the aisle? We are going to have more negotiations? Well, we want negotiations. We want peace proposals, but what did the Sandinistas do when a very significant proposal came forth from the opposition parties, what is left of them, and the Contras?

□ 1310

An offer was made to have the Catholic bishops in Nicaragua mediate, and it was not an unreasonable proposal. The proposal was they would have a cease fire, Daniel Ortega would stay as President, there would be free elections, and there would be allowed freedom of the press and the basic things that are necessary to have a free election. Several weeks elapsed, as I recall. Because when BOB and I were down there, no response had been made from the bishops. The bishops then came back and said, "Yes, we will offer to mediate that." And what did the Sandinistas do? No, they would not do it. They rejected the offer. The peace proposals have been made. The Contadora process is ongoing. They all should continue. But the basic facts of life are that if you really want peace down there, you have got to have a little stick or maybe, as Theodore Roosevelt said, a big stick. You have got to have something to prod them to do that. Your proposal has no prod. There is nothing contained in there that has not already been on the table. Absolutely nothing. What we are saying is, give some aid to the Contras, keep the pressures on, listen to the people who talked to Congressman LAGOMARSINO and me when we were down there, listen to what they said. The only way you are going to keep pressure on these Marxist-Leninists—and that is what they are, there is no doubt about it—the only way you are going to keep pressure on them is by the Contras.

Now, before I yield to my colleague, let me say one other thing: The natural consequences of your action is, I think, that some day—I hope to God I am wrong—Americans are going to die because of your action or rather your inaction.

Let me take you through some testimony that we had in our committee last week. I am just going to cite one. There are several, but I am just going to cite one. McGeorge Bundy testified, a Kennedy-Johnson administration adviser, actively involved as an adviser during the Vietnam war. He testified and said aid to the Contras is no good, the CIA cannot accomplish anything, it will not work and, besides, you always have American naval power to fall back on. My God, I heard that, and I read it before he said it, and then he said it, and I could not believe it. I said, "What in the world are you talking about?" I said, "Are you really saying that if this doesn't work, if we don't give aid to the Contras and if the Nicaraguans don't become peace activists, don't become democrats overnight, that the only result, the only natural result is a naval blockade?" He said, "No, Congressman, you have it wrong." He said, "In the Kennedy days we called it a naval quarantine."

That is the natural consequences of what I am afraid we are about. That puts us to a brink of war. It is 20 years later. What President Kennedy did was right. I supported him. But that is going to take us to the brink of war. It is 20 years later. There is a different navy that the Soviets have, we are not talking about an isolated island, we are talking now about an entirely different situation.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the gentleman on his tremendous statements. He laid it all out, gave the options the way they really are, not the way some people would like them to be.

An interesting thing occurred to me, and I have discussed this with the gentleman several times. He and I and other members of our subcommittee on the Republican side of the aisle sat there through the five hearings last week that were held on this subject——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Most of the time there were only one or two or, at one point, three on the other side of the aisle, even though they had called the hearings and had called the majority of the witnesses. The thing that really impressed me about those hearings, perhaps more than anything else, was that even the opposition witnesses, opposition to the President's proposal, said, most of them in so many words, that the Sandinistas were Communists, that they were repressing their people, that they had been exporting revolution. Some of them did not like to make those statements. Adm. Stansfield Turner, who was the head of the CIA during the Carter years, took a long time to admit what he finally did admit, that indeed the Sandinistas had violated U.S. law by exporting revolution and, therefore, the Carter administration had cut them off.

They all agreed, I think almost without exception, that the Sandinistas were repressive, were exporting revolution, as I said, and, further, that something had to be done about it. They all said there should be some pressure, but very few of them had any good ideas at all. It was interesting—I mentioned Turner—that Turner opposed the proposal not even having read it, apparently, because he did not know that the President's proposal called for a truce, and that was some of the type of opposition. But none of the people who had been to Nicaragua came back praising its glories.

Mr. DEWINE. It was certainly unanimous.

I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to commend him for his outstanding statement on this subject. I might point out, with respect to his comments about the disinformation that is going on that seems to be leading to some of the arguments on the other side, Clare George, Deputy Director of the CIA, testified with an Assistant Secretary of State, before an unclassified meeting of the Intelligence Committee the other day, and I would like to quote him, quickly:

> A worldwide propaganda campaign has been mounted and carried out in behalf of the Sandinista regime and Salvadoran guerrillas which would not have been possible without the capabilities, the contacts and the communication channels provided by the Soviet bloc and Cuba. The Sandinistas themselves have shown remarkable ingenuity and skill * * *.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE] has again expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman—

> The Sandinistas themselves have shown remarkable ingenuity and skill in projecting disinformation into the United States itself. Perhaps the best example of this is the systematic campaign to deceive well-intentioned members of the Western media and of Western religious institutions.

Now, that point being made, I would like to also point out to the gentleman, and he seems to have followed up on the comments by the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], with respect to what we really want, and the gentleman has eloquently pointed out what we want is peace and, preferably, democracy in Central America.

Now, I think it is significant that the gentlewoman refers to the 1950's and what happened in Guatemala way back then. She somehow forgets what happened in the last 6 years when in El Salvador, against the protestations of the other side time and time again, against the attempts of the other side to keep us from funding the Salvadoran Government against the Marxist guerrillas, despite the fact that the other side had constantly tried to keep that money from helping the democracy in El Salvador, what happened was, because we stayed in there, because the Reagan administration and the Carter administration decided that it was important to protect democracy in El Salvador, we now have had four free, open, fair elections. We have had a constituent assembly, we have had a President popularly elected, and Jose Napoleon Duarte is now that popular President of El Salvador. Democracy exists in El Salvador. And if we follow through with that same policy, democracy will exist in Nicaragua some day when the Sandinista regime yields its power.

Mr. DEWINE. I thank the gentleman very much for his statement.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we want no more Vietnams, we want no more Cubas. We want peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE] has again expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DEWINE. We want peace in the region. Give us some way of doing it. Give us some stick. Give us some way to prod these Communists into doing what everyone in this Chamber wants, and that is engaging in meaningful peace negotiations.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds. I would tell the gentleman he has made an outstanding statement, but if he has heard nothing from this side, one thing we have stated is that we are not for providing military aid, and that is the question before the Congress at the present time. House Joint Resolution 239 deals only with military assistance and has nothing to do with humanitarian assistance. I would suggest the gentleman read the classified report that was transmitted to the Congress in support of this release of the $14 million for military aid.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS].

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to listen with diligence and with rapt attention and with respect to the debate that has gone forward and as a result I would like to make a few comments.

Several speakers have spoken powerfully and dramatically to a group of people that have been referred to on the floor as the "Marxists and the Leninists and the Communists," this great threat and this great conspiracy Someone ought to try to address that. I would like to do it, try to put this debate in some perspective.

It would seem to me that if you listened to the structure of the debate, the largest single group of Marxists, Leninists, Communists are in the Soviet Union. But nobody here, I would like to hope, in their rational personna, is suggesting that we go to war with the Soviet Union.

The second largest group of Marxists, Leninists, Communists are in the Eastern bloc in Europe, but no one is proposing that we go to war with Czechoslovakia, Poland, East Germany. In their rational minds, they would not do it. So where do we end up fighting these proxy wars against these great menaces?

□ 1320

In Third World countries; in the Vietnams, the Laos', the Cambodias, the Central Americas of the world where people of color, dying of poverty and hunger and disease and malnutrition, starvation, human rights violations, torture, killing, and maiming and imprisonment, we suddently find these are the places that must access to great and powerful battlefields upon which we fight the great Communist menace; upon which we battle the Marxists and the Leninists.

We are not throwing nukes at the Soviet Union, thank goodness. That would destroy the planet. We are not talking about going to war with the Eastern Europeans; thank God; that would probably again destroy the planet. So we fight it out in impoverished countries where we engage in this East-West struggle to the total exclusion of the North-South dimension of the poverty and the hunger and the disease and all the other crippling problems that plague and confront human beings.

So I have come to the conclusion that maybe the statement "a rose is a rose is a rose", and that "a Communist is a Communist is a Communist," is not really true. Maybe there are good Communists, and maybe there are bad Communists. It may be that good Communists are the ones that have big bombs that can bomb us back. Maybe the only bad Communists are those people struggling in the developing countries of this world where we ought to be addressing their human misery, we choose to engage in the madness of war.

I would suggest to my colleagues that peace would not come through the barrel of a gun; that peace will come when we address the problems that give rise to war, death, and destruction. It is the human misery that human beings field; it is the destruction of the human spirit that creates war. What are we doing in this situation? I would stipulate this list. One of the most absurd points in this debate is to debate whose names are more accurate on the list of 56. Who cares? That is not the issue here. You are putting a smiling face on death and destruction, because if you take war to its bottom line, it is killing and dying and death. It is funky stench is what it is all about. There is nothing glamourous about it.

People are dying in Central America, and I do not care how glorious a speech on this floor, we cannot deny that American peoples' money is being used to perpetuate death and destruction. We are a mighty superpower; we ought to have the capacity to say to the world we can show how to solve human problems short of the absurdity and the cruelty. We should have the capacity and the boldness and the courage to think beyond war.

How can we say to the people in the Middle East: "Sit down around the table and negotiate Israel, Arabs, and other people." How can we say to Iran and Iraq: "Sit down around the table and negotiate," when, in this hemisphere, where we live and where we reside, we lack the capacity to say, "Sit down and let us talk about the power of the spoken word; let us demonstrate our capacity to address our problems through political solution."

Why are we financing death and destruction? Are we not as a mighty nation capable of structuring an environment within which we can begin to talk out these problems. I ask this rhetorical question. Even if you disagree, my friends, with the idea, how do you fight an idea? I would suggest you challenge an idea with a better idea; not with a bigger bomb; not with a bigger budget to finance Contras. But you come with a better idea.

If the United States and the Soviet Union want to compete, then let us compete not over who can destroy human life in the Third World, but who can best address the misery of the Third World. You do not do that by spending $14 million more to engage in war and destruction. Let us solve the problems of hunger and poverty and disease and human rights violations. Then you will see a great groundswell of people moving toward us. The most powerful thing we as Americans have is not our ability to export $14 million but to export a fantastic idea, the idea of democracy; the idea of people's involvement.

So why, if we are so democratic, are we not prepared to embrace a process that allows democratic discussion back and forth across the table as we build a consensus that ultimately leads to a nonviolent political solution to how we solve our problems.

I do not want to debate over whether the form of government is a good form of government or not. Let us stipulate your analysis. My question here is how do we solve the problem? I am saying that war in a nuclear age is not an acceptable option. And so to fight it out in proxy countries is both racist and repressive and insensitive and arrogant and unnecessary.

We as a powerful nation of democratic people ought to be willing to say let us sit down and negotiate the nature of our differences. So let us stop debating over who has the good list of names and who has the bad list of names. People killing are people killing. People dying are people dying, and we have a responsibility here not to impress ourselves with who can pronounce the names the best or who has the best list of names. We are here to debate policy. I say unequivocally that moving down this road toward greater violence and greater misery and greater participation in the process of death and destruction and war is not the answer to the problem. Let us show the world the magnificence of the ability to sit down around the table and negotiate. Ultimately, my friends, we are running out of places to fight wars, and if we can ever get it through our heads that peace is an imperative in the nuclear age, that we will begin not to play games in the Third World, but to embrace the process that brings us to freedom.

My final point: I urge all of my colleagues to vote against this resolution. I would have liked very much to not even see my Democratic colleagues come with a compromise. I believe American people did learn something from Vietnam. They do not want us fighting in Central America. I think that if we stripped away all the compromises, the majority of my colleagues, in a rational and sane moment would sit down and come to the realization that pursuing war is not the answer. That they should vote to strike down this resolution.

I hope that the Members vote to strike down this resolution, because that is the hope for human life on this planet.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman has made an eloquent plea for peace as is usual.

Mr. DELLUMS. That is why I came to Congress.

Mr. DORNAN of California. As is usual, his case. So did most of us, I believe. There are young men who do not want to be impressed, dragooned, shanghaied into military service under a Sandinista government that has betrayed the principles and goals of a noble revolution.

These young men are fleeing, most of them south to Costa Rica where they arrive in such emaciated condition they must be fed intravenously. Am I not correct that both you and I voted against the draft in prior Congresses?

Mr. DELLUMS. That is correct.

Mr. DORNAN of California. What would you tell these young men, citizens of Nicaragua, who do not want to serve in the military forces of Sandinista, once they have reached Costa Rica, to stay refugees for the rest of their life? Do you advise them not to take up the fighting option; to come back into their country and join the resistance forces to fight against the government they find oppressive. What would you advise them to do?

Mr. DELLUMS. I would say first of all, if you disagree with the politics of your country and the policies that are prevailing policies, do what I am doing: Stand up and oppose it and be willing to suffer whatever the risks necessary to stand up and do that.

Second, I would say to them that at some point, we have to stop the killing and the dying. This particular gentleman is getting tired of turning on the 6 and 7 o'clock news and seeing people in Third World countries face down, and it is not a movie, because no one can say at the end "cut," and they get up.

Mr. DORNAN of California. True.

Mr. DELLUMS. These are dead human beings and I am tired of that misery. We as human beings on this planet ought to have gained the sophistication to take us beyond the barbaric act of killing each other in the name of political differences.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, that was a brilliant speech, the sort of speech we are accustomed to hearing from the gentleman from California. I wish he could have made it in Pnom Penh where some Cambodian prisoners could have heard him. I wish he could make it in the Parliament in Warsaw. Perhaps some Solidarity undercover members could hear it through the window. I wish he could have made it in Kabul, where carpet bombing is going on and 100,000 Soviet Troops are pulverizing the patriotic, indigenous Mujahadeen.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. Yes, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I will not take much of the gentleman's time, but I would say this: I would be willing to make the speech to defend human life on this planet and in the name of peace anywhere. You set up the speech. I will be there to make it.

Mr. HYDE. I am sure you will, and I hope you will include Communist oppression and Communist killing in your speech, because you always seem to say we have to stop the killing. Let them stop the killing. Let them stop the tyranny. Let them stop the oppression.

Mr. DELLUMS. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. HYDE. Of course, I will yield to my friend.

Mr. DELLUMS. The gentleman knows very well how I feel about killing and dying on either side. When I speak about "us," I speak about us only when I take the well as an American citizen, an integral part of the body politic charged with the responsibility of making decisions on policy that we advocate. I am not a member of the Supreme Soviet. I am a Member of the U.S. Congress and I function in that context.

Mr. HYDE. I think the gentleman has made his point, and I recapture my time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think anybody in their right mind today who is moderately informed doubts that Nicaragua is deeply involved in exporting subversion to its neighbors, particularly El Salvador. The bipartisan Kissinger commission found this to be true, and the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, on which I serve, has found this to be true, and I refer you to section 109 of the Intelligence Authorization Act of 1984, which has a finding as follows:

> By providing military support, including arms, training, logistical command and control, and communications facilities to groups seeking to overthrow the government of El Salvador and other Central American governments, the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua has violated Article XVIII of the Organization of American States, which declares that no state has the right to intervene directly or indirectly for any reason whatsoever in the internal or external affairs of any other state.

Now, this fact is important in rejecting the claim that aiding the democratic resistance in Nicaragua is somehow illegal. When this argument of illegality is made, you only hear half the law, and then you hear it applied to the wrong forces. If you will see yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page E1630, you will find a brief on the law prepared by John Norton Moore, a professor of law at the University of Virginia, and a constitutional scholar.

But just briefly let me say there are 3 treaties involved, the United Nations Charter, the OAS Charter, the Organization of American States, and the Rio Treaty, and all of them assert the inherent right of individual and collective self-defense.

Moreover, article III of the Rio Treaty goes even farther and it says an attack on one signatory is an attack on all. And, lest we get lost in fine legal distinctions, legal scholars have held that an armed attack need not be armies on the march but can take place by organization, instigation, and support of a sustained insurgency.

So while the law forbids one nation intervening in the internal affairs of another nation, it is Nicaragua and Cuba that violate this provision, and by responding to this breach through collective self-defense we are within the law and the only violators are Nicaragua and Cuba. Not only is this law; it is common sense. To claim that the law protects Communist subversion from any effective defense is just patent nonsense. In World War II, support for the resistance in France and the underground in Germany was not illegal, and defending yourself is never state terrorism. To even make the charge is to undermine the most important distinction in the United Nations and the OAS charters, that between aggression and defense.

Democrats do not like Republicans quoting from Democratic Presidents, and I do not particularly like to do it either, but it is so appropriate that I must share with you a speech made by John F. Kennedy on April 20, 1961, before the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Listen to what President Kennedy said, and ask yourself if he could get elected anything in the Democratic Party today:

> No greater task faces this country or this administration. No other challenge is more deserving of our every effort and energy. Too long we have fixed our eyes on traditional military needs, on armies prepared to cross borders, on missiles poised for flight. Now it should be clear that this is no longer enough—that our security may be lost piece by piece, country by country, without the firing of a single missile or the crossing of a single border.
> It is clear that this Nation, in concert with all the free nations of this hemisphere, must take an ever closer and more realistic look at the menace of external Communist intervention and domination in Cuba. The American people are not complacent about Iron Curtain tanks and planes less than 90 miles from their shore. But a nation of Cuba's size is less a threat to our survival than it is a base for subverting the survival of other free nations throughout the hemisphere. It is not primarily our interest or our security but theirs which is now, today, in the greater peril. It is for their sake as well as our own that we must show our will.
> The evidence is clear—and the hour is late. We and our Latin friends will have to face the fact that we cannot postpone any longer the real issue of survival of freedom in this hemisphere itself. On that issue, unlike perhaps some others, there can be no middle ground. Together we must build a hemishpere where freedom can flourish; and where any free nation under outside attack of any kind can be assured that all our resources stand ready to respond to any request for assistance.

Fraud in the inducement is a well known legal concept and I suggest to you that the Sandinista government has no legitimacy. They made promises to the Organization of American States in 1979 and in exchange for which they got the support of the OAS and the support of the United States. They promised that they would have a pluralistic political society, that they would have a mixed economy, that they would have a free press and freedom of religion, and they have broken every one of those promises.

Therefore, they ought to be delegitimated. Archbishop McGrath of Panama has said, and I quote:

> Today's Sandinista government has usurped power from the broad-based coalition that overthrew Somoza in 1979.

So it is clear that usurpers are violating the law and in coming to the collective self-defense of our allies and friends, El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica, we are in keeping with the law.

So do not be misled. When I was in law school, one of my professors said the first thing a lawyer must learn to do is to be plausible in support of groundless motions. Well, I suggest you will hear some plausible arguments that we are the lawbreakers, but do not be misled and check yesterday's RECORD for the brief.

Why give military aid to the democratic resistance? Very simple. To keep the pressure on. To force a return to the promises of 1979 by the Sandinistas.

Notice how the argument has shifted. It used to be that the Contras, the democratic resistance, were ineffective. Let us not support them, they are ineffective. They are not doing the job. Now that they have become effective, now that their ranks are swelling every day and every month, the argument shifts now. Somehow it is illegal and we ought not to interfere in the internal affairs of another country.

I suggest to you that Somoza was not overthrown by military force. He was not overthrown by political force or by economic force, but by a combination of all three. The synergistic effect of all three together is much greater than the sum of the parts, and I suggest to you that a continuation of the military pressure through the Contras, a tightening of economic pressure and political pressure will bring them to their senses.

The Contras keep the Communist revolution in Nicaragua internalized. They keep the Nicaraguan Marxists-Leninists introverted. Once we pull the rug on the Contras, once they become refugees instead of freedom fighters, then the revolution gets externalized. They become extroverted, and God help the countries that surround this revolutionary Marxist-Leninist surrogate of Cuba/the Soviet Union.

May I say there is a touch, it seems to me, of moral exhibitionism in those churchmen and others who tell us that aiding the democratic resistance is immoral. Is it immoral in Cambodia? Is it immoral in Afghanistan? I was raised in the same church as some of them were and I will tell you that I do not know what is moral about helping Communists consolidate their grip on people, whether it is Solidarity people or it is campesinos. What in the name of the Lord is immoral about resisting communism, the greatest assault on the spirit of man since recorded history?

Whatever became of Thomas Jefferson's motto: Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God. Lenin had a term, it is "useful idiots." I would not call these people useful idiots. That is too harsh a term. I prefer the term, "There is none so blind who will not see."

President Reagan wants war, we are told. I would not question anybody's motivations for making that statement, but I do question their understanding of history and judgment. The road to peace does not go through Munich. That ought to be very simple if you will just read a history book.

The foreign policy of the gentlemen and gentlewomen on the left is "talking and trusting." This has been tried in Angola, it has been tried in Iran, where we traded in the Shah and got the Ayatollah, they have been tried in Southeast Asia where we no longer hear the cries of the boat people and the people in the refugee camps in Thailand, and now they want to try another laboratory experiment with the same McGovernite policy in Central America.

If you retreat from San Salvador, where do you make your stand? San Antonio?

Those who oppose aid to the democratic resistance, it seems to me, and with due respect, are guilty of political incoherence. They recognize the Communist-supported guerrillas in El Salvador as significant and legitimate, and they mandate an internal dialog on President Duarte, but the Salvadoran insurgency has less vitality and less support than the Contras in Nicaragua.

Why are you not as consistent with the Sandinistas, President Ortega, and Father D'Escoto, the Maryknoll priest, as you are with President Duarte?

Today's Washington Post editorial is one of the most interesting I have ever read. There is one sentence in there that I do not think I will ever forget. It says, "Congress should at least express a decent concern for people who took the chance of relying on American constancy."

What twinge of conscience produced that sentence? What pangs of guilt, I wonder? All right. All right, editorial writer, we are "decently concerned." Does that assuage our responsibility as leaders of the free world?

It is axiomatic that poverty and hunger are major factors in Central America, but they are not the only factors. Now, Costa Rica, Honduras, and El Salvador are beginning to improve their economies, and now that their gross national products are being pushed upward, how hospitable will a Communist Central America be for investment? You will undo all the progress we have made, we will turn Central America into a basket case if we pull the plug on the Contras and let the revolution in Nicaragua consolidate itself and spread. What contribution to solving the problems of poverty and hunger will turning Central America into a giant refugee camp make?

There are two bottom lines that I draw from the lessons of Vietnam, lessons we have been inundated with this month. The first is that isolationism dominates the Democratic Party's foreign policy. George McGovern's cry was "Come home, America." That is what you would have us do, come home from our responsibilities as leaders of the free world.

We have now reached the point where I think even you must concede that the Sandinistas are revolutionary Communists. If you do not think so, what are the Bulgarians doing there, the North Koreans, the East Germans, the PLO, and 9,000 Cubans? By any fair estimate, by any objective appraisal, the Sandinistas are bad guys.

Now, you have to concede that the democratic resistance is led by serious Democrats, Arturo Cruz, Alfonso Robelo, and Adolfo Calero, and others. So faced with good guys and bad guys in Nicaragua, you are forced to excuse your neoisolationism by taking what you choose to call the moral high ground of noninterference in the internal affairs of another country. In other words, let us drop the pretense that we are leaders of the free world anymore. We are like neighbors seeing a crime on the street and pulling the shade; we do not want to get involved.

So lesson No. 1: America is incapable of acting for good ends in the world. We no longer understand the relationship between force and diplomacy. You say you want negotiation? But you need an instrument of negotiation. With whom will the Sandinistas negotiate if we turn the democratic resistance into refugees?

Lesson No. 2: So consumed by partisan politics are we that a fixed determination has been reached that Ronald Reagan shall not have a significant victory in the case of Nicaragua. Never mind that democracy and security for the whole area are at risk, Reagan must be defeated. The partisan and destructive edge to this debate is there for fair-minded people to read.

There are two sides down in Nicaragua. One is supported by the Soviets, and one is supported by our Government. Too many have ideological filters which color and distort what they see in Nicaragua. But who is really for peace? Do we want a negotiated settlement? You cannot support peace and the Sandinistas. The people who are for a negotiated settlement and peace are the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. Those are the folks you want to turn into refugees and drive them out of their country or make them disarm and surrender. Do you think disarming the resistance is going to advance anybody's cause except Cuba's? The Soviet Union's?

And what are you doing to democracy? In Brazil the President just died. The outpouring of anguish over that sad event is very significant. In Argentina the democratically elected Government is wrestling with the problem of the generals. Peru just had an election. El Salvador has had three in the last 2 years. The forces of democracy are resurgent in Latin America.

Why in the midst of this remarkable and blessed turn of events do we facilitate the Communist cancer in Nicaragua and help it to metastasize up and down the Isthmus? For us to turn our backs on the democratic opposition in Nicaragua is no less than tragic, and make no mistake, this is not a localized issue; it has worldwide implications. Our signals here are false, confused, and spread despair. We tell the world, do we not, that when the real crunch comes, "Don't look to the United States"?

We have very little margin for error. All right, gentlemen, you are going to win this, and go ahead and write your "Dear Commandante" letters. Write a dozen of them and see what happens. And draft your toothless resolutions and wallow in your impotence. But someday our children are going to ask, "Why did you let it happen?"

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Lousiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman quoted Lenin a little while ago, and I thought he would be interested in this quote. This is from Lenin, and perhaps it has some relevance today.

Lenin said: "We must be ready to employ trickery, deceit, lawbreaking, withholding and concealing of the truth. We can and must write in language which sows among the masses hate, revulsion, scorn, and the like toward those who disagree with us."

Now, is the Sandinista government not doing that very effectively today?

Mr. HYDE. Yes. Prince Otto von Bismarck said of his enemies. "Leave them only their eyes to weep with."

That is what we are going to leave the people of Nicaragua after we pull out and absorb ourselves in whatever else interests us that is more important than democracy and freedom in Central America.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. Of course, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I have a simple, direct question. Is your church and faith that you love, the Catholic Church, being persecuted, in your estimation, in the nation of Nicaragua?

Mr. HYDE. Well, I attended the People's Church down there, Father Malina's church, and I saw Christ portrayed as a guerrilla fighter behind the altar. That is an obscenity as far as I am concerned.

Yes, I think the church, in America which once was the bulwark against communism, has unfortunately in too many ways been much too tolerant of those whose hostility to organized religion is historic and unchanging.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has a fine reputation for doing deep research and applying himself to his work when he approaches a problem.

Why does the gentleman think over a 4-year period there has been a persecution of the Catholic Church, with the expulsion of nine good foreign priests? One of them has come up here to Washington and could not get interviews with some gentleman of a different opinion than ours.

And why do you feel this message of religious persecution of fundamental Protestant churches, particularly among the natives along the eastern seaboard on the Caribbean Atlantic side, has taken place, and why has that persecution message not swept across this country?

Mr. HYDE. I think that too many churchmen feel guilty about the former identification of the church with the rich and the oppressive people in Central America, and they are trying to make up for it by bending over backward and now identifying with the liberation theologians who combine the form of the church and the substance of Marxist analysis, and they cannot blame the people, they blame the system and alleged exploitation by the United States and the multinational corporations. And I think it is clear that the hierarchy has moved far to the left. Obviously the first draft of the bishop's pastoral letter on the economy showed that. The pastoral letter on the nuclear bomb showed a sympathy for appeasement and pacifism that is disturbing. And I think their failure to understand that there are two irreconcilable faiths, freedom and communism; and that communism is organized and aggressive some 900 miles from our border, is tragic, tragic, tragic.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman believe that Archbishop O'Connor was trying to tell us something in this Congress when he said, "The so-called Contras are impeding"—that is the action verb in this sentence, "impeding"—"the solidifying of communism in Managua"? Is that not a strong statement?

Mr. HYDE. Well, I have no comment at all on that because I read Archbishop O'Connor's statement to our subcommittee, and I am bewildered, frankly. He said military aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua is both illegal and immoral. I find myself in sad and comprehensive disagreement with him and the many other bishops who share his view.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. Yes, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I certainly appreciate what the gentleman in the well said, and I think he has just been right on target on Central and South America. We have just gotten back from a trip where several Members of Congress went to five countries in Central America and two countries in South America.

□ 1350

I had been in Central America 12 months before. It seems that things are settling down now in Central America and it seems to me that democracy is going to work if we continue to support those persons who are seeking democracy.

We met with President Duarte. I think you can get a lesson from him as to what democracy really means and generally he supports what we are about to vote on today.

I want to commend the gentleman. He certainly has been helpful and he has been down there, like most Members of the House of Representatives have.

Mr. HYDE. The gentleman knows that all the leaders in that area support what we are doing privately. Not all of them will tell you that publicly, but anyone who has been down there and has not been escorted around by Sandinista soldiers gets the straight story.

I was amused by a story in the Post today where they asked the former Minister of Labor whether we should aid the Contras. He smiled and said, "That is up to you."

Do you think that gentleman could say, "Yes, give money, military aid to the Contras" and stay free down there for very long?

They also refer to the Archbishop as a pro-Contra archbishop. That is the sort of thing we would not talk about up here because we do not want those people thrown in jail, but the Post reporter did not seem to mind.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It seems also that if we vote down this resolution, and it has been said here before that in effect that pulls the rug out from what we have been trying to do down there for a number of months, and as I said earlier, our Latin American program is working.

Mr. HYDE. The Soviet long-range strategic plan is to get us out of Europe. What better way than to cause us so much trouble in Central America that we will have to pull back from NATO and focus our attention below the Rio Grande. That is precisely what they want, and you people who are so dedicated to our commitment in the Middle East better look around the corner and see what happens when Central America goes and we retrench from our commitments in the Middle East and in Europe, because that is the Soviet long-range strategy. We do not have any. We react from Congress to Congress and have to micro-manage foreign policy with transient Congressmen.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. The speaker before, the gentleman from California, had said that the answer to this was that we should try to help alleviate poverty, that that was the way to bring peace. I would be interested in hearing the response of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois in the context of this Nicaragua situation.

Mr. HYDE. The Kissinger Commission, a bipartisan Commission with some very prestigious Democrats on it, decided that they need about $8 billion in Central America over 5 years, three-quarters of it in economic aid and one-quarter in military aid, because you cannot build up the infrastructure and the economy of a government if they are busy fighting a civil war; so first, you must settle the guerrilla insurgency in El Salvador and then you can look to reconstruction and building up the economy. That is the way to raise the standard of living down there to foster democracy and to bring freedom to that area.

But instead we are tolerating and by this vote encouraging the maintenance, the continuation of a fraudulent revolutionary government, the Sandinistas.

I stood where the gentleman stood in 1979 and voted for millions of dollars for the Sandinista government in the hope and in the expectation that they would be democratic. I relied on the expressed hopes of the majority leader, "Give us these tools," he said, "to make democracy work."

I was willing to do it, but we were lied to by the Sandinistas and I have seen these promises broken and rebroken. They are a Communist revolutionary government. They have got over 3,000 political prisoners in jail. No one ever bothers to see them.

If the Contras were so vicious, why are they growing every day? Fifteen thousand people are in their forces and the Sandinistas have to have a draft that everyone is trying to dodge.

You do not have to be too smart to understand that the Contras, which is not a bad term, by the way, Contra tyranos, "against tyranny" are fighting for freedom. They are fighting to free their country from the plague of communism.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman pointed out what the Soviets would really like is for us to divert our forces from Western Europe over to Central America; yet one of the presumed arguments from the other side is that, oh, my goodness, if we feed the Contras we will somehow involve ourselves in a bigger war and ultimately have to send our troops to Central America.

Is it the gentleman's position, does the gentleman understand that our assistance to the Contras will in any way do that?

Mr. HYDE. Let me tell my friend something. If you have ever been to Cuba, it is a beautiful, warm country, with happy people who love America, but it is also a tragic country because since 1959 they have rationed food and rationed clothes. It is an economic basket case. Why? Because Mr. Castro has geared his country for conflict. They have their army in Africa and elsewhere. They are not geared for economic growth.

Now, Nicaragua is going the same way. It is one of the most desperately poor countries I have ever seen and yet it is not moving toward economic growth—it is geared for conflict, geared for the biggest army in the whole area. The people are being ground down but this is what Communists do all over the globe.

I was one who wanted to send them millions of dollars so they could establish a decent government, but immediately they turned to Cuba. They turned to the Soviet Union and they started to spread revolution down there.

We cannot run away from it. Lebanon is 6,000 miles away. South Korea is 9,000 miles away. El Salvador is 900 miles away and you can ride a bicycle from there to here.

I suggest we had better wake up and foreign policy had better be determined by people who understand what the struggle is about in our hemisphere and in our time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, does the gentleman not agree that assistance to the Contras will avoid us ever having to send our young fellows down there?

Mr. HYDE. They are willing to die for freedom down there. They just want us to write a check. We are unwilling to even do that, so they will die and they will die hungry and without shoes. That is the result of this policy of abandonment being urged by the majority party.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. Yes.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think if we look at the model in Central America, and you look at Mr. Duarte, I think everybody in this House admires him to some degree. I think the Speaker thinks he is a good man. He has compassion. He has a real promise in ruling that country and running that country.

You will never find people of that caliber in Central American Communist states. You will find people like Mr. Calero and Mr. Austin, the Grenada leaders, who believed that the way to run a country is to line people up against a wall and kill them.

Mr. HYDE. Can you imagine being the head of a country that is poverty-stricken and following as a model Cuba, Albania, Angola, Ethiopia, the Soviet Union, the great losers of the world. They cannot even feed their people. That is the model that Nicaragua is following. It is a great tragedy.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. They may be losers. The only thing they can do effectively is to kill people. That is what the Bulgarians, the Libyans, the North Koreans, and North Vietnamese are teaching them to do.

Mr. HYDE. Oh, yes. The Soviet Union and its client states cannot make anything for export except refugees. They make refugees better than anybody in the world and refugees are human beings who bleed, who weep, and who suffer, and they are going to make more refugees than you can imagine as the result of what is happening in Central America and our default, our abandonment, our turning our backs on the people who are willing to die for freedom if we will just give them a little hand, a little help.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred a moment ago to the People's Church, about them being misguided.

I wonder, can the gentleman from his investigation and what he has been reading comment about the attitude of the vast majority of Catholics in Nicaragua and particularly the church leadership, Archbishop Obando Y Bravo, for instance?

Mr. HYDE. There are about 910 priests in Nicaragua. Fifty of them are working with the so-called People's Church, which is a political church attempting to dilute and adulterate the faith of the people and elevate the state as the source of all blessings.

Do you know what they do with the kids in school? They say, "Hold your hands out. Pray to God for a piece of candy. Then close your eyes. Did you get the candy? No."

"Now close your eyes and ask the government to give you a piece of candy."

Of course, when they open their eyes, the candy is there. That is what they are doing.

Mr. DEWINE. So the statistics the gentleman quoted show that the vast majority then of the bishops and priests are not with the Communists?

Mr. HYDE. Oh, no, no.

Mr. DEWINE. I want to make that clear.

Mr. HYDE. Exactly. The church in Nicaragua is very loyal and understands what is at stake and they are beleaguered, they are embattled and they live in danger.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

□ 1400

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise in opposition to the CIA funding of the Contras. I do so because I think it is the wrong approach for U.S. policy, and not because I am a supporter of the Sandinistas or an opponent of the Contras. I am appalled by their repression, their lack of commitment to democracy, and their Marxist ties. I also believe that militarization of the area through the United States is wrong, too.

On the other hand, I find that many of the claims of colleagues of mine from the other side of the aisle are valid, especially when they condemn Sandinista activities. I believe, however, that the best approach in pursuing a viable Central American policy for the United States should be based on what the national security interests of the United States are and regional stability and cooperation.

We can bring peace to the area through the Contadora process and they should reconvene immediately. I believe that the Nicaraguans, the Sandinistas, and the Contras, have to get together and negotiate. I believe that the United States and the Sandinistas have to resume their bilateral talks in Manzanillo.

But the reason I am casting my vote today against the Contra funds is because I believe it would further destabilize the area, increase Soviet and Cuban influence, and undercut the Contadora process. Once again, my vote is not for the Sandinistas or against the Contras, who I believe have matured politically. My vote is because I think our policy is wrong. Nonetheless, I commend the President for his willingness to compromise, to be willing to use humanitarian aid.

I think there are a lot of claims of human rights abuses by Sandinistas that are accurate. And I must say that when I first went to Nicaragua I was unaware of all the repression that existed. I will even add to some comments made about Nicaraguan repression. They are repressive and they have betrayed their revolution. There is a lack of freedom of the press. I am a Roman Catholic and I categorically state that there is religious persecution. There is a lot of forced relocation involving thousands of helpless Nicaraguans going on that I think is unfair to many peasants who only want to be left alone.

By the way, I think everyone has talked about what the Nicaraguan people want, all of us U.S. experts knowing what is best for the Nicaraguans. What the Nicaraguan peasant wants in the course of my two visits is that Nicaraguan peasants and the Nicaraguan people just want to be left alone. They do not care about Ronald Reagan or Karl Marx or BILL RICHARDSON or HENRY HYDE. They want to be left alone, to live their lives in peace.

I think that what we need to do is fundamentally assist that objective—to stay out militarily, but to assist the objectives, peace through negotiations.

The Sandinistas, furthermore, in my judgment, are interested in increasing their own power internally—I think their elections, if you compare them to many others, were probably unfair in that they harassed the opposition and prevented active campaigning. On the other hand, I think it was a mistake for Mr. Cruz to withdraw from the race. He might have done better for his cause if he had men. I think that there is no question that they are not wearing white hats.

I have submitted a resolution which I hope my colleagues sponsor that condemns the human rights abuses and the lack of democratic principles of the Sandinistas, but also condemns the activities of the Contras. And my colleagues cannot tell me that America's Watch and Amnesty International and many other respected human rights organizations that say that the Contras militarily have engaged in gross human rights violations are not true, because they are true. And certain Contras elements have been involved in a number of incidents including the destruction of property, and the death of civilians. And I think if we are going to be calling a spade a spade, we should do so. Both sides violate human rights rather blatantly. Neither side wears white hats.

So what do we do? What do we do about this peace process of the Contras group, the Caleno group and the Pastora group in March submitted a peace plan? I think that peace plan of the Caleno group is a good way to start. I think that peace plan which calls for elections, an amnesty, a ceasefire, and a return to democratic principles and many other sound points is a sound way to start. I believe we should take the Contra peace plan seriously—the Sandinistas should respond. It is important that we and the Contra group get the Sandinistas and the Contras to the bargaining table. The Sandinistas should be held accountable if they disapprove.

The issue then is how do we best pressure the Sandinistas to reduce their Soviet ties and moderate their behavior, and how do we protect U.S. security. There are no pure and clean good guys in this whole Nicaraguan process, but we should strengthen any moderate forces. I must respectfully disagree with them. Those that say that all of the Contras are bad, There are some good people there like Adolph Caleno and Arters Cruz. There is a detailed study, however, that shows that most of the Contra military leadership, are former members of the Somoza regime. This is not good, because Somoza was a disastrous ruler, worse than the Sandinistas. And I will submit for the RECORD a report by the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus to support my contention:

WHO ARE THE CONTRAS?

(An analysis of the makeup of the military leadership of the rebel forces, and of the nature of the private American groups providing them financial and material support)

The United States has been supporting armed opposition to the Nicaraguan Government since 1981. Over $80 million reportedly has been spent to build and maintain a force of from 10,000 to 15,000 "contras." In the next week, Congress again faces the decision of whether to resume funding for the contras.

The purpose of this report is to analyze the leadership and membership of the contras, and the nature and goals of the private organizations which provide their financial and material support. The report is divided into two sections. The first describes and assesses the make-up of the contras; the second describes the private American organizations that assist them.

Information published by the Nicaraguan Government has not been used in this report. Instead, the report is based primarily on extensive interviews with former high-ranking officials of the primary contra force (the FDN), literature published by the FDN, and interviews with representatives of organizations that aid the contras. While we recognize there are limitations in this approach, the Executive Branch has thus far failed to respond to our requests for specific information on the structure and leaders of the FDN military command. We hope that publication of this report will focus closer attention on the significant questions it seeks to address.

SUMMARY

In summary, the conclusions of the report are as follows:

While the "foot-soldiers" of the FDN Army are largely peasants, the army is organized and commanded by former National Guardsmen. In the first publicly available organizational chart of the high command of the FDN military force, the report finds that 46 of the 48 positions in the FDN's command structure are held by former Guardsmen.

While the FDN's civilian directorate has been cleansed to minimize the role of former Guardsmen and Somoza associates, the military leadership has not been. As a result, the key military strategist positions, including the Strategic Commander, are held by ex-National Guardsmen; as are all of the General Staff; four out of five of the Central Commanders; six out of seven of the Regional Commanders; and probably all 30 Task Force commanders.

Up to 20 private groups in the United States have provided the contras with substantial financial and material aid (apparently some $5 million) in the past year. Most of these groups are not traditional relief organizations or other established groups recognized as providing humanitarian aid, but rather are ultra-conservative or paramilitary groups on the fringe of American political opinion.

These groups are largely operated by a small group of about half a dozen men, mostly with military or paramilitary backgrounds, whose close association often means that the groups work in tandem.

A major "relief" effort for the Miskito Indians living on the Honduran-Nicaraguan border has had the effect of maintaining the MISURA "contra" army. One of the groups contributing to this effort is funded in large part by Rev. Moon's Unification Church.

SECTION I—WHO ARE THE CONTRAS?

An analysis of the military leadership of the FDN

Contrasting claims have been made about the background of the contras by the United States and Nicaraguan Governments. Nicaragua states that they are "basically former Somoza National Guardsmen who are engaged in terrorism against the Nicaraguan people," while the United States maintains that in the "democratic resistance . . . nearly all of the opposition leaders opposed Somoza." Our research indicates that the truth is somewhere in between.

This section attempts to resolve the differences between these two extreme positions by describing for Congress—to the best of our knowledge, for the first time in unclassified form—the military make-up of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN).

This section concludes that:

FDN and U.S. Government claims that the FDN is largely a "peasant army" of Nicaraguans disaffected with their government are accurate.

In contrast to FDN claims about the military leadership of the contras (which the State Department has given credence by publishing), 46 of the 48 positions in the FDN military leadership are held by ex-National Guardsmen. These include the Strategic Commander, the Regional Command Coordinator, all five members of the General Staff, four out of five Central Commanders, five out of six regional commanders, and all 30 task force commanders.

While the core of the General and Central Command Staff is admittedly fluid, with personnel changing titles and duties over time, regional and task force commanders acquire personal control over their forces, and change infrequently. In any event, the over-all structure detailed here has existed for the past 16 months, and the personnel and duties listed were verified less than two weeks ago.

Certain individuals in the leadership, including expecially controversial ones such as Ricardo Lau (an ex-National Guard officer reputed to have engaged in numerous atrocities both in the Gurad and in the FDN), have taken a less "visible" role in recent months in order to make the nature of the contra army more acceptable to Congress. Our interviews with former FDN officials, as well as the recent refusal of ARDE commander Eden Pastora to ally his forces with the FDN because of the involvement of Lau and other ex-Guardsmen, indicate that these individuals nonetheless retain significant power in the FDN.

Blanket FDN denials of the military structure and individuals and their Guard background described in this section appear to lack credibility. The FDN representative in Washington, for example, claims that ex-Guard officers Armando "the Policeman" Lopez and Walter "Tono" Calderon Lopez, identified by three independent sources and numerous on-site news reports as two of the top three FDN commanders, serve in the minor ancillary roles of "warehouse keeper" and "supply assistant for a base camp." Further, the FDN representative denies that Col. Enrique Bermudez is the strategic commander who runs the military effort (this task is attributed to the civilian President of the FDN directorate), or even that a conventional military command structure exists in the FDN. These denials directly contradict literature published by the FDN in Honduras, which displays a military command structure, and places Bermudez at its head.

While the Executive Branch will likely dispute some of the findings in this report at a later date, it has thus far failed to respond to a written request for specific information on the military leadership by Caucus Chairman McHugh, or to numerous telephone inquiries. At this point, the only information the Administration has made public about the FDN military command appears to concede that FDN claims may not be verifiable: rather than submit to Congress its own analysis of FDN leadership, the State Department attributes virtually all of its information to "FDN reports."

This section focuses on the FDN because it would receive the great majority (if not all) of U.S. funds approved for expenditure, and because the FDN is the only significant contra military force at present. Leadership struggles and lack of funds have combined to virtually bring to a halt major military activities by ARDE's roughly 1,000 fighters in the south and the Miskito Indians' roughly 1,500 fighters in the north.

This section analyzes the military rather than the political leadership of the FDN for three reasons: (a) because it is the military leaders who make the key decisions on military strategy and on the direction of the war. For instance, it is the military and not the political leaders who decide on military operations, on tactics, and on the disciplining of commanders and troops for human rights abuses; (b) because it remains an open question whether the civilian leaders, who have little if any decision-making power now, would be able to wrest power from the military leaders, should the rebel forces gain victory; and (c) because very little information has heretofore been made available on the military leadership of the FDN—in contrast to the wealth of material the Administration has provided on the "new" civilian leadership. Critics call this leadership "repackaged": prior to a reorganization in 1982, nearly the entire FDN directorate was drawn from the 15th of September Legion, formed by ex-Guard officers and associates of President Somoza shortly after his ouster in 1979. For example, a recent State Department publication provides biographical information on 27 "top leaders" of the contras, only one of whom—Bermudez—is in the FDN military apparatus.

The conclusions in this section are based on extensive interviews with two former high-ranking FDN officials, and with one of the foremost American experts on the Nicaraguan National Guard. News reports, including those in the Central American press and those based on on-site interviews, formed the basis for the interviews. Information published by the Nicaraguan Government, which was found to be dated and of questionable accuracy, was not used.

The two ex-FDN officials, Edgar Chamorro Coronel and Salvador Icaza, served respectively as a member of the FDN civilian directorate and the FDN's communications liaison from 1983 to 1984. Both spent substantial time at the FDN's central base and other bases in Honduras, assisted in the investigation of regional commanders for alleged human rights abuses, and left the FDN largely because it failed to purge itself of high personnel with connections to President Somoza or the National Guard. In the course of the interviews, Chamorro checked with sources still in the FDN and brought this material up to date.

The academic expert interviewed was Professor Richard Millett of Southern Illinois University—a frequent Congressional witness who is widely respected as one of the most knowledgeable Americans on politics and power within Somoza's National Guard.

The following chart displays the current structure and leadership of the military command of the FDN. Most leaders are identified by their "noms de guerre," as they are in the FDN. Of the 48 positions in the command structure, our two sources who were formerly in the FDN claim that 46 are filled by former National Guardsmen.

Military Command Structure: FDN

Strategic commander: Enrique Bermudez (el Commandante Estrategico), Supreme commander and chief of staff; coordinator, regional commands: W. "Tono" Calderon Lopez, coordinates from 8,000 to 12,000 combatants.

General staff

G-1, Personnel: "The Deer"; G-2, Intelligence: "The Bull"; G-3, Operations: "Mike Lima"; G-4, Logistics: Armando "The Policeman" Lopez; G-5, Psychological Warfare: "Invisible".

Central commanders

Air Operations: Juan Gomez; Counter-Intelligence: Ricardo Lau; MISURA Liaison: Justiciano Perez; Special Forces: "Little Bird"; Infantry Training School:?

Regional commanders—direct from 500 to 2,000 combatants

Nicarao: Commandante "Mack"; Segovia: Commandante Dr. "Aureliano"; Jorge Salazar: Commandante "Quiche"; Rafaela Herrera: Commandante "Little Tiger"; Diriangen: Commandante "Dimas"; San Jacinto: Commandante "Renato".

Task force commanders

2 to 8 task force commanders serve under a regional command; each directs some 250 combatants.

General Description

In this command structure, the Strategic Commander is the director of military strategy and operations. He is assisted in planning and implementing strategy by his general staff and central commanders. All but one of the 12 top central staff were formerly in the Guard. Overall control of the primary combat units is given to the second-ranking officer, the coordinator of regional commands.

Each of the six regional commanders (five of whom were in the Guard) has a number of task force commanders operating under his control. The regional and task force commanders are referred to as "commandante" and command the personal loyalty of their troops. These are the key military field leaders. Our sources claim that most and probably all of the 30 task force commanders are former Guards. These commanders in turn break their 250-combatant commands into three "groups" of 70 (with the remaining personnel performing central command duties for the task force).

Roughly 80 percent of the group leaders have no prior service in the National Guard; this ratio is the reverse of what existed two years ago, before the expansion of the FDN. The groups are then broken down into three detachments of 20 combatants each (again, with the remainder performing central command duties for the group). Nearly all the detachment leaders have no prior Guard service.

FDN combatants are estimated at between 8,000 and 12,000, rather than the 15,000 claimed by the FDN. The lower figure was provided by Chamorro, who states that when he was responsible for public relations for the FDN, he was under instructions to routinely double the actual size of the FDN. Whatever the true figure, FDN combatants are largely peasants who are disaffected with Sandinista policies. In sum, the FDN is a peasant army with ex-Guard leadership.

Identification and Description of Military Leaders

Strategic commander: Enrique Bermudez

Mr. Bermudez is a former Colonel of the National Guard. Along with Aristedes Sanchez (General Secretary of the FDN's civilian directorate, formerly a wealthy landowner and close associate of the late General Somoza) and Adolfo Calero (head of the civilian directorate, and a leader of the business opposition to Somoza) Bermudez is part of the informal triumvirate that decides strategy for the civilian directorate. Bermudez controls military operations.

Bermudez, who led the Nicaraguan contingent in the OAS occupation of the Dominican Republic in 1965, was Nicaragua's military attache in Washington for the last three years of Somoza's rule. Following Somoza's ouster, he helped found the 15th of September Legion with some 60 former Guard officers, which was the nucleus of the FDN at its founding in 1981.

Bermudez increased his operational control over the FDN when he dismissed his Chief of Staff, former Guard officer Emilio Echevarry, and a number of his assistants in 1983 following a CIA-assisted investigation into Echevarry's handling of FDN funds. Bermudez did not replace Echevarry, and instead has assumed many of his functions.

Bermudez is assisted, in addition to the military staff described below, by a number of former Somoza supporters and National Guard officers who arrange for the procurement of weapons and supplies, and carry out a variety of special missions in surveillance, communications and special military tasks. These individuals are not part of the formal structure of the FDN, but are an important operations component. They include: Enrique "Cuco" (The Cuckoo) Sanchez, a former land-owner and deputy for Somoza's party in the Nicaraguan parliament and brother of General Secretary Aristedes Sanchez; the Teffel brothers, Jose and Jaime, associates of Somoza; and two brothers, former Guard officers, the "Shermans."

Bermudez' presence in the FDN has been cited by some contra leaders, such as Eden Pastora and Brooklyn Rivera, as a primary reason why they refuse to join in a coalition with the FDN. Chamorro and Icaza left the FDN in large part because Bermudez would not remove his associates from the 15th of September Legion from the FDN command structure.

Coordinator, regional commanders: Walter "Tono" Calderon Lopez

"Tono," a former Guard officer who was once a regional commander in the FDN, occupies this second-most powerful military position—the equivalent of what is known in western military parlance as a Theater Operations Commander. He directs the six regional commanders, and he can call on the general staff and central commanders to assist them. Tono is identified in a February, 1984 publication of the FDN in Honduras as commander of tactical operations, which appears to be the same functional role as regional coordinator.

General staff, personnel (G-1): "El Venado" (the Deer)

"El Venado," a former Guard officer, was a Task Force commandante for the FDN. When he was badly wounded in an attack on the town of Ocotal, in the northern-most Nicaraguan province of Nueva Segovia, he moved to the general staff. G-1 is responsible for record-keeping and advises the Strategic Commander on personnel placement.

General staff, intelligence (G-2): "El Toro" (the Bull)

"El Toro" was a colonel in the National Guard. G-2 is responsible for ascertaining the whereabouts and abilities of Nicaraguan military units. "El Toro" replaced Edgar Hernandez, a former Guard officer dismissed with Chief of Staff Emilio Echevarry in 1983.

General staff, operations (G-3): "Mike Lima"

"Mike Lima," or "M.L.", was the most widely renowned of the FDN's regional commanders prior to moving to the General Staff. A former Guard officer, he led the Diriangen regional command, with up to 2,000 fighters. This was the most militarily active of the commands. While a regional commander, he was badly wounded in a mortar explosion, and lost an arm. G-3's responsibilities include planning overall requirements and strategy for operations, in consultation with the Coordinator of Regional Commands.

General staff, logistics (G-4): Armando "El Policia" (the Policeman) Lopez

Armando Lopez, a former captain in the National Guard, was one of the founders of the 15th of September Legion; he is extremely close to Bermudez, and has been seen by some as his second in command at times. He has dismissed the possibility of a negotiations with the Nicaraguan Government, although this is a stated goal of the FDN's civilian directorate: "He who speaks of dialogue with the Communists speaks of wasting his time." G-4's responsibilities focus on supplying the regional commands and task forces.

General staff, psychological warfare (G-5): "El Invisible"

"El Invisible," a former Guard officer, is responsible for planning activities that weaken the control of the Nicaraguan Government over its armed forces and the civilian population. Such activities can include distributing leaflets that offer rewards for desertion, or broadcasting information that discredits the Sandinistas. "El Invisible" replaced Manuel Caceres, a former Guard officer now living in the Dominican Republic. This staff position has rotated more frequently than others, and "El Invisible" may shortly be returning to Task Force command.

Central command, head of air operations: Juan Gomez

Gomez was a Guard officer who served as Somoza's personal pilot. He now performs the same function for Bermudez, as well as overseeing the operation of the small number of reconnaissance, cargo and rotary aircraft that form the FDN's air force. Gomez was in the 15th of September Legion, as well as the original FDN directorate.

Central command, head of counter-intelligence: Ricardo Lau

Lau is a former Guard officer whose service in the FDN has been cited by contra leaders Eden Pastora and Brooklyn Rivera as a primary reason for their refusal to participate in a coalition with the FDN. Lau has recently been accused (by a former Salvadoran Army colonel) of procuring former Guards to assassinate Salvadoran Archbishop Romero in 1980—a new accusation which comes on top of long-standing charges that he has engaged in numerous atrocities, both as a Guardsman and in the FDN.

Lau was in the 15th of September Legion, as well as the original FDN directorate. In 1983, the FDN anounced that Lau had been removed from the formal post of head of counter-intelligence, apparently to encourage the formation of a broad coalition of "contra" groups. Nonetheless, our sources contend that Lau continues to function as he had before, albeit with a lower public profile, and retains responsibility for preventing infiltration of the FDN by agents of the Nicaraguan Government and for enforcing discipline for Bermudez.

Lau's extremely close alliance with Bermudez leads our former FDN sources to believe that as long as Bermudez is Strategic Commander, Lau will play an important role in the FDN—"forever." Lau is assisted in counter-intelligence by Armando Lopez' son, known as "El Policito" (the little policeman) and "El Bestia" (the beast).

Central command, MISURA liaison: Justiciano Perez

Perez, a former Guard officer, has also been cited by other contra leaders as an unacceptable member of any military or political coalition. Perez commanded Somoza's infantry training school, and was personally close to Somoza. He too was formally removed from the FDN leadership in 1983, but continues in a key role as Bermudez' liaison with the MISURA military force, which operates in North-eastern Nicaragua under the command of Miskito Indian leader Steadman Fagoth.

Central command, special forces: "El Pajarito" (Little Bird)

"El Pajarito" leads small groups (of up to 75 fighters) into Nicaragua to perform sabotage and other special missions requiring rapid movement. He is a young man, and although his father was a Guard officer, he was a medical student in Mexico during the revolution and never served in the Guard.

Central command, infantry training school: name unknown

A former Guard officer commands the infantry training school at Las Vegas, and which is currently diminishing in size. This officer replaced Hugh Villagra, a former Guard officer whom Bermudez allegedly ousted as a rival in 1984. Assisting the head of the training school in the recent past was a third Sanchez, Victor, whose two other brothers, Aristedes and Enrique "Cuco", have been discussed above.

Regional command, Nicarao: Commandante "Mack"

The Nicarao (a popular contraction of "Nicaragua") command is led by Commandante "Mack," a former Guardsman. His four Task Forces are all commanded by former Guardsmen, known as "El Cascavel" (the Rattlesnake), "03", "Ersi", and "Ocran". FDN publications in Honduras confirm Mack's identity as head of this command.

Regional command, Rafaela Herrera: Commandante "Tigrillo" (Little Tiger)

The Rafaels Herrera command, named after a legendary Nicaraguan heroine, is commanded by Commandante "Tigrillo," the only Regional Commander (in fact, the only one of the top 48 military leaders in the FDN besides "El Pajarito," Head of the Special Forces) who is not a former National Guardsman. Tigrillo participated in the revolution, although he may not have been a Sandinista. His Task Force commanders are all former Guards. Two of them are identified by their nicknames, "Atila" (Attila the Hun) and "Tiro Al Blanco" (Target-Shooter). FDN publication in Honduras confirm the identifies of Tigrillo, Atila and Tiro Al Blanco in these roles.

Regional command, Diriangen: Commandante "Dimas"

The Diriangen command, named after a legendary Indian chief, is commanded by Commandante "Dimas." Dimas, a former Guardsman, had been a Task Force commander in Diriangen. He replaced "Mike Lima" when Lima was wounded and became G-3. All of Dimas' Task Forces are commanded by former Guards. FDN publications in Honduras confirm Dimas' prior role of Task Force commander.

Regional command, Segovia: Commandante Dr. Aureliano

The Segovia command, named after the province of most FDN activity, the mountainous border province of Nueva Segovia, is commanded by a former Guardsman who also has studied medicine. All of Aureliano's Task Forces are commanded by former Guardsmen. FDN publications in Honduras confirm Aureliano's role in this regional command.

Regional command, Jorge Salazar: Commandante "Quiche"

The Jorge Salazar command, named after a leader of the business coalition COSEP who was killed by Nicaraguan police in 1980 (and whose widow serves on the FDN's civilian directorate), is commanded by a former Guardsman. Commandante "Quiche" has adopted an Indian name, although he is not himself an Indian. He was a Task Force commander under Walter Calderon "Tono" Lopez, who left this regional command to become coordinator of the regional commands. All of Quiche's Task Forces are commanded by former Guards. One task force is led by "Franklin."

Regional command, San Jacinto: Commandante "Renato"

The San Jacinto command, named after a famous battle in Nicaraguan history, is commanded by a former Guardsman. Commandante "Renato" presides over this smallest of the regional commands (probably some 500 fighters). His Task Forces are all commanded by former National Guards. Renato has been identified in this role in FDN publications in Honduras.

SECTION II—WHO AIDS THE CONTRAS

An analysis of the private American groups providing financial and material assistance

Close to 20 privately incorporated U.S. groups have reportedly sent (or plan soon to send) aid, supplies or cash contributions to Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras and to the contras themselves. This section analyzes the activities of these groups and their backgrounds.

An analysis of these groups, with an emphasis on the six or seven which provide the lion's share of the $5 million in private funds which has reportedly reached the contras in the last year, shows the following:

They are not the establishment conservative groups known to support administration policies in Central America, but rather are ultra-conservative, even approaching fringe, activist groups. For instance, one group helped provide mercenaries to protect the white government in Rhodesia and another has included in its international membership at least one neo-fascist party, whose chief had served in Mussolini's government.

While some of these untraconservative groups have existed for decades, others have been formed in the last year or even in the last six months—with the primary if not sole purpose to aid the contras.

The groups receive their funds from a wide variety of sources—including individual Americans, U.S. corporations (such as pharmaceutical companies who have contributed medical supplies), and Rev. Moon's Unification Church.

Although many of the groups argue that they provide "humanitarian aid" only, they are not in any way associated with (nor do they coordinate efforts with) the broad community of recognized humanitarian relief or refugee organization, such as Catholic Relief Service, the World Relief Organization, or the U.N. High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR). In fact, some of these recognized relief organizations have expressed concern that the private groups will politicize their relief efforts, and have contended that the so-called "humanitarian" aid to Miskito refugees on the Nicaraguan border actually sustains the MISURA contra army's military base camps.

The individual driving forces behind the major groups are a small group of about a half a dozen men, most of whom have military or paramilitary backgrounds or mercenary experience, and who often participate in more than one organization. For instance, three assistant editors of Soldier of Fortune magazine (which has sent direct aid to the contras) also run or are board members of three other separate groups seeking to aid the contras. And the chairman of the group which may have provided the most aid, retired Gen. John Singlaub, also is closely associated with four other U.S. groups aiding the contras. (Prior to being relieved by President Carter of his South Korea command, Gen. Singlaub headed the Unconventional Warfare Task Force in Vietnam.)

While many of the groups work closely together, they have different stated purposes. Some openly admit their aid is for military purposes (and includes boots, uniforms and even personnel.) Others insist their aid reaches only needy refugees, and is in no way related to the contra war. Most groups call their aid "humanitarian," but either privately or publicly acknowledge that some of it (e.g. medical supplies and food) ends up at contra camps. These groups also have conceded that their "humanitarian" aid to refugees (which include families of the contras) may indirectly aid the contras by freeing up the contra accounts to purchase weapons and pay combatants.

The research for this section is based primarily on individual personal interviews with spokespeople or directors for virtually all of the groups, as well as publicly available information.

A description of each of these groups and their activities follows:

WORLD ANTI-COMMUNIST LEAGUE

The World Anti-Communist League, formed in the 1960's by Nationalist Chinese to fight communism, claims to act as an "umbrella group" for many of the smaller and newer groups aiding the contras. Headed by retired Army General John Singlaub (who commanded U.S. troops in South Korea until he was relieved by President Carter, and who previously pioneered new techniques of unconventional warfare as head of the Joint Unconventional Task Force in Vietnam), the group coordinates fund-raising from U.S. groups, U.S. individuals, U.S. corporations, and foreign governments. According the Gen. Singlaub, funds raised by WACL have purchased food, medicine, boots, outboard motors, and office supplies, and have thus allowed the contras to use their cash for weapons and ammunition.

The WACL, in recent years, has been subjected to increasing charges of anti-semitism and neo-fascism. In 1973, charging anti-semitism, its British chapter resigned. Five years later at an annual convention, its Mexican delegation attacked NBC's "Holocaust" program as "another gigantic campaign of Jewish propaganda to conceal their objectives of world domination." In the same year, WACL extended membership to Italy's principal neo-facist party, which was headed by a member of Mussolini's government. One of its former chairmen has espoused the concept of genetic purity and calls for artificial insemination and sperm banks to maintain racial purity.

Soldier of Fortune: El Salvador/Nicaragua Defense Fund

According to the magazine's editor, Soldier of Fortune's Defense Fund has provided boots and military uniforms to the Nicaraguan contras. In conjunction with several other groups (see Air Commandos, Refugee Relief International, and Institute for Regional and International Studies), Soldier of Fortune is one of the larger and more aggressive recruiters on behalf of private aid to the contras.

Soldier of Fortune is a monthly journal widely considered to be a major source of information for mercenaries. Its classified ads offer information on how to obtain and use weapons and explosives, as well as references on individual mercenaries. It assisted the white minority government of Rhodesia in procuring mercenaries. Among its more recent projects have been the raising of funds for Afghan guerillas, and the offering of a $100,000 reward in gold to any pilot defecting with materials implicating the Russians for participating in biological warfare.

The Caribbean Commission

The Caribbean Commission, formed in 1979 with the help of pro-Somoza Nicaraguan exiles when Somaza's fall seemed imminent, has provided some 50,000 pounds of materials—particularly clothing and medical equipment—to Nicaraguan refugees on the Honduran border, including families of the contras. In addition, they have provided some specific medical equipment to the contras, including an x-ray machine.

The Commission is headed by Dr. Alton Oschner, Jr., whose father's similarly oriented organization (Information Council of the Americas) broadcast "truth tapes" throughout Latin America in the early '60's warning about the spread of communism in Latin America. According to Dr. Oshcner, he was also involved in establishing Friends of the Americas (see below.)

The purpose of the group is to "maintain, promote and strengthen the free enterprise system in the western hemisphere in order to prevent totalitarian infiltration in this part of the world."

Friends of the Americas

Friends of the Americas was founded in April of 1984 as a charitable organization which aids, among others, Miskito Indian refugees in Honduras. According to its co-director Diane Jenkins, it has in the past year sent to Honduras 10 medical teams, 5,000 pairs of children's shoes, and some food.

Mrs. Jenkins vehemently denies providing any aid to MISURA, the major military arm of the Miskitos. However, Congressional staff members and Catholic Relief Service workers who have visited the area contend that aid from FOA and others has the effect of keeping the refugees directly on the border (rather than north of the border where the United Nations has bona fide refugee camps) and thus of sustaining MISURA base camps.

Further doubts about the ultimate destination of the aid are fueled by advertisements such as one which appeared in a FOA Newsletter last fall, which appealed for "cash contributions," for "a large airplane," for "boats and outboard motors," and for such militarily-oriented equipment as radios, walkie-talkies and a satellite dish.

Friends of the Americas is one of the better known groups in large part due to its leadership: Director Woody Jenkins, a Louisiana State Representative who resigned the Democratic National Committee in 1980 to campaign for Reagan, also now serves as secretary of the Conservative Caucus' research branch and as the director of the Council for National Policy. Mr. Jenkins (whose wife Diane is co-director) was the dinner-chairman of the Nicaraguan Refugee Fund (see below), which hosted President Reagan April 15.

International Relief Friendship Foundation

Funded largely by Reverend Moon's Unification Church, the IRFF in the last year has shipped 1,000 pounds of clothing and seven tons of food and medicine to Miskito Indian refugees in Honduras. The group denies providing any aid to the military arm of the Miskitos, and asserts that much of the aid has gone to children.

According to the director of IRFF, the organization was started in 1976 with a $225,000 grant from the Unification Church. 90 percent of their present annual budget of under $200,000 still comes from the Church.

Also according to the director, IRFF has worked with the political arm of the Church, Causa International, which he asserted had paid $3,000 to fly one of IRFF's shipments to Honduras last summer.

As with aid provided by FOA (see above), IRFF's aid is distributed to "recently arrived refugees" directly on the border, rather than to internationally-sponsored (eg UNHCR) refugee camps north of the border. As a result, this type of aid has been subject to criticisms from relief workers and Congressional staff that it has had the effect of maintaining the MISURA military base camps, which are also located directly on the border.

Civilian-Military Assistance

CMA, which received press notice when a helicopter carrying two of its men was shot down while participating in an attack in northern Nicaragua last fall, was formed in 1983 to take direct action against communism in Central America, and specifically to provide training and equipment to the contras.

According to CMA's director and Vietnam veteran Tom Posey, CMA has sent the contras over $200,000 (over 60 tons) in military equipment (not including humanitarian aid) including boots, canteens, and other supplies.

In addition, perhaps more important, they have provided manpower: in the last year, CMA has sent Americans to work with the contras as mechanics and medical relief teams. CMA also claims that its personnel operate as forward observers alongside the contras inside Nicaragua, and, in some cases, have handled "small weapons." According to Mr. Posey, CMA provided "less than 100" Americans to the contras in the past year.

Most recently, in early April, 14 CMA-supported men were asked by the U.S. Embassy in Honduras to leave the area.

Air Commando Association

While the Air Commandos have not to date provided any aid to the contras, its director aims to start aid as soon as possible. The group is awaiting clearance from the Honduran government for delivery to the contras of a complete 25-bed hospital.

Air Commandos is run by retired Gen. H.C. Aderholt, who is also an assistance editor of Soldier of Fortune magazine. In addition, Mr. Aderholt served in Vietnam as deputy to Gen. Singlaub in the Joint Unconventional Warfare Task Force.

Christian Broadcasting Network (Operation Blessing)

Through Operation Blessing, its worldwide relief agency, news stories report that CBN has sent food, medical supplies and clothing to families of the contras. CBN refused to admit or deny these reports, asserting only that they "help starving, displaced people in Central America," and that while no "direct" aid is given to the contras, "aid is provided to needy people wherever they are."

Founded by M.G. (Pat) Robertson, CBN owns four TV stations and grosses over $50 million a year. Besides its regular show "the 700 Club," CBN provides news and prayer programming. In 1982, Robertson launched a political lobby named the National Planning Committee, which works to change First Amendment laws.

Refugee Relief International

Refugee Relief International, headed by one of Soldier of Fortune's editors, has provided an unspecified amount of aid to Miskito Indian refugees in Honduras—some in "direct funds" (cash), but the majority in medicine, food and clothing. According to news reports (Boston Globe, 12/30/84), a RRI pamphlet makes clear the ultimate military purpose of these funds, by saying "this type of (humanitarian) aid will defray costs that the U.S. government would ordinarily incur, thereby freeing a portion of its financial allocations for additional military and other assistance."

RRI is headed by Thomas Reisinger, the Assistant Director of Soldier of Fortune for Special Projects. On the Board of RRI is retired Gen. John Singlaub.

Veterans of Foreign Wars

Although the VFW voted in August of 1983 to establish a fund to provide food, medicine and other non-military aid to the Nicaraguan "freedom-fighters", the fund claims to have lasted only one year and raised only $2,000. The VFW turned the funds over to the American Security Council Foundation. The ASC Foundation claims to have transferred the funds to the International Red Cross. A spokesperson for the International Red Cross reported that after an extensive search, no record of this transaction could be found.

Institute for Regional and International Studies

The Institute for Regional and International Studies seeks to make available to Salvadorans and "perhaps" to the Nicaraguan contras (B. Globe, 12/30/84) intelligence gathering and psychological operations.

The group is directed by Alexander M.S. McColl, military affairs editor of Soldier of Fortune Magazine. It was founded in 1982 under the auspices of the World Anti-Communist League. Soldier editor-in-chief Dale Dye asserted he did not know if any Contras have yet been trained at IRIS.

Nicaraguan Refugee Fund

The Nicaraguan Refugee Fund is presently seeking to raise $2-$5 million to aid Nicaraguans in Honduras—in part through a gala $250-a-head fund-raising dinner honoring President Reagan on Monday, April 15. A substantial amount is expected to go through FOA (see above), but to date, this group is not known to have provided any funds to the contras or to Nicaraguan refugees.

The sponsors and dinner committee of the NRF represent a virtual "who's who" of private U.S. citizens involved in aiding the contras—the dinner committee is chaired by Friends of the America's Woody Jenkins and includes J. Peter Grace (also affiliated with the Knights of Malta), Nelson Bunker Hunt, CBN's Pat Richardson and Caribbean Commission's Dr. Ochsner. Its Honorary Committee includes conservative stalwarts such as Joseph Coors and W. Clement Stone; and its Special Committee includes Wayne Newton and Roger Staubach.

Although this group has not yet provided any aid to the contras or their families, it is noteworthy because the fund-raising dinner in its honor appears to be drawing key Administrative leaders, including the President—representing the first time U.S. Government officials have provided their names and stature to such a private pursuit.

Knights of Malta and Americares Foundation

The Knights of Malta, a 900-year old fraternal organization of Roman Catholics, has reportedly (WP 12/27/84) distributed $680,000 to Miskito Indian refugees in Honduras, in conjunction with the Americares Foundation. While the Knights deny raising any funds for the contras, a spokesperson at the Americares Foundation contends that Americares raised the money (targeted to six destinations in Honduras) and the Knights distributed the aid.

The head of the American division of the Knights of Malta is J. Peter Grace. The honorary chairman of the Americares Foundation is Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Other Groups Involved in the Private Aid Effort

Over half a dozen other groups, whose purpose was unclear or on which little information was available, have reportedly aided the contras in the last year. These include:

Causa International, the political arm of Rev. Moon's Unification Church, which refuses to comment about aid to Nicaragua or Honduras, but which others (including IRFF) have asserted helps finance their efforts to aid the contras;

Human Development Foundation, reported by the Washington Post as aiding the Contras and by The Nation as the unofficial operating arm of the FDN in the US;

Nicaraguan Patriotic Association, which is reported to have collected half a million dollars in aid and to have provided daily food supplies for seven refugee camps in Honduras; and

Pro-America Education Foundation, which in the past year has sent $1 million in medical supplies contributed by major pharmaceutical companies to Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras.

(This report was prepared by the staff of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus. It does not seek to reflect the views of the members of the Caucus.)

But, on the other hand, I do think there are people like Mr. Calero, and Mr. Pastora and Mr. Robelo, who are moderate. Who support democracy, and who should not be dismissed unilaterally as obstacles to peace or warmongers. In fact, these three are ex-Sandinistas who were disaffected. I must say that among the Sandinista leadership did I find too many moderates.

I am here voting against military Contra aid because there is a Democratic/Republican bipartisan alternative which stands for peace and negotiations and might work. I think it was initiated on the Democratic side, and I am proud of that, that members of my party have taken this initiative. That proposal supports negotiations, supports the Contadora process and gives refugee assistance through an independent group. But most importantly it sets a timetable of October 1, a date we reassess this entire process to see if it is working. We will see whether the Nicaraguans, and the Contadora nations respond to this peace offering. If they don't, then we know where the blame lies and we should in a bipartisan fashion forge another alternative.

Mr. Ortega has said that he will respond with a cease-fire and negotiations with the Contras. On the other hand, Ambassador Mr. Tunnerman, contradicts him when he says in a newspaper article that they will never negotiate with the Contras. I do not know whether the Nicaraguans are telling the truth or not. I am not going to sit here and tell you that the Sandinistas have been always truthful and accurate, that they have not lied, because I think they have lied in some cases and have made many statements for propaganda reasons. I think in relating to the peace process I believe the U.S. negotiator, Ambassador Harry Shlaudeman, who is a good man, who tells me that there has been deception on Sandinistas part, I know, too, however, that there are people in this administration, in the White House, in the CIA, and I will name Mr. Casey, whom I do not think want to have a negotiated solution. They want a military solution—a victory at all costs, with or without committing U.S. troops.

I would ask my colleagues to read the testimony of Gen. Paul Gorman of the Southern Command before the Senate he very clearly said before the Foreign Relations Committee before he retired that the Contras cannot win. That you cannot give them short-term or long-term aid and expect them to win. It is a conflict that has no military solution. Gorman states that the rebels are incapable of overthrowing the Sandinista government in the foreseeable future regardless of whether they received American aid.

So if we are looking at pressuring the Sandinistas, I think the ultimate pressure is this Congress, which four times has refused Contra aid. If we threaten to change, the Sandinistas will respond.

Mr. RITTER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield at the end of my statement.

The last point we are trying to make is that if we are going to talk about pressuring the Sandinistas, the best pressure is the Congress of the United States that consistently has been voting against Contra aid. And I suspect that come October 1, unless the Sandinistas have responded with, No. 1, supporting the Contadora process, which up to now I don't think that they have, we should reasses our policy. I do think there have been cases where they have been willing to negotiate bilaterally with us, thus bypassing the Contadora process.

No. 2, the pressure should be increased so that the Sandinistas negotiate with the Contras. I think that is the ultimate solution. Let the Nicaraguans decide their future for themselves—but the United States should be a catalyst.

No. 3, I would like to see them moderate their behavior, cut off their ties to the Soviets and the East Germans, the Cubans, and the Palestinians. The Sandinistas are bad guys, they are bad dudes. No one is defending them. But to achieve these goals of changing their behavior and reducing their Marxist ties will require negotiations and give and take on all sides.

We should focus on how we achieve peace in that area. And I submit that this package of $14 million which if it does not pass, ladies and gentlemen, we all know here that there is a lot of private aid that is going to flow to the Contras. The conflict won't end with this vote. We know that. There is going to be an emergence of that kind of private effort. It is going to get more and more protracted, and we are going to have more and more problems to deal with. Regardless of the outcome of this vote, negotiations, bilateral and multilateral, are paramount.

So what I am saying here today is I will be voting for a package that contains support for the Contadora process, but one that requires another look on October 1. It also, at my urging condemns the human rights violations of the Sandinistas and the Contras, a little stronger on the Sandinistas because I think they have gotten away with unnoticed repression. On both sides of the aisle, we have been inconsistent in critizing governments on the right as well as the left.

So I am here to just offer an optimistic view that we can reach peace, but that we can do it through an alternative that I think is bipartisan. And I think the President may have started this positive process of saying that he is willing through humanitarian aid to try to deal with this problem. But you do not do it through the CIA, which has shown deception through the mining of harbors and the secret pamphlet which is a branch of government that has not been consistent and has often undercut other executive branches of the administration, that I think genuinely do want peace such as the State Department and the Department of Defense.

Mr. RITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON I yield to my colleague.

Mr. RITTER. I thank my good friend from New Mexico for yielding.

The gentleman mentioned that an official of the U.S. Government stated that the Contras could not win. I think more accurately his quote is they are not going to win overnight.

But let me ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman believe that the freedom fighters in Afghanistan are about to triumph over the invading Soviet occupation forces?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think so. I think it it going to be a very protracted and underdog struggle—but a legitimate one nonetheless.

Mr. RITTER. OK. I think the gentleman and I are probably in agreement that the guerrilla war and the fight for freedom on the part of the Mutjahadin in Afghanistan is not one that is going to defeat Soviet military forces on the field. The whole idea behind guerrilla war, be it in Afghanistan, be it in Cambodia, which a number of Members of the other side of the aisle are supporting, the whole idea behind guerrilla warfare is to tire the enemy and to inflict damage, to have the enemy expend resources.

We are all too familiar with these kinds of conflicts that have engaged non-Communist governments around the world. The idea of the guerrilla war in Salvador is not necessarily to gain a great military victory on the field. It is to tire the government. It is to tire the United States.

□ 1410

These guerrilla wars have been fought to tire American public support for governments. Indeed we are trying to do the same thing; we are trying to encourage the Soviets and the Cubans to tire somewhat of their support for the Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have a serious question with the gentleman's proposal. One proposal, one part of that involves the Contadoras. I know the gentleman is intimately acquainted with Mexico, with the Government of Mexico, with the people that run that Government. In looking at them and the other Contadoras you find very few government officials who are willing to say anything in public that will upset the Cubans or the Nicaraguans. I mean that has been a fact of life. Castro has been sending young Cubans to be killed by young Africans for many years and you never heard a word of protest from Mexico.

My first question to the gentleman would be: How are these Contadoras who are fairly intimidated by their very fierce neighbors going to somehow instill a sense of discipline into this process? I think it is naive for us to believe that they can handle the situation.

The second thing I would like to ask the gentleman is: We gave them essentially $100 million when they started out. We have pictures now of Mr. Ortega meeting, even then, with Eastern European Communist leaders even while he was receiving money from the United States. The Soviets have put some $70 million into military installations including runways and large airports in Nicaragua.

Why would the Sandinistas give up their tremendous advantage, this tremendous linkage with the Soviet Union when $100 million and possibly the promise of many times that, was not enough initially to turn them away from the Soviet bloc?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me answer both questions to my colleague.

There are two sides to the Contadora process. What the Democratic plan says is let us support it. It has instruments and funding to do so, for peacekeeping and verification.

The problems are this: On our side I think there are people in our administration that are subverting the Contadora process. They do not want to see it succeed. At all costs they want a military victory and they are against Contadora. On the other hand the gentleman is right, there are some Contadora countries that tilt toward the Nicaraguans. Mexico is one. I think it is going to take constructive effort to get the Contadora countries to deal legitimately with the problems of verification and peacekeeping forces within the negotiations. The Contadora process has not had an outstanding record. It needs to be buttressed and strengthened—but not undercut it. And we have done that in many instances.

What I am saying to my colleague is the Contadora may be our only hope for peace. I think that Contadora coupled with bilateral talks with the Nicaraguans, resuming the Manzanillo talks, which have been suspended. I think these two forums provide the best opportunity for a dialog. Presidents that have not been previously supportive of the President's effort like President Betancur of Colombia, is now cooling down his negative attitude toward what the President has been doing because of the President's latest humanitarian aid initiative. I think that is good. It seems we are getting more constructive forces, moderate forces, behind us. So why spoil everything with a bad vote that will further militarize the conflict.

On the second point that my colleague made about Sandinistas: there were men and women in this House that supported them, gave them that early infusion of support and we were involved getting Somoza out that must feel repudiated and disappointed because the Sandinistas have reneged on their revolution in large part. But that is not the issue. The issue is how do we bring peace, one that is in our best security interests? How do we stand up for that peasant, that little person in Nicaragua who does not care about Ronald Reagan or Karl Marx or my good friend Mr. HUNTER or myself; they want to be left alone. I think that should be our objective—peace through negotiations.

Mr. HUNTER. But how do you get the Soviets out?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Through negotiations, through the Contadora process and Manzanillo. More U.S. arms will only increase the Soviet presence.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the gentleman that that is all the Cambodians wanted was to be left alone; that all the South Vietnamese wanted was to be left alone; that all that the Laotians wanted was to be left alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes additional to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask my colleague from New Mexico to elaborate a bit. He does agree that an important part of this solution is a dialog between the Sandinistas and the Contras.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, I do.

Mr. McCAIN. What method can we use to pressure that dialog to begin since so far it appears as if the Sandinistas have rejected dialog with the Contras?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the main source of pressure would be several Latin American countries, Mexico, Colombia, Panama, and Venezuela principally. The vote today, which I hope will reject the military/CIA assistance to the Contras, will be a sign of pressure because Mr. Ortega will be put on notice. Mr. Ortega knows that the Congress is going to come back again and there are going to be wavering legislators like myself who come back October 1, and if he has done nothing except his hypocritical statements, and if he does not respond I will not support his continued efforts to deceive everybody. Mr. Ortega has to put up or shut up.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has been one of the genuinely agonized Members over this issue.

I appreciate his honesty and his diligence and although I do not agree at all with the conclusion, I respect it a whole lot. I just want to ask and get the gentleman's opinion about the Contras. I think the gentleman accurately portrayed them as not being perfect. But in the gentleman's opinion have they not achieved legitimacy within Nicaragua with the nonmilitary opposition to the Sandinista government? I am talking about the church, the very people that you have cited as being repressed by the Sandinista government. I just want to know if the gentleman agrees with me that whatever the situation a couple of years ago, today the Contras, even given their warts, have achieved legitimacy with just about everybody that is being subjected to oppression by the Sandinista government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I cannot answer entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Mexico has again expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think first of all we have to understand that there are members of the Contras that used to be Sandinistas that are disappointed and they are out and I think their concerns are legitimate, like Mr. Robelo and the Chamorros and Cruz and Caleno. All I can tell the gentleman is that there are businessmen, there are students, there are Nicaraguans who have opted to stay in Nicaragua in the opposition rather than become Contras. And I would hope the gentleman would join me, through the National Endowment of Democracy, or other areas, to support these dissidents within Nicaragua that are democratic forces. I would be prepared to sponsor an amendment that would do that if it would strengthen democracy, to help these dissident forces within Nicaragua.

So I do not know the exact answer to my colleagues except to say that there are members of the Contras who have been disaffected with the Sandinista revolution. You cannot call them all Somozistas and dismiss them. They are legitimate. That is why I wanted to make the point that I think they have achieved a relative degree of political maturity. That peace plan of Mr. Cruz and Mr. Caleno is something that should not be dismissed. It is a good start. We should look at it seriously. The best way to pressure the Sandinistas to vote no on military aid because they will be put on notice.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 239, which would authorize the release of $14 million in military aid to the Contra guerrillas fighting the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua, and also in opposition to the substitute to be offered by Mr. MICHEL of Illinois if House Joint Resolution 239 is rejected. In the alternative, I urge my colleagues to support the resolution to be offered by Mr. BARNES of Maryland and the substitute to be offered by Mr. HAMILTON of Indiana.

It is important that this House reaffirm its position that no military support be provided to the Contras. Some have argued that this is no longer the issue, because President Reagan is now asking only for "humanitarian" aid, not military assistance. However, it is clear that the President is taking this position solely for tactical reasons. He has concluded, albeit reluctantly, that he does not have the votes in Congress to support his policy of military intervention in Nicaragua. There is no doubt, however, that the President's fundamental policy has not changed. Clearly, he hopes to sustain the Contras with "humanitarian" aid so that, on another day, he can try again to renew the flow of military aid.

There is also no doubt that this military aid has been used, and would be used in the future, to seek the forcible overthrow of the Nicaraguan government. The President has hedged on this point, at times claiming the purpose of our aid is to interdict arms going to the rebels in El Salvador, at times saying it is for the purpose of "putting pressure" on Nicaragua to negotiate, and at times coming closer to the truth, which is the real purpose of our aid is to overthrow a sovereign government. The Contras themselves are much more straightforward about it. They declare that their purpose is to overthrow the government, and we should be under no illusions about it.

In my judgment, providing aid for this purpose in Nicaragua will not work and is not in the interests of the United States. The time for Congress to say so, clearly and strongly, is now.

It is fair to ask: Are there any circumstances when it is legitimate for the United States to support revolution or counterrevolution in a foreign nation? Under certain circumstances, such support may be an appropriate means of defending the legitimate interests of the United States. It is one of the many tools available in the conduct of American foreign policy. Because of its inherent limitations, however, it is a tool of policy that should be employed sparingly.

The United States is a global power with legitimate interests beyond their borders. Those interests are political, economic, and strategic. They are generally consistent with a stable international environment, and to maintain such a stable environment we must actively promote a credible Western deterrent, equitable economic growth, the rule of law, and basic human rights, among other things.

These interests are shared with many other nations. But since the United States is the dominant power committed to such interests, we have a special responsibility. Other nations look to us for effective leadership in advancing our common goals. In formulating our foreign policy, therefore, we must first have a clear understanding of where our vital interests lie, and then carefully select the particular tools which are most likely to secure those interests.

Most Americans are quite properly skeptical of intervention in a foreign nation. Unless a vital American interest or a fundamental principle is clearly at stake, most Americans will not long support an interventionist policy. In that event, the policy is sure to fail. In a democracy like ours, a policy that is not understood and supported by the people is not a sustainable policy.

In Nicaragua, the United States is supporting the forcible overthrow of an established govermnent. Granted, it is a government we do not like. But the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was grounded on the same premise. Can we credibly argue that superpower intervention is justified in our case, but not in theirs?

Our people, and others throughout the world, were deeply offended by Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. It was aggression, pure and simple. That invasion was a violation of international law and has been condemned as such by the United Nations. Our people can understand and support aid to a people that is defending its homeland, and therefore our current policy on Afghanistan is a sustainable policy.

But in the case of Nicaragua, the United States is violating international law. When called before the World Court for illegally mining harbors, we denied jurisdiction and refused to argue the merits of the case. Unlike Afghanistan, our friends are embarrassed by our policy, and so are our citizens.

The American people do not want their government printing pamphlets advocating murder, violating the rule of law, demeaning our expressed values, and alienating our friends. They do not undersand and support this activity and therefore it is not a sustainable policy. It simply will not work.

It is also counterproductive to American interests in Central America, for it actually strengthens the hands of the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, in the region, and in the eyes of the international community.

Another unfortunate byproduct of our Nicaraguan policy is that it erodes public confidence in the Central Intelligence Agency. Only a fraction of the Agency's time and money is spent on such "covert" activities. Its primary responsibility is to collect and analyze information, a critically important function if our decisionmakers are to formulate sound policies. Yet, when the Agency is directed to undertake so flawed a covert operation, the intergrity of the CIA as an institution is called into question, undermining the credibility of legitimate functions truly vital to our national security.

As I said at the outset, support for revolution or counterrevolution can be an appropriate tool of American foreign policy. However, its appropriateness depends on the facts of each case, and specifically on whether its use is consonant with American interests and values. In the case of Nicaragua, it is not. For that reason, we should vote down House Joint Resolution 239.

It is not enough, however, to simply reject the President's policy of military intervention. We do have legitimate interest in Central America. We do have legitimate concerns with certain policies of the Sandinista government, particularly to the extent that they may threaten other nations in the region. And we do care about legitimate refugees who may have been displaced by the conflicts in that region. For this reason, I urge my colleagues to support the alternative resolution to be offered by Mr. BARNES of Maryland and the substitute to be offered by Mr. HAMILTON of Indiana.

These proposals reject the policy of military intervention and focus on a more constructive approach. They would provide true humanitarian assistance to real refugees, not to combatants. This would be assured by delivering the aid through the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Moreover, these proposals would set aside $4 million to implement any regional agreement that might be reached as the result of the Contadora initiative. In adopting the Barnes-Hamilton proposals, we would be sending a clear signal to Central America that this Nation is committed to a political and economic approach, an approach which our people can understand and will support., That is a sustainable policy. That is a policy that has a chance to work.

I hope that today, once and for all, Congress will reject military intervention and opt for a policy which reflects our values as well as our interests. I urge the adoption of the Barnes-Hamilton proposals.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. I want to compliment the gentleman from New York for a very balanced presentation, I think one that goes directly to the issue. I believe that the key phrase is sustainability. I agree with the gentleman. I think our policy in Afghanistan is one that can be sustained and one that the American people can support. I quite agree with him that the policy in Nicaragua is one in which the American people have already, I think in a very demonstrative way, indicated that they will not support, and, therefore, I think the gentleman's solution, emphasizing economic and political solutions, is the correct way, and I want to compliment him for his statement.

Mr. McHUGH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Does the gentleman feel that the goals of the Contras, the small "d" democratic goals of the Contras, are any less small "d" democratic than the goals of the Mujtahidin in Afghanistan?

Mr. McHUGH. Well, I have a hard time reading what the goals and motivations of the Contras are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH) has expired.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute if the other side will yield 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has 3 hours, 22½ minutes. The gentleman from Michigan has 3 hours, 7½ minutes.

The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. DICKS. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. McHUGH. In response to the gentleman, I would say that I cannot be so precise as to read the intentions and motivations of the Contras. I am sure some of them are truly committed to the goals that the Afghanistan freedom fighters may be, but my basic point is that that effort, in trying to overthrow an existing government, is not understood and supported by the American people, and in my judgment is therefore not a sustainable, workable policy.

To the contrary, when we are helping the people in Afghanistan, we are helping them to defend their homeland against an invasion, against aggression, and that is sustainable and understandable.

Mr. RITTER. If I could ask the gentleman to further yield, the fact is that the developed small "d" democratic ideals of the Contras are far, far more small "d" democratic than the goals of the Mujtahidin, the societies being quite different, the societies being quite less undeveloped in the sense of understanding democracy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. McHUGH] has again expired.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS].

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I would like to associate myself with the calm and I think very eloquent remarks of the gentleman who preceded me in the well, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Chairman, when the rhetoric is stripped away, this debate is about war. The President has not asked Congress simply to agree that Nicaragua's Government is extreme; or to express our unhappiness with restriction on the press and with the harassment of political parties; we are not being asked simply to acknowledge the good intentions of men like Arturo Cruz; we are not being asked to authorize the use of military force to defend against Nicaraguan aggression, or to halt whatever material support Nicaragua may be providing to the rebels in El Salvador.

We are being asked to lend American weapons, dollars, and prestige to a movement whose aim is the violent overthrow of a government with whom we are at peace, and against whom we can fully protect ourselves and our other regional friends without resorting to armed invasion or support for violent counterrevolution.

We are told that we need the Contras—now that they have failed so dismally at arms interdiction—because they can keep the pressure on Managua; they can cause economic hardship that will undermine the popularity of the regime; and they will provide an alternative to which dissident or disgruntled Nicaraguans may turn.

But the issue today is not whether Nicaraguan dissident groups—internal or in exile—should exist; the question is whether they should be an instrument—indeed, whether they should owe their very existence—to the foreign policy of the United States.

We would all like to see democracy take hold in Nicaragua, as we would in Guatemala, Chile, Paraguay, and in El Salvador, where its grasp is still far shakier than this administration would like publicly to admit. But we are not this hemisphere's only experts on democracy, social justice, the fair treatment of indigenous populations, or human rights. There are many other supporters of these concepts in Latin America, and the fundamental question we are being asked today is whether we should approach the Nicaragua problem on a unilateral or on a regional basis.

The bipartisan policy being put forward today as an alternative to the course suggested by President Reagan includes a willingness to respond forcefully to acts of lawlessness or aggression, but it contains, as well, a commitment to work seriously with the Contadora countries for a regional peace, and to rely on legal methods for encouraging democratic Nicaraguans both inside and outside the country.

Some in this body who see the wisdom of regional action believe, nonetheless, that pressure from the Contras is needed to give that regional approach a chance to work. I do not agree.

With respect to security matters, the Contras are not needed to respond to whatever threat Nicaragua may pose to us or to our neighbors, a threat that has, in any case, been grossly exaggerated.

With respect to internal issues, there exists more evidence to contradict than to support the notion that Nicaragua will liberalize its political system due to pressure from the Contras.

But Nicaragua has shown, through its participation in Contadora, that it does care about its reputation within Latin America. And Latin American leaders have shown an increased willingness to embrace and encourage the spread of democratic principles throughout the region, Nicaragua included.

But U.S. support for the Contras is not the lever that will make regional pressure work; it is the wedge dividing U.S. methods and goals from those of our democratic neighbors. Not a single Latin American head of state has given—or could give—public support to CIA or U.S. military aid to the Contras.

The Contra operation has been, from the beginning, a violation of international law, and Latin governments care about that; their concern is heightened by past American intervention in the region, especially in Nicaragua. Latins know, too, that military control of the Contras is held by officers who are more killers than freedom fighters, ex-national guard who may share with our President Reagan a strong belief in anticommunism, but who also possess, in the tradition of their own past President Somoza, a vicious and self-righteous intolerance for those with whom they disagree.

For these reasons, our support for the Contras is a distraction, shifting the world spotlight away from Nicaragua's misdeeds to our own. We have mined harbors, taught political assassination, and allied ourselves with killers. In so doing, we have fulfilled the predictions and helped to consolidate the power of Nicaragua's most extreme leaders.

This is not a sensible policy for encouraging change in Nicaragua. It is a policy, rather, of reaction. It is as if our country had lost faith in the sanctity of law, in the skill of our diplomats, in the good will of our neighbors, in the resilience of democratic values, in our ability to learn from history, and in our commitment—enforced by the will of the American people—not to unleash the forces of war without fully exploring other options and never without due cause.

Not long ago, Secretary of State Shultz complained that America was becoming the hamlet of nations; that we were too introspective, too principled, too fearful, too plagued by guilt to act when action was required. That is a provocative image, but today's debate will decide whether we will go to the other extreme. Whether we will act without regard for law, facts, principles, or consequences; whether in rejecting Hamlet we will become the Bernhard Goetz of nations; or whether we cannot with confidence in ourselves and our values, and with the help of regional friends, find a better way.

Mr. Chairman, it is not everyday in this body that—on a matter of major consequence—the right thing to do—and the popular thing to do—coincide. But that is the case today.

The American people overwhelmingly reject the policy of this administration in Nicaragua.

Common sense, international law, and simple humanity reject the policy of this administration in Nicaragua.

And there is no reason on earth that this House ought not—with pride, and without any need to temporize or compromise—reject out of hand the policies of this administration in Nicaragua.

□ 1430

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STUDDS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman gave a very eloquent speech for which I heard very little documentation, but I would refer to the gentleman, when he talks about those killers, as he refers to the Contra or counterrevolutionary forces, to their document on national dialog of the Nicaragua Resistance, dated March 2, 1985, in which they advocated to recognize the primacy of civilian society; a dissolution of the totalitarian state party army trilogy; full respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms of expression, assembly, religion, and education.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STUDDS. I continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The economic system which provides for the development of the private sector; institutionalization of the multiparty electoral system; free elections; freedom to organize unions; a modern productive process of the integral agrarian reform; administrative decentralization; general amnesty and pardon for political crimes and related crimes, and expulsion from the country of all foreign internationalists such as military advisers and troops.

In contrast, the government, which controls Nicaragua, and I assume in which the gentleman espouses hope and credence, is consistently violating the human rights of its own citizens, repressing its economy, imprisoning and executing its people.

Now, I just wonder how in the world can the gentleman give that wonderful speech and relate to us in eloquent terms a defense of his position, when this is the position of the Contras which was overlooked by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STUDDS. I would say to the gentleman that I was about to say "Without objection, so ordered," to that long list of unarguable things which he read.

No one could object to that. I would remind the gentleman that the Constitution of the Soviet Union reads somewhat the same. My reference was to the fact that the overwhelming majority of the military leadership of the Contras are former members of the Somoza national guard.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 mintues to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM].

Mr. MCCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, peace in Nicaragua is not enough. To preserve freedom and democracy in Central America and to protect our southern borders from terrorism in the future, the spread of Communist dictatorship in Central America must be stopped.

There is no question that the Sandinista movement must be fundamentally changed in order to obtain the goals that I just outlined. In order to stop that kind of aggressive tendency on the part of the Sandinistas as Marxist-Leninists and Communists intent on expansion and interventionism in their neighborhood countries next door we have to bring a certain amount of pressure. The question before us today is over what kind of pressure will be effective, and whether or not we should engage in military pressure indirectly through the Contras.

I rise today to support the military aid to the Contras as the only logical pressure to be brought to bear that is going to yield meaningful results in terms of fundamental change in the policies of the Sandinistas, and that is what it is all about. Economic pressure, political talk, dialog, all of the other simply is not going to make the movement that is necessary when you are dealing with hardcore Communist regimes, and that is what the Sandinista regime is.

I want to demonstrate that by quoting from one of the comandante's speeches in May of 1984. Comandante Arce, one of the nine member ruling directorate of the Sandinistas, gave a speech before the Nicaraguan Socialist Party which was recorded and reprinted a number of times. Just a couple of quotes will demonstrate what I am talking about.

In his speech he talks about the democratic principles that after their 1979 revolution the Sandinistas originally stated they were going to support. He says:

> Those principles were non-alignment abroad, a mixed economy, and political pluralism. With those three elements, we kept the international community from going along with American policy in Nicaragua.
>
> Of course, once defined in specific terms, this imposed certain commitments. One was that we said we were going to elect a constituent assembly, that we were going to have elections. While we might view those commitments as negative, if we analyze our revolution in black and white, we still consider them to be positive at this time. Of course, if we did not have the war situation imposed on us by the United States, the electoral problem would be totally out of place in terms of its usefulness. what a revolution really needs is the power to act. The power to act is precisely what constitutes the essence of the dictatorship of the proletariat—the ability of the [working] class to impose its will by using the means at hand [without] bourgeois formalities.
> For us, then, the elections, viewed from that perspective, are a nuisance, just as a number of things that make up the reality of our revolution are a nuisance.

□ 1440

He goes on to say, and I think this is exceedingly important, what Commandante Arce said last year:

> Imperialism asks three things of us: to abandon interventionism, to abandon our strategic ties with the Soviet Union and the socialist community, and to be democratic. We cannot cease being internationalists unless we cease being revolutionaries.
> We cannot discontinue strategic relationships unless we cease being revolutionaries. It is impossible even to consider this.

I submit to you the character of the Sandinistas in this regard is very clear. We have to treat them as we treat the Soviet Union. We have to treat them as we treat the PLO because they are allies of the PLO, and I know some of you do not believe that, but in 1966, when Cuba first became associated with Arafat, an arrangement was made for some training of Cuban troops by the Palestine Liberation Organization, and then in 1969, after a meeting in Mexico City, the PLO invited some of the Sandinistas over to be trained in Lebanon. At the same time they were over there being trained in terrorist tactics they participated in the war against Jordan and King Hussein, and actually some of them were participants in the highjacking of an El Al airliner. That relationship continues to this day, with Arafat toasting the Sandinistas in Managua and the fact that the PLO have an embassy of 70 personnel in Managua. This is testament to the fact that there is still a close relationship. In fact, the PLO have loaned over $12 million, and I did not think they had that kind of money, but they have loaned over $12 million in order to support the Sandinista cause.

I submit to my colleagues that what we need in this whole debate is some reasoned understanding that what we are dealing with, putting aside all the propaganda of good will that is trying to emanate out of Managua at this point in time, to play on our presses, to bring up the emotions of our people, to charge us up against the aid to the Contras, the fact is what we are dealing with in Managua today is not only a Marxist-Leninist regime; in polite terms it is a Soviet Communist satellite regime. We have to deal with it the same way that we would the Soviets, and that means with the kind of pressure they understand. It does not mean simply relying on talk that buys them time; time, if they get the time, to go forward with consolidation internally, denying more freedoms and opportunities for their people and preparing more opportunities for intervention and bringing down the Salvadoran regime of President Duarte that is the one true democracy in the hemisphere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida 1 additional minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCOLLUM. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, assuming that all of the charges the gentleman made about the Sandinistas are correct, and many of them I think are, about their Marxist orientation, I would like to know to what extent he wants to see the United States military effort participate. I think he was saying, from his statements, that he wants to go beyond the pressure point of the $14 million. Is he talking about $100 million? Is he talking about eventually a strategy of committing troops?

I would like to know what the gentleman's objective is.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, in my judgment, it does not take a lot of money to support the cause of bringing about pressure. It takes the continued existence of the Contras in a war movement to bring hurt to bear on the Nicaraguan Sandinistas. It does not require American military involvement.

What I want to avoid, and I think most of us who support the aid to the Contras want to avoid, is the eventuality that if in fact we do not see success, if we do not see the Sandinistas stop their interventionist policies, that some day, not in Nicaragua, but perhaps in Mexico at our borders, we will see American bloodshed, and I do not want to see that. That is the bottom line that concerns me.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE].

Mr. SAVAGE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am a bit disturbed and puzzled by some of the arguments that I hear from the other side. It seems to me that you propose doing pretty much the same with regard to Nicaragua as we did in the 1960s regarding Cuba and found it to be counterproductive.

We say that we deny economic aid to Nicaragua because they are moving toward the Soviet sphere. We arm counterrevolutionaries in that nation for the same reason. Well, if rebels are armed in that nation, do you not think that government must then have arms itself, and if we will not sell arms to them, they have to go somewhere else to get them? If those Contras go down into the farmlands and burn up the tractors, as I saw in visiting Nicaragua, and we will not sell them tractors, do you not think that is pushing them into the Soviet sphere? And yet we claim that that is the rationale for our policy, rather than the result.

It makes me think of the story about the teenager who murdered his parents, and then after being found guilty in court, pleaded for mercy on the basis that he was then an orphan. We are producing counter to what we propose.

And may I add, I am just as disturbed about the business of humanitarian aid. Any aid to the Contras promotes the violent overthrow of a duly elected government with which we are not at war, which violates many of our treaty obligations. A dollar is a dollar. If you came to me and you wanted to buy a hamburger and also a beer, and each cost $2 and you only had $2 in your pocket, and you walked up and said, "Gus, how about letting me have $2 so I can get a beer?" You are going to use yours to buy the hamburger. And if I am against alcohol, I might say, "No, I will not loan you $2 for a beer." I will loan you $2 for food or for something worthwhile," and you say, "OK, then loan me $2 to buy a hamburger." So I loan you $2 to buy a hamburger, which frees up your $2 to buy the beer and you end up with the hamburger and the beer. What difference does it make? A dollar is a dollar.

Aid to promote violence inside of a duly elected government is wrong. It is not for us to dictate to others. The elections in Nicaragua, in my estimation, were fairer than the elections in El Salvador, because I talked to a candidate who ran in the election in Nicaragua who was in favor of the Contras and did not mind saying so. You cannot find someone who ran against Duarte in El Salvador who would admit being in support of the guerrillas of El Salvador. Certainly the elections in Nicaragua were more fair than the elections in Guatemala because you never have had elections there at all. That country is ruled by brutal, military dictatorship.

So I wonder about the veracity of these arguments. Very soon the very people who are here today arguing about spending some money to overthrow another government will be arguing that we do not have a dime to spend to help provide postsecondary education for our children, that we do not have money to spend to help increase the cost of our seniors for Medicare. They will argue then that we do not have a dime, so we do not have to tax pensions and insurance annuities.

I think the problem here is that we have our values wrong. That is where the money needs to be spent, and if this country still insists on wanting to intervene in the internal affairs of some other nation in defense of democracy, why not Guatemala, a far better example than Nicaragua, but better still, why not in the most prominent example of fascism in the world today, the government of South Africa, where there is no question that democracy does not exist because by their own laws 75 percent of the population that is black is denied the right to vote.

I say not a dime to declare war and send our youth into Central America.

□ 1450

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, I have just recently completed a trip during which I was in Nicaragua for 4 days. I was able to visit the combat zone near Ocotal and Somoto. Some of the things I have learned were basically many of the things that have been repeated today.

Of the FDN, 46 of their 49 leaders are old Somoza National Guardsmen. Many of the peasants do not think too kindly of the FDN.

Second of all, there is no unification among this Contra organization. Many of them fight among themselves. They do not have a unified front, and they cannot be successful against this Sandinista regime.

Now, it is true the Sandinista regime is a Marxist-Leninist philosophy of government. But I think the question comes here as to the real issues, and I think there are basically three options.

The first one is, do we continue our present course of action to pressure the Nicaraguans economically through embargos and militarily through the Contras?

Second of all, do we negotiate to resolve our differences with Nicaragua diplomatically in concert with other countries in the region?

Or, finally, do we commit U.S. combat forces in a conventional war in Nicaragua?

I had the opportunity to question and meet with President Ortega, and I want to tell the Members something, he is pretty sharp. He will get on television and you can bring up all the atrocities that exist in Nicaragua and he will look you in the eye and say, "We are a nation at war, a war that has been brought about by American intervention, and when a nation is at war, I must do what I have to do to protect my people. You mine my harbors, you produce the CIA manual which attempts to assassinate and overthrow my government, and," he says, "you name me one time, Congressman, one time we have gone out of the borders of Nicaragua. Name me one time, because," he said, "We haven't."

And he said, "In the U.S.A., if I wear my fatigues, they call me Castro, and if I wear a three-piece suit and comb my hair, they call me Gorbachev." He says, "I am just protecting the good people of Nicaragua."

He is pretty good at selling, and he has public opinion on his side, because this world was upset and people everywhere were upset about the mining of those harbors. I was upset, and I was not in Congress. I think there should have been some indictments come down with that.

But here is the point I am trying to make: If we would take off the military support, he cannot have us as the whipping boys over there, and then those people, with their empty stomachs, those people who are upset with living conditions where poverty is so rampant, will attempt to overthrow any government, and the process from within is the one we must attempt to manifest now.

The military situation is going to continue to lead us down the line, and we cannot even have a military success. But now we have special forces in Honduras, and I have some suspicions about that. Are those special forces dealing with covet operations, really dealing with Hondurans? Or is there now an involvement with CIA that could be reaching into the Contra operation at a heavier pace than what has been reported to us?

I would just like to say that a government that becomes a power like the Sandinistas did by force has to govern by force, and they will be overthrown by force. But if they are overthrown right now, the government that will take power in Nicaragua will be another one just like it, and there is not going to be a settlement there with guns. There has to be a diplomatic resolve.

I am for humanitarian aid, but I would like to see us structure it a little differently. There is a tremendous health need there in that country, and I think our specific U.S. aid should be directed in a tangible measure to the Nicaraguan people, the average person, the people who can recognize and understand it and say "thank you" for it. And we should continue the pressure from within that country on the Nicaraguan Sandinista regime, because what they are doing is they are taking those people in the gray area and they are coming over to their side. Public opinion is on his side, and he is good at it.

So I just believe particularly that a military continuation is not only going to be the answer, it is going to commit us further into a military confrontation.

I would just like to add, after being there, that those conditions are very bad, and there are too many people there who do not like to see Americans. There is too much Yankee imperialist talk. And while it is not the best government—we know that; it is a Marxist-Leninist government—I think in our spirit of self-determination, somewhere along the way we have to project that to these other countries themselves. The self-determination for the future of their government is a very important issue, and I think it is one that is integral here.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my good friend, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I, too, rise in opposition to this resolution.

I am reminded, as I look back through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and as I listen to this debate, and as I listened to it last year and listened to the debate the year before, and as I read the newspapers, that there is a lot of similarity here to the MX. The MX has been, if you remember, couched in terms that "You can't pull the rug from under the President."

Well, now the President has come up with a last-minute bargaining proposal, and in order to get them to the table, "You can't pull the rug out from under me. You've got to vote $14 million."

But there is another similarity to the MX also. The similarity is this: In order to rationalize this, in order to explain it, we have gone through almost as many basing modes with the Contras as we have with the MX. I listened to the Members who supported this 2 years ago standing in this well and saying, "We are not out to overthrow any government, we are not out to subvert a government, we are out simply to stop the arms flow"—the alleged arms flow, to whatever extent it was—"from Nicaragua into El Salvador."

Now, the arms flow we were stopping was through Honduras and hundreds of miles then to the west. That was always a little controversial anyhow as to whether that existed, but let us assume for the moment that it did. That is all these folks wanted to do. They just simply wanted to put some pressure on at the border, and there were just a thousand or two of them.

But now we have shifted the rationalization. We are not stopping the arms flow anymore. What we are doing now, in the second stage, we are simply putting pressure on Managua. Well, we are not serious about it. Nobody is going to Managua. They say nobody is seriously going to affect the peasantry, but we are just putting pressure on. Now, finally, in the last summary we are making them say, "uncle." That sounds to me like we are trying to go to Managua.

So you can see that we are constantly shifting our focus. And to those who do not think there is an expansion going on, I refer them to the nonclassified sections of the report the President has submitted to this Congress, and I submit the New York Times analyses of the classified sections which say that the proposal is to increase in the north the Contra forces 20,000 to 25,000—that is up from 15,000—and to increase in the south 5,000 to 10,000. So definitely there is an escalation planned.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to make an argument for Daniel Ortega. This is not a referendum on Ortega. Quite frankly, I think it is a referendum on us. I think it is a referendum on what we say is acceptable behavior.

I do not agree with Ortega, I do not agree with the Sandianista government, I do not agree with the human rights violations, I do not agree with the military posture, I do not agree with the military posture incidentially in Chile, I do not agree with the human rights situation in Guatemala, I did not support it in Argentina, and so whether it is Ortega or whether it is Guatemala or Honduras or South Africa or whoever it is, you can just say that you are not participating and you are not going to condone that kind of activity.

A gentleman previously spoke about the metastasizing of communism through Central America. Yes, it may be, but I would like to suggest that what is metastasized is hunger and poverty and need and deprivation. And sometimes what you do, when you go out to fight Communists, so-called, you make them. And if I were a peasant and everytime I looked up to see who was causing me the harm, who was burning my village, who was shooting up my wedding party, who was making my brother lie down in a grave, as was depicted in Newsweek, and then cutting his throat, and I saw that person was armed and supplied by the United States, what would I think after a while? I would think that the United States was my enemy, and that maybe this fellow over here, who is a hustler for Fidel Castro or Ortega—name or call them what you will; put a name on them, they are exactly the same because he or she is a salesman—maybe that person will help me; at least they are not doing that to me and they are offering me something.

□ 1500

I think we ought to be offering something, too. I do not think it ought to be bullets. I think it ought to be ideas. I think it ought to be aid. I think it ought to be the kind of things this country has spoken for.

I guess the greatest insult I have heard during this whole discussion that has gone on across the country for months is this somehow likening the Contras to freedom fighters.

Mr. Chairman, on my right is George Washington. On my left is Lafayette. I do not rank them with the Nicaraguan Contras. I do not think they would have participated. I hope they would not have. Indeed, I know they would not have in the same kind of activity that we seem to have depicted. I do not think they would have stood for the same kinds of things that Somoza stood for and that some of those still active in the Contra movement have stood for.

So I guess what I am urging is that we say that we are not making this a referendum on Ortega. I am not here to defend or to stand up for him. I simply do not support those policies, but by the same token, I do not support those in many other areas, either. What I do think we have to look at is yes, you can fund the Contras all the way to Managua. Maybe they will get there, maybe they will not; but on the way there, they are going to kill a lot of people and those are the hearts and minds that I thought we were supposed to be winning.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of aid for the Contras who are fighting for freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of assembly in Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, last summer I headed a congressional delegation to visit Nicaragua and because of my experiences while there and my concerns about the Central American region generally, I would like to join my colleagues in commenting on the Nicaraguan situation today and urging support for the President's request for $14 million to aid Nicaraguan insurgents who are attempting to defeat the brutal Sandinista regime.

During my trip to Nicaragua I met with people on all sides of the political spectrum. Since my return I have followed developments in that country with intense interest and concern. The situation in Nicaragua concerns me because this country so closely linked to the Soviet Union and Cuba is so near to American shores and is thus a threat to the American people. My interest also stems from the conversations I had with the Nicaraguan people I met and their expression of hope for the possibility of a political solution over the problems that separate the United States and the current Nicaraguan Government.

My introduction to Nicaragua came through El Salvador. With the assistance of our colleagues Representatives TONY HALL, BOB MCEWEN, CHRISTOPHER SMITH, and DAN COATS, I coordinated a public/private partnership which provided 95 tons of humanitarian relief supplies to the displaced people of El Salvador.

In announcing the result of our efforts to solicit contributions from American companies, I said that the people of El Salvador—infants, children, women, and families—were both the real victims and the real future for El Salvador. What so often is lost in the headlines and reports on El Salvador reaching this country is the magnitude of the suffering and deprivation of the people of that struggling nation; fortunately the El Salvadorans now have a President who is pursuing reforms to rebuild their country and take the path that leads to democracy.

After meeting with people of all sides of the political spectrum in Nicaragua, I believe it can also be said that the people of that country are victims too and their case is also lost in the headlines. The Nicaraguans are victims because rights that were promised to them during the 1979 revolution are being systematically denied as seen by the abuses of human rights, censorship of the press and harassment of the church. Yet, the situation seems to go largely unnoticed and unreported by the press as personal liberties are denied; freedom of the press is almost nonexistent and the church is constantly harassed and threatened.

There are tremendous violations with the leftist regime in Nicaragua that took over with the promise of freedom. In fact, just the opposite has happened. For example, in his April 22, 1984, pastoral letter, Archbishop Obando y Bravo noted attempts to "defame legitimate pastors, censor the media, stifle new ideas, the disregard for moral and religious ideas and the lack of respect for human dignity." The letter also urged in a straightforward and nonpartisan manner that everyone should participate in a constructive dialog.

All Nicaraguans inside and outside the country must participate in this dialogue, regardless of class or partisan belief. Furthermore, we think that Nicaraguans who have taken up arms against the Government must also participate in this dialogue. If not, there will be no possibility of a settlement and our people, especially the poorest among them, will continue to suffer and die.

His words to me were equally telling: "A major part of the people are unhappy but they are also afraid * * * we are fighting a monster that includes the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, and Cuba * * * and this revolution could spread to Mexico or other parts of the Hemisphere." He also noted that since the Government controls the media, its propaganda and facade of fairness and spirituality incorporated in the Government structure mislead observers outside the country.

Another example Lic. Pedro J. Chamorro, the editor at that time of La Prensa, which is the only vestige remaining of a free newspaper: He had defied the Government by refusing to include propaganda in this newspaper. The Government already censors La Prensa. He also told of being awakened to a machinegun going off at the opposite end of the phone to frighten him and of moving his family to Costa Rica to avoid episodes like the one when a mob defaced his home and demonstrated outside.

Another story was related to me about a church group whose office was ransacked and the office employees attacked by unidentified armed individuals believed to be members of state security. This individual said: "The biggest crime in Nicaragua is to tell a foreigner what is really happening. If you tell anyone, you will commit treason."

He also offered this observation: "Everything that is Christian is considered the enemy." This same young man also told of young people being forced to join the Army and sent to fight untrained in order that the Government will have hundreds of martyrs and of a teaching situation that does not permit students to argue against professors. In an attempt to disguise the fact that religious persecution exists he also told us the Government has created a special office to talk to and mislead outside visitors.

These allegations were substantiated by others whom I met. Another man told of a movie house that was emptied midway through the movie and the young men were taken away to join the Army, a person who was handing out bulletins with human rights violations was jailed for 2 months, a man's wife was tricked into wearing a prison gown to visit her husband while he was then told she too had been jailed causing him to submit to Government pressure.

"In a systematic way, they've gone about instituting a Marxist regime," one man said. "Nicaragua is divided into three groups—those who have left, those getting ready to leave, and those who will leave on or about November 4—election day, 1984—when the Sandinistas reelect themselves."

Aid to the Contras would ensure the continuance of the only existing pressure on the Sandinista government. I am pleased that we are considering some aid to the Contras and I urge my colleagues to support the President's request for $14 million to aid the Contras. The President has made it clear that if the Sandinistas agree to a cease-fire and church-supervised peace talks to produce a new election, the aid money would be used to buy food, medical supplies, and clothing for the insurgents. I would welcome this development and I believe this aid package would create incentives for dialog and peace, a goal to which we all can strive to achieve. I urge my colleagues in the House to support the President's proposal.

To lend further support to the case for aid to the Contras I would like to include an article by George Will, which appeared in the Washington Post on April 21:

FOR THE PRESIDENT, A SHATTERING DEFEAT

This is the most important congressional moment since May 1947, when Congress supported U.S. intervention-through-aid on the anticommunist side in the Greek civil war. Congress thereby transformed containment from a theory into a policy.

Congress has now effectively killed aid for the anticommunist side in Nicaragua's civil war. Congress has forbidden even modest financial support for the military effort of a mass movement prepared to do the dying to prevent consolidation of the second Soviet satellite in this hemisphere and the first on the North American continent. The evisceration of containment is complete.

What President Reagan's aides are calling a compromise (aid restricted to nonmilitary uses) is a shattering defeat. He sought military support for a military movement and lost, utterly. On an issue he characterized—correctly—in the starkest moral and national security terms, his characterization was disproportionate to his effort. He did not go to the country on television. A great communicator does not deal exclusively in good news (it is time for a tax cut; America is back and standing tall). He also rallies majorities for hard decisions. Reagan has chosen to hoard his political capital—for what? The great battle over Amtrak subsidies?

In 1947 President Truman told Congress: "I believe it must be the policy of the United States to support free people who are resisting subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressure." Reagan's policy was—the past tense is required—the Truman Doctrine after 38 years of communist advance. An armed Nicaraguan minority, sustained by outside (Soviet, Cuban, East German, etc.) forces, is sovietizing Nicaragua in the way that was being done in Europe in 1947.

The Soviet Union's Sandinista clients have no more right to rule Nicaragua than Vidkun Quisling had to rule Norway. Yet the world continues to speak of Sandinista steps toward Stalinism as "failings." The Sandinistas are not somehow failing to implement democracy; those "failings" are premeditated successes.

FDR spoke of "quarantining" dictators, but an isolationist Congress resisted, until the big war arrived. Now that today's Congress has essentially spurned the contras, communist dictators on four continents will know that Congress will not permit even small inoculations, let alone quarantine.

The sum involved—$14 million—is 12 percent of the sum ($117 million) the U.S. government had given to the Sandinista regime by 1981. Familiar voices are saying the usual things: that the United States "drove" the Sandinistas into Soviet clutches. But in their first two years, the Sandinistas received more aid from the United States than from any other country—five times more than the Somoza regime received in its last two years. (Someone should calculate the value in 1985 dollars of the aid France gave the American Revolution. It was, I will wager, much more than $14 million.)

During the Vietnam war, people eager to believe were encouraged by Hanoi to believe that South Vietnam was experiencing an "indigenous peasant revolt" and that the ferment in Indochina was only cosmetically communist. The Sandinistas deny their American protectors the comfort of that pretense. The Sandinistas do not deign to disguise their Stalinism at home, their "socialist solidarity" with the Soviet Union and its other clients, their "revolution without borders" against neighbors.

In 1947 Congress had fresh memories of the terrible price paid because of nonresistance to Hitler at the time of the remilitarization of the Rhineland. Today the historical memory of many members of Congress consists entirely of Vietnam and its putative lessons. But congressional management of U.S. policy toward Central America—too little aid, too late; pursuit of the chimera of negotiated settlement with a regime that does not believe in splitting differences—is a recipe for another Vietnam; another protracted failure.

Surely the Americans who should talk least about negotiated liberalization of the Sandinista regime are those Americans who, by trying to destroy the contras, are removing the only serious pressure on the Sandinistas.

Nicaragua's communist president, writing in The New York Times, says U.S. support for the contras is "contrary to American values." That is an odd complaint from someone who proclaims his detestation of American values, and it is an ignorant charge, given the long history of U.S. support for resistance to tyranny.

Mikhail Gorbachev hit the ground running—right at Pakistan, threatening reprisals if Pakistan continues to facilitate aid for the Afghan resistance. Now that Congress has spurned the contras, how long will Pakistan resist Soviet pressure? Now that Congress will not countenance support for the contras, the increasingly tiny voice of the United States will have decreased resonance in South Africa, the Philippines and other places where freedom is at issue.

It is said that an optimist is someone who believes his future is uncertain. Optimism about democracy, and not just democracy in Central America, is irrational now that, six months after a landslide reaffirmation of a president, Congress, acting in the name of fastidiousness, has removed the keystone of his foreign policy: support for democratic revolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman for the purpose of a question.

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would stop referring to the gentlemen on the other side, because there are Members on his side that are going to be voting against this resolution. Let us try to be bipartisan in approaching this problem.

I would caution the gentleman that the bipartisan alternative is sponsored by Mr. BARNES. Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. JONES, Mr. FISH, Mr. LEACH, and Mr. ZSCHAU.

I think another point the gentleman is making is that there is Sandinista-Soviet-Cuban connection. We know that, and the gentleman should not be repetitive. I think most of the speakers here have conceded that Marxist tie.

The question I want to ask the gentleman, if that is the case and if we agree on our objectives of national security, promotion for the United States and peace in the region, is the $14 million that even our General Gorman says will not do anything militarily, is that the way we are going to achieve peace?

One of the arguments we heard today in support of U.S. aid to the Contras is that the Nicaraguan regime is antidemocratic and a source of subversion in the hemisphere. Some of my colleagues move from this premise to the conclusion that we ought to be supporting the Nicaraguan insurgents, based in Honduras and Costa Rica, in order to place pressure on the Nicaraguan Government to mend their ways. A more extreme conclusion is drawn by other colleagues that we cannot in any way coexist with the Sandinistas, and that they must in some way be removed from power. If not we will have the Communists in our front yard.

I think there is bipartisan agreement that the Sandinistas have committed human rights violations and continue to consolidate power under a single party. These violations are well documented by private sources, as well as Amnesty International and State Department documents. If there is one oversight that many well-meaning Americans have after visiting Nicaragua, it is that the Sandinistas can do no wrong. Let them read the detailed reports of the forced relocations of the indiginous peoples; the intimidation, the burning of homes, and in some cases executions. But it is wrong, Mr. Speaker, to simply ignore the testimony of constituents in many of our districts as coming from leftists, "little nuns" and "idiots." It is a desperate logic which seeks to reduce an argument by attacking the character of the person holding the argument. Private testimonies have added to reports of gross violations of human rights by the Contra forces. I wonder why some of those who cry out on behalf of democracy in Nicaragua are not as ready to condemn the Contra abuses, as well as human rights violations in Chile, South Africa, and other countries.

If so many Americans are convinced that we should not be funding the Contras, this does not mean our constituents are "little nuns" or gullible "idiots." I reject the tone and nature of such arguments. In fact, many Americans have taken a great interest in this issue. After reflection and observation they have come out against a military solution to a problem we ought to be working out by supporting the Contadora initiatives and resuming bilateral talks with the Nicaraguan Government.

Humanitarian aid sent through two highly respected organizations, the UNHCR and the International Red Cross, will help alleviate some of the suffering of the casualties in this conflict. Some financial support for the Contadora process will demonstrate that we promote Latin American initiatives and solutions to regional conflicts. Meanwhile we can prevent a disaster—funding the escalation of violence, an escalation, Mr. Chairman that could lead to a direct U.S. intervention in Central America.

I do not think any Member would hesitate to support whatever measures are necessary to ensure the national security of the United States. But it is not in our interest to promote the escalation of hostilities prior to exploring all diplomatic alternatives and economic pressures. It is not in our interest to circumvent the Contadora process. The Contra war has not brought Nicaragua closer to pluralism; It has provided an occasion for Nicaragua to dig bomb shelters throughout the country, arm local militias, and militarize the economy. We will not find out if there is room for a peaceful solution to conflict in this region by supporting a military solution. We do know that just this weekend a limited agreement was reached between the Misurasata Indian organizations and the Nicaraguan Government which holds great promise for a negotiated settlement to the conflicts on the eastern coast of Nicaragua. Let's explore and promote such negotiations and not contribute to their destruction.

Mr. WOLF. Our commanders have not said that.

No. 1, that is not the only way to achieve peace. I think negotiations are very important, but it is an important ingredient of achieving peace. Negotiations without force will be meaningless.

The reason I refer to the gentleman's side of the aisle is I think that is where we have the opportunity for good, decent, and honest people to honestly consider this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I think the statements that have been made by the last several Members on the Democrat side of the aisle have pointed out the biggest flaw in their argument.

The question arises very simply when they talk about political and economic aid and giving ideas to the Contras and giving ideas instead of weapons.

Is there a single time in this century when an American economic or political plan has stood up to Soviet tanks? If you answer that question, then you can predict the success of the so-called alternatives that the gentleman has talked about.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman makes a very good point. Negotiations are important, but we need the force with these negotiations and with that force and with this $14 million, we can bring about peace, freedom and the right of religious freedom and assembly and freedom of speech in Nicaragua. I think that is what we all want. So let us vote for that $14 million.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARKEY].

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Chairman, Nicaragua has two problems, poverty and war. Additional funding to the Contras is not going to help solve either problem.

Last week I went to Nicaragua and took a 6-hour drive north of Managua up to Jinotega, where the resettlement camps are beginning to be constructed. Hundreds, thousands of people are planned to be herded into these resettlement camps over the next year or two.

As you talk to these villagers, one thing becomes clear. The do not care whether the Sandinistas win or the Contras win. As you go from person to person and ask them, they do not even know who Ronald Reagan is. All they know is that there is a war in their countryside, their God-forsaken countryside, which is ripping their young men out of their homes as the Sandinistas draft them into their army or the Contras come through at night and try to conscript them into their forces. War is ruining these families, dislocating the entire countryside and, in fact, making it impossible for a country, which with Honduras, with the exception of Haiti, is in the worst economic situation in the Western Hemisphere, to keep its people out of poverty.

I have become convinced that the almost guaranteed result of additional war, additional fighting in this region will be that we will antagonize, radicalize, Vietnamize, and ultimately communize this country as we will in any other country that we seek to use military muscle as the basis for solving of problems.

These people want peace and it is clear that the only way that this war continues is by the continued American support for the Contras. Let us get down and admit it, 15,000 Contras cannot overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. It is not going to happen.

Although we would like it to be so, all evidence to the contrary indicates that the longer this war continues, that the more justification this government has for restrictions of freedom of the press and speech and the criminal justice system, and for the importation of Soviet and Cuban advisers. In fact, there has been an escalation of this kind of conduct over the past 4 years almost in direct response to the commitment which we have made to the Contras.

There has been a disproportionate commitment made to their military budget over the last 4 years, almost a direct result of, in fact, their need to beat back any attempts to, in fact, have a military overthrow in their country.

If we were, in fact, serious about bringing peace to this region, we could not have constructed a more systematic undermining of a long-term peaceful solution to the problems of this region. But what we now see is in fact, as General Gorman has stated, an impossibility of a military overthrow and at the same time an exacerbation of the military and militarization of the society in which we should be seeking to bring a peaceful solution.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARKEY. Let me finish my opening statement and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

The Sandinistas are no angels. We will stipulate that at the outset.

But funding the covert war in Nicaragua is not going to soften the hard liners inside the Sandinista movement. That war has been going on for years, and it has hardened and radicalized the positions in the region.

I talked to an opposition leader in Honduras last week. He said to me that the United States is using Honduras in an attempt to destabilize Nicaragua. But what may well really happen is that instead of destabilizing Nicaragua we are going to wind up destabilizing Honduras because of the tremendous military buildup inside of the country.

The Reagan administration is trying to prevent another Cuba in Nicaragua. But we are in fact creating another Cuba in Nicaragua by forcing them to become more and more dependent upon Soviet and Cuban aid in order to beat back the Contra attempts to overthrow their Contra war.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARKEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. The gentleman has said our policy is going to lead to the communization of the region. That is the gentleman's word, not mine. We have provided a justification for the continuing repression by the Sandinista Government, that our policy is leading to the destabilization of Honduras.

I just want to make sure I understand. Is the gentleman saying that the primary source of problems in Central America is the United States?

Mr. MARKEY. The primary source of the problem in Central America is poverty, injustice, hunger, lack of commitment to the real underlying concerns.

I will reclaim my time. I reclaim my time.

The underlying problems in that region are that. Rather than addressing those problems, we have decided, as we have over the past 5 years in that region, to continue to try to find a military solution to a problem which is ultimately social and economic in cause. And in fact, as a result, exacerbating a problem which could have been alleviated if in fact we had tried to build an umbilical cord of economic and social relationships between our country and the Contadora countries, and a small poverty stricken country which cannot in any manner, shape or form expect the Soviet Union, 5,000 miles away, to serve as their long-term economic relief.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8½ minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleagues on the other side of the aisle whether they realize that the position they are taking on this issue flies in the face of Democratic leadership from FDR to Harry Truman to Hubert Humphrey to John F. Kennedy to Henry Jackson to Zbigniew Brezezinski.

I would like to go back to statements John F. Kennedy made at the time of the Cuban crisis in 1961. He states:

* * * it is clear that the forces of communism are not to be underestimated, in Cuba or anywhere else in the world. The advantages of a police state—its use of mass terror and arrests to prevent the spread of free dissent—cannot be overlooked by those who expect the fall of every fanatic tyrant. If the self discipline of the free cannot match the iron discipline of the mailed fist—in economic, political, scientific, and all the other kinds of struggles as well as the military—then the peril to freedom will continue to rise.

Does not that same statement apply today?

He went on to say:

The evidence is clear and the hour is late. We and our Latin friends will have to face the fact that we cannot postpone any longer the real issue of survival of freedom in this hemisphere itself. On that issue, unlike some others, there can be no middle ground.

In 1947 another Democrat, President Harry Truman, told the Congress:

I believe it must be the policy of the United States to support free people who are resisting subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressure.

Yes, the dictatorship in Nicaragua is controlled by an armed minority that involves a few Nicaraguans at the top, thousands of Soviet and Cuban advisers, and a litany of what Jeane Kirkpatrick, up until recently, I might add, a well-known Democrat, calls the Soviet International Fighting Force.

Michael Novak, another Democrat, in a recent letter to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] closes by saying:

That is why I urge you and your colleagues to proceed with the most clear eyed realism. To my mind, it is indispensible that the power of the democratic forces seeking a democratic, non-Marxist Nicaragua be kept as strong as possible. Indeed, they should be encouraged to grow as powerful as the people of Nicaragua desire.

The false test is to wait to see how far the Sandinistas, unchecked, will go. The proper test is to see how strong the revolution against Sandinismo can grow. The latter is the proper course for those whose priority is liberty. Our own Revolution in the U.S. could not have been successful without outside assistance from France, Poland, and elsewhere. One should always bet on liberty.

I would like to quote some recent remarks from the last debate we had on this very issue by another well-known figure in the Democratic Party, the majority leader, who aspires to be Speaker of the House. On the situation in Nicaragua he stated:

There is no question that the Sandinistas have very nearly completed a transition to a police state in Nicaragua. They have installed in each city residential block an informer whose official responsibility is to report to the government whenever there are meetings of as many as four or five people gathering in any home—reminiscent of Hitler's Nazi Germany.

On the threat that Nicaragua poses to its neighbors the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] went on to say:

I do not think there is any question that they pose a threat to their neighbors, not only to those neighbors into whose territory they have sent armed guerrillas. Also that threat is felt in Costa Rica and Panama.

* * * in Costa Rica they have tried to create general strikes. They have been unsuccessful because of the popularity of the Costa Rican democracy and the Costa Rican leaders. Nevertheless, such attempts are being made.

On Central American hesitation for publicly closer relations with the United States, the words of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] are telling. "One national leader . . . whose identity will evoke real credibility with you, said a very revealing thing to me in private, in answer to a question. He said the reason leaders in Latin America are loathe to cozy up very closely in public to the United States and publicly to endorse our policies is because of our habit, he said, of abandoning those who have been our best friends." I repeat, "* * * abandoning those who have been our best friends."

□ 1520

Zbigniew Brzezinski says, in a recent newspaper article:

These policies are logical extensions of those the Carter administration was beginning to adopt in its last few months in office. They include plans for social and economic development and aid for the anti-Sandinista resistance as well as pressure on Managua for pluralism and democratic reform.

Another democrat with a small "d" respected here in the Congress, Jose Napolean Duarte, said about the President's initiative: In a recent letter to President Reagan:

Your initiative and approach have my complete support and I strongly urge all of the friends of Central America in your Congress to give it their full backing. It is the right step at the right time in our quest for peace and democracy in this region.

While House democratic leadership seeks to pull the rug out from under our assistance to democratic forces in Nicaragua, Fidel Castro continues his support for armed insurrection in Central and South America. According to a recent article in the Washington Times, Roger Fontaine stated that "Fidel Castro's top intelligence operation officer recently made clear that Cuba would continue its aid to Salvadoran Marxist guerrillas and other insurgent forces in Latin America."

Thus, under pressure from democratic leadership, the United States curtails its support, pulls the rug out from the democrats, small "d", fighting in Nicaragua while Castro goes on supporting so-called revolution.

Certainly this is not the democratic leadership of FDR, Truman, Kennedy, and Humphrey. Recently there has been a nationwide debate over the future of the Democratic Party. Mr. ASPIN, the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee of this House, said that "Democrats need to cease to be naysayers on defense issues."

Arizona Governor Babbitt talked recently about Democrats shifting toward the center. The issue of aiding democratic resistance in Central America is a major test of the Democrats' actions not just words in their effort to shift back into the center. This issue will have a chilling effect if the House democratic leadership has its way; it will have a chilling effect on the more conservative and moderate democratic efforts to move their party back into the center.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds. I will tell the gentleman who just left the well that the Democrats do remember the Gulf of Tonkin resolution and that is why we oppose the resolution before us, House Joint Resolution 239. This joint resolution approves military assistance only and has nothing to do with humanitarian assistance. We should not supply arms to the Contras and encourage armed conflict in the area.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I am putting in the RECORD the letter that all of us were sent by over half of America's living Nobel laureates urging this body to turn down the aid to the Contras. I think it is a very, very important letter; it is one of the most elite and distinguished and intelligent groups this country has produced. I certainly hope that everybody reads it. I know you all have copies in your office.

I also hope the people look at the bipartisan alternative which I think is the way that we should be going. We should be trying much harder to go back to our tradition of a bipartisan foreign policy.

Now what can be said here that is new? I'm trying to respond to the debate rather than just give a standard speech.

What I have heard from Members over and over again is they keep citing Democrats and keep saying today's Democrats have not learned from them.

Well, let me tell you, I think these Members have their history wrong. We Democrats did learn something. We learned something under Kennedy, and because we Americans tend to be so poor in history let me refresh your memory.

Under Kennedy we had two things that went on in Latin America. One happened to be very successful and one happened to be an absolute disaster. We only tend to remember the disaster.

The disaster was the Bay of Pigs. The Bay of Pigs was analogous to what we are being asked to do in Nicaragua by funding the Contras. Because the Bay of Pigs policy failed, Cuba has been a real thorn in the side of the hemisphere ever since.

Where was the success? Maybe I am a dinosaur, but I remember when I was in college in the early 1960's people were afraid that the Castro-type revolution was going to be exported all over Latin America. Remember the people that we saw in our news magazines in the 1960's that we were all taught to be very fearful of, and rightfully so. They were Che Guevarra and others of that type who had been trained by Castro and were actively working in Latin America trying very hard to overturn governments.

Colombia happened to be one of the countries they wanted the worst. La Violencia was the guerrilla group working in that country and was doing an absolutely excellent job of trying to subvert the Government. I remember this and I remember this very well because I was in law school with many students from Colombia. One of the days that sticks in my mind the most was going over for breakfast one morning and one of my friends, a Colombia student was reading a letter from home saying "I don't think I can go back home." The reason was the letter was from a friend of his in the Department of Agriculture in Colombia.

La Violencia had approached him and asking him to do certain illegal things and the friend had rightfully said, "No." Nevertheless, the guerrillas had their own way of handling it. They had kidnapped the man's young daughter, 5 years old, cut off both her hands and when he went to work the next morning she was sitting outside his office with a note pinned to her saying, "Next time you will do what we say. La Violencia."

The guerrillas were a real force in Latin America in the 1960's. They had taken over the taxicabs in many of the urban cores, which was a very effective strategy; and there were many, very many dangerous things going on. In the 1960's there was concern in America, for those of you who have forgotten, that all of Latin America could have gone the way Cuba went. Instead, Kennedy, to his credit, learned something from his Bay of Pigs policy and approached the rest of Latin America differently. He formed the Alliance for Progress and he sent the Peace Corps into Colombia and Latin America, not the Marines.

By changing the approach, Kennedy turned the situation around. The United States beat the guerrillas by building roads, by building schools, by educating people, by teaching people to form cooperatives, by teaching people how to get coffee beans to market and on and on and on.

I think what is going on in Central America today is terribly analogous to Latin America in the 1960's. Please, let us look at the historical precedent we tend to forget, but the one that worked. If you look at what is going on in Central America today you find poverty, poverty, poverty, poverty; you find a long history and really no experience with democratic traditions. We tend to call them banana republics up here. I must say that I have toured Central America. I have not seen anything that looks like a republic except for maybe Costa Rica. They are not republics as we know them north of the Rio Grande.

Let us look at the root causes, let us look at the poverty, let us look at the history, let us not do the wrong thing and let us look at what our Nobel laureates are pleading with us to do and vote "no" on this resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I believe the resolution before Congress demands that we know what the issue is, and what the issue is not.

It is not whether some rebels fighting the Communist regime in Managua have committed some atrocities. I am sure that, as with every guerrilla war, some atrocities have been committed on both sides—and I deplore and condemn them. But, that is not the issue.

Nor is the issue whether to send American combat troops. Nobody here is suggesting that. Giving arms is not sending American combat troops.

Nor is the issue whether we can afford the $14 million. For a nation that spends many times that on one missile, that certainly is not the issue.

Then, what is the issue?

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the issue is simply this: In a contest between a Communist regime and forces that seek a more deomcratic form of government will we choose to support the Communist regime, stay neutral, or support the democratic resistance?

On the one side is a regime led by avowed Marxist-Leninists. This regime promised fair and open elections; yet junta member Bayardo Arce himself admits that the elections were a propaganda ploy and that the Communist Sandinistas had no intention of handing over power to their opponents. This regime promised political pluralism; yet the Army, the militia, and the police are the private property of the ruling political party. This regime promised to remain nonaligned; yet in addition to inviting some 10,000 Cuban, East German, Bulgarian, and Soviet advisers to help run things, the Communist Sandinistas receive some $300 million per year in aid from the Soviet bloc, aid which they have used to arm the largest and best-equipped army in Central America.

To what sort of a Nicaragua do the Communist Sandinistas aspire? They have sought to disrupt and to intimidate independent labor unions and to replace them with such party-controlled unions as exist in the Soviet Union—run by Communist stooges. They have set up a nationwide network of neighborhood defense committees modeled after the Orwellian spy system of their Cuban mentors. They have so restricted the freedom of the press that today the one independent newspaper must submit its stories to a censor. They have used the resources of the state to advance the interests of their favored side in a controversy within the Catholic Church. Finally, they have categorically refused to engage in any negotiations toward national reconciliation.

On the other side of this choice are the groups which espouse democratic ideals and economic opportunity. These groups are led by individuals who for the most part helped to lead the democratic opposition to the Somoza regime—and without whose cooperation Somoza would never have been overthrown. Many of these individuals were prominent in the government of National Reconstruction—until the Communist Sandinistas stages a de facto coup d'etat.

Mr. Chairman, in this struggle between these two sides we cannot just remain above it all and sprinkle food and medicine on both sides or sprinkle our dollars around among other neutral mediating countries.

We must choose. In this contest between those who seek Communist rule and those who aspire to democracy and economic opportunity, we must choose the latter.

This issue and choice, Mr. Chairman, will not go away. The struggle in Nicaragua will go on. And so will the struggle for democracy in other places. The United States must always take the side of those who share our ideals. That does not mean that we need to send American troops or that those who we help will be perfect. But, I believe it does mean that we should help those who are trying to help themselves.

If we do not choose we must answer the question posed to me by the leader of one of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance groups, the famous Commander Zero, Eden Patora: "Why is it," he asked me, "that when I fight Somoza I am a hero in the United States, but when I fight the Communists, nobody cares?"

□ 1530

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, we are here today to debate the question of whether or not to authorize funds to support the Nicaraguan Contras. What is at stake here, however, is not merely the immediate question of whether or not the U.S. Government should allocate a certain amount of money for a particular purpose. What is at stake is something more important. That is: What is the direction of U.S. Central America policy to be? Will it be to go down the path of greater and greater dependence on military power in an attempt to force a solution to the conflicts in the region? Or will we reject that path, as well we should, and give peace and diplomacy a chance?

Mr. Chairman, on April 3, President Reagan, as required by the 1985 continuing resolution, submitted to Congress a report requesting release of $14 million for military operations in Nicaragua. At the same time this request was submitted, the President announced a so-called peace plan, which proposed a cease-fire between the Contras and the Nicaraguan Government, and church-sponsored negotiations between the two parties. Under the President's plan, the $14 million in U.S. aid for the Contras could only be used for "humanitarian" purposes, such as buying food and medicine, for 60 days. If the Sandinista government of Nicaragua was not negotiating with the Contras at the end of 60 days, the U.S. funds could be used for military purposes.

The President's plan has been characterized as an apple with razors, and that is indeed what it is. This proposal offers much to the Contras, but little real measures to obtain peace. If the Sandinistas do not accept this plan, then the United States could resume military aid to the Contras. If they do accept it but don't reach agreement with the Contras within 60 days, then the Contras can refuse to prolong the negotiations, and the United States would be able to resume military aid to them. Under the guise of offering an olive branch, President Reagan is clearly attempting to legitimize military aid to the Contras. This amounts to an effort on the part of the Reagan administration to obtain congressional approval indirectly for what Congress has indicated three times it would not approve directly, for even if the $14 million were used for humanitarian purposes, this U.S. contribution would free up other Contra funds for military purposes.

Around this time last year—on April 12, 1984, to be exact—this body was debating a resolution expressing the sense of Congress that no appropriated funds shall be used for the purpose of mining the ports or territorial waters of Nicaragua. That vote was important because it was thought that how Congress voted would determine whether we chose blindly to accompany the Reagan administration down its path to war in Central America, or whether we chose to put the brakes on a dangerous and misguided policy. The resolution carried overwhelmingly.

During debate in the other body last April on providing military assistance to the Contras in Nicaragua, it was repeatedly assured that the Contras were not engaged in efforts to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. The other body was repeatedly told that the Contras were not conducting a war to destroy the economic infrastructure of that country. President Reagan himself sent a letter to the other body assuring it that the United States did 'not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there."

Yet, last April, two disturbing reports appeared in the newspapers about possible future administration action regarding Central America. On April 8, 1984, the New York Times ran a story, "U.S. Said to Draw Latin Troops Plan." The lead sentence said:

Senior officials in the Reagan administration say that contingency plans are being drawn for the possible use of U.S. combat troops in Central America if the current strategy for defeating leftist forces in the region fails.

And on April 10, 1984, a Washington Post headline read, "CIA Views Minelaying Part of Covert 'Holding Action'." The first line read:

The CIA views its involvement in the laying of mines in ports off Nicaragua as part of a holding action until its covert war against that country's leftist Sandinista government can be stepped up if President Reagan wins reelection, according to senior administration officials.

The contents of these stories were repudiated in an April 10, 1984, White House statement. But what are we to believe with respect to White House policy on Central America? President Reagan himself has described the Contras, who are armed insurgents who seek to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, as "freedom fighters" and the "moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers." He has characterized Nicaragua as a "totalitarian dungeon" where a "Communist reign of terror prevails," and has all but called for the overthrow of the Sandinista government. In order to help the Contras achieve that goal, some 2,000 copies of a manual, "Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare," was prepared and distributed by the CIA to the Contras. Among other things, the manual instructs on the "selective use of violence" and, among other things, explains how "to neutralize carefully selected and planned targets."

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman many violations of human rights by the Contras have surfaced. While some Contra leaders have undoubtedly behaved properly, respected human rights groups have chronicled a terribly disturbing pattern of attacks on civilian targets resulting in the killing of unarmed men, women, children, and the elderly; premeditated acts of brutality including rape, beatings, mutilation, and torture; kidnaping of civilians; assaults on economic and social targets, intimidation of civilians; and kidnaping, intimidation, and even murder of religious leaders who support the government.

Two attorneys of a fact-finding delegation wrote:

To the extent that it is reasonably forseeable that—the Contras—will continue to engage in such acts, any provision of aid to the Contras, directly or indirectly, by the Government of the United States would render our Government responsible for their act.

Mr. Chairman, there is much to criticize about the Sandinista regime. To put it mildly, it has proven to be a great disappointment to those of us who were willing to give it a fair chance. Its abuses include restrictions on religion, speech, press, and assembly; the establishment of special courts outside the regular judiciary system that politicizes the administration of justice; the mistreatment of prisoners; incommunicado detention; the failure to acknowledge arrests leading to the disappearance of some of those arrested; and the horrible mistreatment of its Indian minority. But giving $14 million to the Contras will do nothing to bring about needed reforms by the government in power. In fact, such a military threat will have the opposite effect, will entrench them further, and will drive the Sandinistas into more and more dependency on Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Chairman, the path of the Reagan administration's Central America policy is littered with the debris of a misguided endeavor. At the heart of this flawed policy is the administration's failure to understand the underlying causes of the problems and conflicts in the region and to pursue a peaceful resolution of them. Surely there is no responsible Member of this body, indeed no responsible American citizen, who wants to see Communist dictatorships in Central America, or anywhere else for that matter. We all want democracies in that region.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, perhaps one of the greatest tragedies of this President's policy is that in the name of a rigid anticommunism, this President has perhaps become Fidel Castro's and the Soviet Union's best ally in Latin America. In trying to forcefully wrench the Nicaraguan Government from the grips of Marxist-Leninist ideology, he appears to be driving them right into the arms of those who espouse that very ideology. This is a tragedy, for no democratic country or citizen in the Western Hemisphere has benefited from this misguided effort.

A mechanism exists, however, for a peaceful resolution of the conflicts, but it is one that has been undermined by the Reagan administration. It is the Contadora process. The Contadora nations—Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela—have long been seeking a basis for peaceful settlement of the fighting in Nicaragua and elsewhere in Central America. How little interest this administration has in the Contadora process is evidenced by the fact that they did not even consult with the Contadora group before announcement of the proposal we are debating today.

A bipartisan alternative to the President's propoal, the Hamilton-Barnes substitute, will be voted on tomorrow. Based upon progress being made toward peace and democracy, it continues in effect the prohibition on funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua without regard to fiscal year until Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition. It does, however, provide $4 million for expenses arising from the implementation of a Contadora agreement, such as expenses for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

In addition, $10 million is provided for humanitarian assistance for refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they are associated with the Contras. This assistance may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees upon the determination of such organization that the assistance is necessary for humanitarian purposes, and may not be provided for provisioning combat units. It also provides that the President must report to Congress every 3 months on the progress made in achieving the objectives of the resolution and on any expenditure of funds under the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I support this compromise because its goal is peace, arrived at peacefully through the 21 Contadora principles. It provides for a congressional role in determining whether progress is made toward peace and democracy in Nicaragua, and explicitly states that that determination will be made within the context of a regional settlement.

It is reassuring to me that the $10 million in humanitarian aid would be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. These are organizations with established reputations, and there is reasonable assurance that this money would be used for humanitarian aid and nothing else.

Mr. Chairman, the Reagan administration's Central America policy is based on increasing militarization and force. Make no mistake about it: It is up to this body to stop this dangerous drift into direct military involvement in the region, for that is indeed where this administration is leading us. In response to the question of what is the direction of U.S. Central America policy to be, we must state clearly and strongly that it is in the direction of searching for a peaceful settlement to the conflicts and problems in the region. It is the only rational policy to endorse. Any other is fraught with danger for this country and this hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, our President has become fond of quoting President Franklin D. Roosevelt. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, one of the greatest and most authentic freedom fighters of this century, put it this way: "More than an end to war, we want an end to the beginnings of all wars." Rejecting the President's proposal on Central America, on the Nicaraguan Contras, will help achieve that goal on this vital issue.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO].

Mr. GALLO. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I had the opportunity just 2 short weeks ago to visit—along with a colleague of mine, DAN BURTON from Indiana—Guatemala, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. I would like to just focus in on Nicaragua itself, because I think El Salvador, although it has some problems, it has democracy and a foundation for democracy that is moving in the right direction.

On the other hand, when coming into Nicaragua, I must admit I had some preconceived feelings in support of the President's peace proposal. I had one question in my mind as to whether or not the moneys we were talking about would have any impact on the Nicaraguan. I wanted to find out whether or not a lot of the innuendos I have heard and a lot of things published in the press were things of fact or fiction.

Let me say to you that there is no democracy in Nicaragua and certainly there is no peace. We had the opportunity to meet with the private press, La Presia, finding from the editor and also the owner that they have been closed down some 36 times as a result of censorship. What were some of those things that were being censored? The New York Times editorial in favor of the President's peace proposal. The editorial of the Washington Times in favor of the peace proposal.

What else was censored? The President's peace plan. And also censored was the Speaker's objections to that peace plan. What was very obvious to me and Congressman BURTON is that they did not want the people of Nicaragua to know anything about a peace proposal. That is one of the first things I was confronted with: A lack of freedom of the press.

I went to a radio station that has been in existence 26 years. A nondenominational radio station, religious in nature, having priests and pastors give sermons and also religious information. To find that they are in fact after that sermon is put on tape, to find that they have to be transcribed and given to the government for approval, again shows the censorship and the lack of sensitivity to those original concepts that many people fought for in that revolution.

So there is no question in my mind that there is no freedom of expression and there is no freedom of religion. We had an opportunity to talk with a civil rights organization independent of the government; independent of any government, they have five areas or five offices in Nicaragua. They have received over 100 complaints a month dealing with atrocities by the Sandinistan government.

The question was asked by Congressman BURTON: How many have been registered by the freedom fighters or against the freedom fighters? Eight. He clarified that: is it eight a month? No; it was eight since 1982.

We talk about free enterprise. We had an opportunity to talk to a cotton grower, a coffee grower, a bottling company, and also Texaco refinery. We said, "Is there free enterprise there?" We have heard it. He said let me tell you what free enterprise means to the Communists. One, they tell me who I hire. They tell me how much to pay; they tell me what I grow; they tell me who I sell it to; and they tell me how much. That went right down the wire, every single one of those.

We had one opportunity to talk to an official of the Nicaraguan Sandinista government. Asked if he was a Communist, he said, "What is a Communist? What is in a name? A Communist, a socialist, a capitalist?" We went down every one of those violations I just mentioned and he admitted every single one of them, and he blamed it on the war.

This bill is very important. It is going to send the right message to the right people. It deserves your support.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. I thank the very able chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee for the excellent work he is doing here and on other measures.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to be clear that we are not simply talking about messages here. We are talking about killing people. We are talking about appropriation today American tax dollars to help people kill each other in Nicaragua. Sadly, there are times in this world when it is necessary for us to do that. We are not pacificists here, very many of us, and we cannot afford to be.

We ought to be very reluctant to commit our tax dollars to situations in which we subsidize people to kill each other. There has been a lot of talk about atrocities, and people on the left have talked about the atrocities of the Contras and people on the right have talked about the atrocities of the Sandinistas. I am inclined to believe that both sides are guilty of them, because when men go to war, they do not just kill each other; they inevitably, with the best will in the world, with modern weapons, will kill innocents. In some cases, the best will in the world is not there and I think that is ture on both sides here.

We are not talking now about whether we like the Sandinistas or not. Since when was it a rule that if we decline to spend American tax dollars to finance civil war in a country that meant we were supporters of the country. That meant that we somehow endorsed their form of government.

Let us point out again that this administration is about the best friend in the world today of the racist government of South Africa. I would like to change that policy, but I do not know anyone in this House who is advocating that we take $40 or $50 million, the equivalent of the 14 with this population, and finance armed revolt in South Africa. Let us not present that there is any great sense in this House that because of an absence of democracy in Nicaragua we are so outraged that we will finance for that reason an attack on it. Not when we have in the White House and the State Department and the Defense Department South Africa's best friends. A government far more repressive in the treatment of the overwhelming black majority than the Nicaraguans have ever been.

Let us not present that the Chilean Government, which is more repressive and less involved in civil liberties, is going to see us finance an attack. The issue is not whether or not we are trying to force a democracy; that has not been a major goal with this administration, and if it was, it is not by force of arms. I do not think people want seriously to advocate that America becomes the international 911 of the Civil Liberties Union. They are censoring a newspaper, which they are and which I regret and which I criticize; send down an American hit squad. They indicted an archbishop in South Africa, are we going to send out another American hit squad? We only have a right to commit American tax dollars to subsidize warfare when our national security is at risk.

I do not believe that the world's greatest superpower is threatened by this poor and disorganized and badly governed country. There has been in this House a consensus from 1981 on, if they are threatening their neighbors, funds could easily be voted for interdiction. There is no dispute; if Nicaragua were to threaten Costa Rica, I think there would be overwhelming support in this House on both sides to say we will step in and prevent that.

But we are being told that it is simply that we cannot tolerate the presence of this Marxist-Leninist regime. The President is, of course justly proud of the great relations he has forged with the People's Republic of China, and I think they are making some strides there, but let us not confuse Deng Xiaoping with the head of the Chamber of Commerce. Let us not lull oursevles into thinking that somehow the mainland Chinese have abandoned Marxism-Leninism because we have chosen for strategic reasons to be their friends.

We are being asked to subsidize warfare, the killing of people, with American tax dollars, because why? The only argument could be that they threaten our security. I do believe that Nicaragua under certain circumstances could be a threat to its neighbors and I regret that they have, unfortunately, been willing to act as a threat in some ways, although exacerbated somewhat by us.

It is a little hard to be making war on people and then criticize them for having a big armed service. We do not, in my judgment, face that kind of threat. We do not face the kind of threat to our security that justifies this kind of revolution.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would submit to the gentleman that the Killing Fields that occurred in Cambodia was a direct result of the U.S. Government, particularly the Congress, taking the stance that the gentleman has advocated just now and that is to say there is no direct threat to the United States and, therefore, we are not going to get involved in a civil dispute.

Would the gentleman say in retrospect that we should not have helped the resistance against the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia?

Mr. FRANK. I would say to the gentleman I was not in Congress right then, that by our involvement in Southeast Asia and in bringing the war into Cambodia when it had not been, we contributed more to the killing. The analogy simply fails.

If we vote for this $14 million, and this is just the down payment on hundreds of millions more to come in this administration, the cost, by the way, if you believe the only justification for making war down there, which is what you are asking us to do, when you send people down to shoot other people, that is called war, and let us not kid people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this additional time.

Mr. Chairman, if we really believe that our security is at stake, then we have to believe the plan the Reagan administration has been talking about of sending down American troops, because no one thinks the Contras can win. No one thinks at this level they are going to win.

So I would say to the gentleman that I think there were mistakes made in Southeast Asia, but a greater mistake will be made today in terms of what we can control if we continue to subsidize war and killing. The notion, the fig leaf, that we are concerned because of the lack of democracy, yes, I am very critical of the lack of democracy in Nicaragua, but I am more critical——

Mr. HUNTER. Is the gentleman telling me that the killing of 3 million people in Southeast Asia was right?

Mr. FRANK. I have not yielded, and I would ask for regular order, Mr. Chairman. I do remember the last time I asked my friend to yield, and he did not.

I have to say that it seems to me not quite legitimate, intellectually or morally, for people who have been as supportive of South Africa and the Philippines and Chile and South Korea to claim that they have democracy as a justification for killing in this instance.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me, and I thank him particularly for yielding so I can respond to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, let me just say that I think U.S. policy with regard to interference in other countries has been basically a policy of abandonment. In fact, we encouraged the freedom fighers in Cuba. We abandoned them in the Bay of Pigs. We encouraged the resistance in Cambodia. We abandoned them.

I do not think any gentleman, even the gentleman from Massachusetts, would contend in retrospect that allowing the genocide to take place, the Killing Fields that took place because of America abandoning the resistance in Cambodia, reflected an appropriate action by the U.S. Congress.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I will yield to the gentleman when I finish. I will give the gentleman a chance to comment or ask a question.

We encouraged our friends in South Vietnam, and we abandoned them. So I would contend that what is being advocated today is really a policy of abandonment, and let me just say to my friends who have naively said what we really need are ideas, we need economic approaches, we need political approaches.

There is nobody in the world who would contend that when Golda Meir was in trouble, when it looked like Israel was possibly headed for destruction, that instead of C5 aircraft that had M-60's that rolled out of those C5's to save Israel, we should have somehow sent a program of ideas and an economic campaign. Most Members of this House would have said that is baloney, and I can tell you today that nobody can cite a case in which an American campaign of ideas or an American economic campaign has stood up to Soviet tanks.

I will make one fast statement and yield to my friend.

It is a fact, regardless of how you construe the Contras or the Sandinistas, that in fact they are building military establishments that can be used by Soviet aircraft. In Grenada, the President showed a picture of a field that was being built, and he said this thing is going to be used by Cuban and Soviet aircraft. A great many Members said that is baloney, the President is hyping this thing again.

When we captured the 26,000 pounds of documents in Grenada, we got a document of a central committee meeting, a secret central committee meeting in which the recorder of the meeting said it has been decided the airfield will be used by the Cuban and Soviet military, and I think that is a pretty close quote.

Let us face it. No matter how you figure the Contras, no matter how you figure the Sandinistas, you have to concur and presume, everybody, liberals and conservatives, the Soviets are going to use the military equipment they are making this huge, multimillion-dollar investment in. We are giving them, whether you like the Sandinistas or not, or whether you think they are going to become more liberal or not, we are giving the Soviet Union military bases in Central America. If you can accept that, then that should be your argument that it is not worth it to go in and try to do something about it. If you cannot accept it, then we should do something about it, but let us not kid ourselves about campaigns of ideas overcoming Soviet tanks.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I did not talk about campaigns of ideas and it would not seem to me a useful one at this particular time. My point is, and I appreciate that the gentleman from California is not pretending that democracy internally has anything to do with it, I appreciate his honesty. What he is saying is that we should be afraid because there will be some Soviet weaponry in Nicaragua. The Soviets have had Cuba as an ally for 25 years. That has caused some problems in Africa and I regret the way they have governed, but they have not threatened directly the security of the United States and no one that I know of is suggesting that if the Nicaraguan Government begins to threaten its neighbors that we ought to stay our hand, but that is not the policy the gentleman is defending.

The Reagan policy is four points, and one of them he says is until they agree to have free speech and free elections, we are going to make war on them. If the gentleman wants to talk simply in strategic terms, let us get a policy that deals with it and talk about it. That is not the policy. We are not being asked to send $14 million as a downpayment on hundreds of millions more, to have more killing, simply because of bases. The inevitable part of the policy as they advocate it is to include this facade of democracy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, let me just answer my friend that I remember a few years ago people were saying Cuba poses no threat to the United States and we can always do something if the Soviet Union puts weapons in Cuba. They did put weapons in Cuba. It was called the Cuban missile crisis, and the world was brought to the brink of nuclear war.

So the idea that somehow we can hold on and watch these massive airbases going into Nicaragua, and somehow we can say that is OK, if they bring Blackjack bombers in, if they bring Backfires in, if they bring missiles in, then we can do something about it, is to pay very little attention to the lesson that was taught to the Kennedy administration in 1962.

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARKEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Just for the record, in 1962 President Kennedy, in an agreement with the Cuban Government, got a concession that would agree that there would be no offensive missiles, no offensive weapons that would be based in Cuba.

Mr. HUNTER. I take my time back.

Mr. MARKEY. For the past 23 years there have been no offensive weapons in Cuba.

Mr. HUNTER. Would the gentleman say that that was a dangerous time for America?

Mr. MARKEY. And without question, it was resolved on the part of both parties.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

Mr. TORRES. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like today to associate myself with those colleagues who have stood here in the well and opposed this resolution. I do not do this lightly, but I do it because I have studied and experienced the situation not just in a period of 4 weeks or 4 days or a month, but I have been a student of Central America and I have been a worker and I have traveled the hemisphere for over 30 years looking at the situation as a trade unionist, as a diplomat, as a Member of Congress.

I believe the President's policy for Central America is an incorrect one. I believe his policy for Nicaragua is an incorrect one. It is flawed because I believe that our foreign policy for Central America is one at this time that advocates a military solution to what should be a diplomatic solution, one that we could resolve by simple diplomatic means, as I just heard my two colleagues before me articulate as to how President Kennedy was able to get the Soviet Union to keep its missiles away from Cuba, and for 22 years we have seen that situation prevail.

Last April I had the occasion to travel to South America, and Central America, visiting the major Contadora countries of that region, Venezuela, Colombia, Mexico, and Panama, and I was encouraged by the statements by the chiefs of state of those nations in the kind of work they were trying to bring about for peace in the region through the Contadora process.

□ 1600

But each and every time they expressed to me the frustration they experienced at each step of peaceful conclusions that our foreign policy seemed to thwart those efforts.

Subsequent, to my trip to the Contadora nations, I did travel to Nicaragua in the company of congressional colleagues. We did meet with the opposition parties in Nicaragua. We met with trade unionists, we met with the Prensa newspaper, we met with Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats, and we listened to their grievances and problems that they said they were beset with under the Sandinista regime. We took those grievances and we took those complaints directly to Commandante Ortega, and we questioned him, and we said in no soft terms—we did not mince any words—we said, "Is it true you are doing this and that? Are you oppressing the people? Are you oppressing the press? Are you preventing trade unionists from carrying out their democratic prerogatives"?

To some of those queries he gave us some acceptable answers. Some answers were that the very Contras that they are opposing, as we have heard today, were former members of the Somozista government, that now that they were outside of office, now that they were on the outside, they wanted to impose their will upon the Nicaraguan people, and since this was a revolution, the revolutionary government was not going to let them come back in and take over where they left off.

Ortega was also concerned about our own actions, our own mining of Nicaraguan harbors, our own overhead reconnaissance flights, our own instructional manual for assassination attempts, and they were concerned about those very Contras he talked about, those representatives from the former terrorist regime.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TORRES. I will yield when I have finished my statement.

They were concerned with the kind of killing these people were perpetrating upon the peaceful people of Nicaragua, the peasants, the coffee growers, the businessmen. And yes, I think that all of us in this Chamber are dismayed by the kind of violence that prevails on both sides. It is a plague on both Houses. But I am dismayed to know that, as my colleague pointed out earlier, this Government, our House of Representatives, would perpetuate that violence through this resolution by killing with taxpayer dollars the people of Nicaragua.

Look at today's copy of this news journal "Newsweek" and see for yourself the kind of violence that American taxpayers dollars now perpetuate in Nicaragua. We should be dismayed by this kind of dispicable situation. It is true that I do not agree and my colleagues do not agree with all aspects of the Sandinista regime, but military intervention is not the answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this extra time.

Mr. Chairman, I implore upon my colleagues here today, after having heard the debate on both sides, that we must choose a direction that does not—does not, I repeat—move us in the direction of killing more of these people. As my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], has just stated, we are perpetrating killing in this hemisphere, and I believe it is wrong.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the only solution to deal with this problem is to accept and adopt the Barnes-Hamilton substitute language that will be before us tomorrow.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TORRES. I yield to my colleague, the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, I really am very impressed with the gentleman's statement, and I know he is a statesman and a diplomat and knows the language. He has been to those places, and I want to join him in his statement. I say to the gentleman, you are very profound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNS].

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that I agree with the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] that we need to make certain that no additional money goes for this purpose, recognizing the fact that the United States should not be involved in intervening in the internal affairs of another country. I think on that note alone that we should vote this down.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to House Resolution 239, which would provide $14 million in military assistance to the Contra forces fighting against the government and people of Nicaragua.

The administration's war against Nicaragua has become the centerpiece of its Central America policy. The administration's cavalier attitude toward legal restrictions which should govern its actions toward Nicaragua exemplifies its approach to the law with respect to Central America in general. Support for the Contras, whose aim is to undermine and potentially overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, violates both international law and treaties. Moreover, one must ask how we can fund an armed insurgency against a country with whom we have diplomatic relations?

Too little has been said about the terrorist activities of the Contras. There are well-documented reports of kidnapings, torture, and rape of both Nicaraguan citizens and foreigners in the Atlantic coast area. The brutality of the Contras is described in two recent reports "Violations of the Laws of War by Both Sides in Nicaragua 1981-85," by Americas Watch, and "What We Have Seen and Heard: The Effect of Contra Attacks Against Nicaragua" by the witness for peace project. Both reports indicate that human rights abuses by the Nicaraguan Government are far less severe than actions by the Contras. As the witness for peace project indicates "to equate the Contras to our Founding Fathers as President Reagan has done, does violence both to our history and to the reality being lived by the Nicaraguan people; while some discontent with the Sandinista Government does exist, the methods used by the Contras only convince the people that the Contras are carrying on the brutal tradition of Somoza's former national guard. The United States is pouring millions of dollars into a group that will never become a viable democratic alternative to the Sandinistas."

I urge my colleagues to reject this $14 million appropriation which will only lead to more killings and suffering for the Nicaraguan people. We would all do well to remember the words of John Quincy Adams on July 4th in 1821, when he said:

> The true American goes not abroad in search of monsters to destroy. . . . (America) well knows that by once enlisting under other banners than her own, were they even the banners of foreign independence, she would involve herself, beyond the power of extrication, in all wars of interest and intrigue, of individual avarice, envy, and ambition. She might become the dictatress of the world: She would no longer be the ruler of her own spirit.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for yielding.

I was over in my office and heard some of the spirited debate, and I just want to comment on what I can only characterize as hypocrisy in talking about our making war, subsidizing war in Nicaragua.

At least three times this House has voted and the Democrats overwhelmingly have defeated our effort to have the funding of the Contras on a reciprocal basis. If the Nicaraguan Sandinistas would stop exporting revolution to El Salvador, we would stop funding the Contras. And they voted no. They said, no, they would not accept that as a basis for the funding. So obviously the fact that they are exporting revolution does not bother them.

Then I heard praise for the settlement by President Kennedy in Cuba, saying that negotiation is the way to go. There was a naval blockage as I recall. Let me say that Cuba has 2,800 Soviet combat troops over there, 2,800 Soviet military advisers, 2,100 Soviet technicians at their Lourdes electronic intelligence facility, 950-plus tanks, 250 Mig-21's and 23's, and 3 submarines. That is some solution.

Now, if you look at Punta Huete, the airfield that has just been built in Nicaragua, that is not for Piper Cubs or tourism; that is for long-distance reconnaissance planes, and the Soviets fly those up the east coast out of Cuba, and now they can fly them up the west coast out of Nicaragua.

So it is very serious, but some Members just do not take communism and the penetration in our hemisphere seriously enough. I do not know what it takes to get them awake.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his observation.

I would like to ask the gentleman a question, too. Perhaps he can answer it for me.

It was mentioned during the debate that this was a United States war in Nicaragua. It seems to me that the Contras were not created by the United States, but they were in fact created by the totalitarian Sandinistas in Nicaragua. They abandoned the revolution. It was hijacked in 1979. They said they were for pluralism, they said they were for democracy, and they said they were for free speech and freedom of the press, and, therefore, because of their subjugation of their own people, they created the Contra movement; is that correct?

Mr. HYDE. Well, of course. They have definitely followed a time schedule.

We were sending them money as fast as we could, and they were in Cuba consolidating the guerrilla groups in El Salvador. We wanted to send our Peace Corps down, our lovely, dewy-eyed, pink-cheeked Peace Corps, to help those people. They did not want the Peace Corps. They wanted Cuban technicians in there, and Bulgarians, East Germans, and PLO. Then they started building the biggest military machine in Central America while we were still here dumfounded and sending them the money. That is what happened. The revolution was betrayed.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much, and he is absolutely correct.

As well as the Cubans and East Germans and Bulgarians and, as the gentleman mentioned, the PLO, the Soviets are sending about 7,000 barrels of oil a day to Nicaragua. And the Libyans are sending materials. In fact, the Libyans are the greatest supplier of war materiel at the present time in Nicaragua.

Very often we can tell a countries' plans and which direction they are headed and what their policy is going to be not only by what they say, not only by the policies they adopt and what they do, but by who their friends are. We look at Iran that is helping Nicaragua, we look at the Communist-bloc countries and their involvement there, and we see the fact that Mu'ammar Qadhafi is sending aircraft to Nicaragua. He has sent about $140 million of military aid. He has sent surface-to-air missiles, SA-7's, and he has sent a large variety of helicopters. That is Mu'ammar Qadhafi. For those people who forget, he is the gentleman who runs Libya and does not believe that the Israelis have a right to exist.

The PLO is now involved in Nicaragua, for those people who forget about the PLO, we cannot forget Yasser Arafat. He is the person who specializes in affirmative action in the marketplaces of Israel.

□ 1610

You can go on and talk in terms of the East Germans. They are there as well. So you can tell what is happening to a country not only by what they say, not only by what they do, but also who are their friends, who they associate with.

I, too, was in Central America, in Nicaragua.

I remember talking to an individual who owned a shop. He had a daughter that was about 7 years of age, 6 or 7 years of age, I am not sure.

And he said, "Congressman, do you realize what is going on in the educational system in Nicaragua?"

And I said, "Well, I'm not positive."

He said, "Let me show you."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional 5 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

He gave me a textbook that his daughter was using in grammar school. I looked at it and thumbed through the pages. I happened to Xerox a couple of the pages from the textbook and I would like to hold both of them up for you for your perusal and edification. One, as you can see, this little goody here, this is what they are teaching young Nicaraguan students, young boys and girls, that is how you add in the totalitarian Communist Marxist Leninist Nicaragua. Two plus two machineguns plus two hand grenades is six. Three hand grenades plus three hand grenades, that equals six. Two times three, that equals six as far as hand grenades is concerned. Also the same thing with regard to submachineguns and people in uniform.

Everybody should recognize precisely what is happening in Nicaragua today. It is a Communist regime that is gathering its momentum, that is consolidating, that is, in fact, if not today will be a security threat to this country.

I also want to mention the fact that in the other body there was some testimony earlier this week, it has not really been mentioned during the debate we have had so far on Nicaragua. The testimony is very interesting by Commissioner of Customs of the United States before the Senate Subcommittee on Children, Family and Drugs, by William Von Robb. William Von Robb says the following:

> Tomas Borge—Tomas Borge is the Interior Minister in Nicaragua—reportedly allows Colombia drug traffickers to use Corn Island as a trans-shipment point for drugs bound for the United States and he was arranging Cuban assistance for this operation.

The testimony goes on, and I will just conclude here by saying on page 9 of his testimony:

> United States Customs Service recently concluded an investigation which in my opinion proves the involvement of certain Sandinista officials in narcotics trafficking.

Also the testimony of John Keeney, and we did not have the opportunity to listen to his testimony on the House side. He indicates the fact that during his investigation on international drug smuggling, the investigation dealt with the large variety of transactions, none of which really caused undue attention. They were rather routine, according to him.

"The exception will, I believe" he said, "be of interest to you." He was testifying to the other body.

> This transaction involved an apparent attempt by representatives of the government of Nicaragua, with the assistance of Robert Vesco, "we all know Robert Vesco," to establish a cocaine distribution network which would operate both in Europe and the United States; but the evidence gathered during this investigation suggests that during 1983 the Nicaraguan government personnel attempted to make all the arrangements necessary to establish Nicaragua as a major cocaine exporter in the world.

I will conclude by citing toward the end of his statement:

> During the course of the investigation of these events, a great deal of evidence has been amassed which confirms the involvement of Nicaraguans in cocaine trafficking in the world.

That is another instance, another idea, another glimpse as to what is happening.

Now, the reason they are involved in cocaine trafficking is not the fact that they particularly enjoy cocaine. It is the fact that they are getting hard currency in order to support their revolution. They are willing to have Americans, to have Europeans, to have Central Americans, fall into the evil influence of narcotics in order to support their revolution.

Everybody knows that our Declaration of Independence talks about "inalienable rights." They are rights that cannot be given away. They cannot be taken away because they are given by God. They are for everybody. To deny those rights to those people who are seeking freedom in Central America really is to deny our own Constitution.

Freedom in Nicaragua is really our freedom. You cannot look around the world and say, we have freedom and you do not. It is too bad. There is mutuality and universality in freedom. If we fail in Nicaragua, where are we going to possibly succeed? If freedom is not worth defending in Nicaragua, where is it going to be worth defending?

Our friends and our enemies are waiting for that answer.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY].

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I am adamantly opposed to the President's request for $14 million in aid to the Contras.

If one picture, Mr. Chairman, is worth a thousand words, then the four pictures that appeared in Newsweek magazine yesterday are worth hours of our days' debate. In these graphic photographs, we see a prisoner forced to dig his own grave. We see the expression on his face as his throat is cut. Then we watch as he is casually buried deep in the jungle. This is what we are talking about today, Mr. Chairman.

There is no excuse any longer for the bland persistence in comparing these executioners to the Founding Fathers, but we have to admit there is also no excuse whatsoever for offering American military aid to them. Our support would further legitimize the Contras. It would justify the citizens of Nicaragua in believing that their well-being and their very lives are of no concern to the Government of the United States, and it would ease the task of the Sandinistas of rallying popular support against a brutal foe backed by a government.

I believe that our real interest in Central America, and I think a lot of us believe that, is the development of a democratic government; but all the money and all the power of the United States will not let a democracy grow in the scorched soil of a battlefield. Military aid to the Contras is in the worst interests of the United States and I urge my colleagues to oppose it. It is another step down the trail that will end in a war of our own military forces. American can do better, Mr. Chairman, and I believe we can.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative of a democratic nation, I must deplore the moral bankruptcy of a policy that demands the terrorizing of a civilian population in the name of freedom and anticommunism. Indeed, the President of the United States is not asking me, a member of the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, to support the good intentions of an anti-Communist cause. He is not asking me to support a lasting plan for peace in Central America. He is not even asking me to assess the strengths and weaknesses of the ruling regime in Nicaragua. Instead, he is requesting that I support a policy which calls for the violent overthrow of a government with which we are at peace. As one who believes that with power also comes responsibility, and as someone who believes that the administration has not levelled with us about the strength of its anti-Communist commitment in the Western Hemisphere, I must oppose Mr. Reagan's plan to assist the Nicaraguan Contras.

"Freedom fighters" is the term President Reagan uses to describe the CIA-funded Contra forces fighting in Nicaragua. Referring to them as "our brothers," the President recently said that financial aid to the Contras "is totally consistent with our Nation's history." With this unique interpretation of U.S. history, he continues to urge the Amerian people to fund, equip, and train these fighters. These are the same men who focus on human targets, seeking out doctors, teachers, and agriculture workers for torture and assassination; the same men who focus on economic targets, even when military targets are present in an area, the same men who kidnap and brutalize peasant workers. And perhaps, more significantly to U.S. foreign policymakers, these are the same men whom Adm. Stansfield Turner, former CIA director, admits can never win a war.

The long-term political liabilities of supporting and encouraging these terrorists sadden me. Without question, the Sandinistas have commited their fair share of crimes against humanity. I am equally as saddened over the prospects of Managua exporting its revolution to peaceflul neighbors. Nevertheless, I believe that our Government has certain alternatives to the Contras approach. Let us encourage the Contadora peace process, while at the same time pursue every avenue of peaceful negotiation with Managua. We owe it to ourselves, and to the people of the region, to stimulate a truly peaceful resolution of the Central American problem.

If we are to embark on a dramatic anti-Communist crusade, let us assault the Soviet Union or China. The administration has exaggerated the alleged threat of Nicaragua to the United States, noting the existence of mythical arsenals of incredible destructive power. Let us reason and negotiate again. The end result can be only hemispheric cooperation, and an adherence to our own democratic principles of nonintervention and fair play.

□ 1620

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 17 minutes to the esteemed chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution (H.J. Res. 239), a joint resolution to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

The issue before Congress is not whether we like the Sandinista government. Most of us have serious problems with that government and its policies. The question before us is: How can we best achieve our common goals of peace, internal reconciliation in Nicaragua, and democracy in the region.

I oppose House Joint Resolution 239 for several reasons:

1. THIS POLICY SHOULD BE REJECTED BECAUSE THERE ARE BETTER ALTERNATIVES TO ACHIEVE OUR OBJECTIVES WHICH SHOULD BE PURSUED FIRST BEFORE ANY RESORT TO THE APPLICATION OF MILITARY FORCE

The President's statement of the problem we confront in Nicaragua is to either fund the Contras or accept an expansive communism in Central America. He suggests that those of us who oppose the funds for the Contras really favor the spread of communism. May I respectfully suggest that the question that divides us is not whether to oppose communism in that area, but how best to do it.

Let me try to state the elements of a better alternative.

In brief, I believe we can move toward a negotiated solution which will protect the American national interest through the application of a vigorous, consistent, and tough diplomacy, conducted with the advice and support of our friends in the area, and backed up by a willingness to apply maximum economic pressure. If Nicaragua tries to destabilize the region, our strategy should include political, diplomatic, and economic sanctions, which should be used before military options, such as covert actions, are used.

First, the United States clearly does have legitimate security interests in Nicaragua. These interests include:

Prohibition of Soviet bases; reduction, if not the elimination, of Cuban and Soviet influence; removal of foreign troops; and cessation of efforts to promote revolution.

Second, if the threat is as great as the President says, let us deal with it openly and straightforwardly—not by a nonsecret, secret war, or an overt-covert war.

Third, I favor a tought diplomacy. We should act to put international law on our side. We should take our evidence and our case to the OAS, to the Contadora nations, and to the UN.

Our diplomacy should make clear that we can live with a Sandinista government that stops threatening U.S. national interests and moves toward an open political system.

Our diplomacy and our policy should reflect our values and traditions. Mining harbors, rejecting the jurisdiction of the World Court, preparing manuals which suggest approval of assassination, and financing others to fight to protect our national security interests is not the preferred way for the United States to act.

Our diplomacy must recognize the centrality of a regional effort.

Regional security mechanisms, regional organizations, and other Latin American states can be mobilized to bring heavy pressure on the Managua government. Legal, overt containment of Nicaragua is possible with the support of the states in the region through the Contadora process and the OAS.

The Sandinista government took a more flexible stand in 1983, when it agreed to multilateral negotiations through the Contadora process. The pressure to do so was not from the Contras but from Mexico and Cuba. Castro urged the Sandinistas not to become isolated, and that the refusal to negotiate multilaterally was isolating them from the region. Hence, their change in position;

The U.S. commitment to resist communism in Central America must be consistent with the goals of other countries in the region. Those states support the Contadora process, and do not support military intervention in Nicaragua. If the United States does not support and give high priority to the Contadora process, the United States is jeopardizing the single process mostlikely to bring peace to the region and to form a bulwark against Communist infiltration;

Today the United States is the single largest trading partner with Nicaragua. We buy almost 20 percent of their total exports.

Fourth, I favor an aggressive use of U.S. economic power.

Our policy in the region will be strengthened as we give high priority not to fighting a war, but to strengthening the economic and political development of the nations of the area;

Our ability to resist communism in the region will hinge not on covert activity, but on our ability and the ability of governments in the region to address the basic problems of social and economic development and participation in the political process;

If regional pressures fail, the United States has several economic and diplomatic measures available to it to isolate Nicaragua, should this prove necessary. We should be prepared to cut trade and investment to Nicaragua and to employ economic sanctions, and to urge our allies to do the same.

These measures include:

Denying Nicaragua World Bank, IMF, and private bank loans. Nicaragua's substantial arrearages can help us get allied cooperation in this regard;

Stopping Nicaraguan airlines from flying to the United States;

Denying visas to Nicaraguan citizens;

Imposing a partial or full economic embargo on trade with Nicaragua in conjunction with our allies;

Breaking diplomatic relations with Nicaragua; and Strengthening the military and intelligence capabilities of the states in the region.

We all know that there are tough non-military steps we could take against Nicaragua that have not been taken.

Fifth, I do not reject the military option.

If diplomatic, political and economic pressures on the Sandinista government do not work, United States, as opposed to Contra, military action is likely to have a far greater impact on the Sandinista government.

I do not support such military action at this time, but I remember that the Sandinistas were and are deeply concerned, even panicky, about U.S. intervention. If a demonstration of strength is needed, military maneuvers and U.S. seapower are likely to have more of an impact than the covert war.

I recognize that the military option in defense of U.S. interests is sometimes required. I do not claim the United States should never use that option. I say at this point in time we should try harder to resolve the conflicts in the area through political, diplomatic, and economic means. If those means fail, and if the Government of Nicaragua threatens U.S. national interests in the area and it becomes necessary to exercise the military option, let us do so openly, and not ask someone else to fight our battles for us.

2. THE ADMINISTRATION'S PROPOSAL PUTS US ON THE PATH TOWARD MILITARY INTERVENTION

The President has elevated the struggle to change the Sandinista government through military force to one of the highest priorities of his administration. On February 21, President Reagan said that it was U.S. policy to seek to remove the Sandinista government unless it changed its goals and present structure and allowed the Contras into the government. He said "You can say we're trying to oust the Sandinistas by what we're saying."

On April 15, he said "to do nothing in Central America is to give the first Communist stronghold on the North American continent a green light to spread its poison through this free and increasingly democratic hemisphere."

The Secretary of State does not equivocate: Nicaragua is now behind the Iron Curtain.

But, General Paul Gorman, the retiring Commander of the U.S. Southern Command—and a supporter of aid to the Contras—stated in February 1985, that a Contra overthrow of the Sandinista government was not "feasible in the near future" even with U.S. financial assistance, and that such military pressure would take years to produce results. The CIA has consistently arrived at this same conclusion.

So, the President now wants to overthrow the Sandinistas; his top military commander says that the Contras cannot do it. The question, then, is how do you achieve the President's objective.

The President says Nicaragua is vital to U.S. interests and the Sandinistas are a threat to the United States. The U.S. military and the CIA say that what we are now doing will not succeed. The President insists on the removal of the Sandinista government. Clearly, the Sandinistas will not accept that they step aside. With that condition there really is no chance for diplomacy to work.

Thus, the conclusion follows that greater application of U.S. military force is the next option. A close examination of the President's own report confirms this.

The $14 million in the President's request is as a down payment on deeper U.S. military involvement. As reported in the press, the President anticipates the deployment of from 20,000 to 25,000 Contras in the north and 5,000 to 10,000 Contras in the south of Nicaragua—a total of 35,000 Contras. This new commitment is to enlarge the Contras to a force over twice its present size.

As reported in the press, the President's own report then states: "Direct application of U.S. military force * * * must realistically be recognized as an eventual option, given our stakes in the region, if other policy alternatives fail."

Make no mistake, the $14 million request is the next step on the slippery slope to further major U.S. intervention in Nicaragua.

3. THIS PROPOSAL REQUESTS MONEY FOR OBJECTIVES THAT ARE NOT CLEAR

Throughout the long involvement of the CIA in Nicaragua, we have seen tactics in search of an objective.

The United States simply has not been able to decide what it wants from the Sandinistas;

Since 1981, various purposes have been advanced for the covert action against Nicaragua;

First, the United States sought to interdict the flow of arms from Nicaragua to El Salvador;

Then, to force Nicaragua to turn inward;

Then, to bring Nicaragua to the negotiating table;

Then, to bring pluralism and free elections to Nicaragua;

Then, to oust the Sandinistas.

Today, U.S. policy statements on Nicaragua, especially those by the President, no longer emphasize the external conduct of Nicaragua but the removal of the Sandinistas. The President says we do not advocate the overthrow of the Sandinistas if they "would turn around and * * * say uncle." That phraseology is surely tantamount to requiring their removal.

But what does overthrow mean, and how do we propose to achieve this?

The administration wants to use the Contras to apply pressure on the Sandinistas, but that is a tactic—not an objective, not a policy.

Until recently, you could take your choice of administration policy.

Secretary Shultz wrote on February 6 that we do "not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there."

Fred Ikle, the Under Secretary of Defense, has said that our goal is military victory.

On April 15, the President said that "We will do everything we can to win this great struggle."

At the very least, these differing statements by the President and other administration officials suggest a lack of precision in defining U.S. policy goals, confusion about those objectives and a failure to articulate a clear policy objective.

4. THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL CONTINUES TO ALLOW THE CIA TO MANAGE THE WAR IN NICARAGUA—AND THE CLEAR RECORD OF THE PAST SEVERAL YEARS IS THAT THE CIA CANNOT CONTROL THIS OPERATION WITH PRECISION

The most spectacular and objectionable CIA excesses of the recent past include:

The mining of Nicaragua's harbors;

Air and maritime attacks on Nicaraguan ports and other installations; and

The publication of the CIA manual, which clearly sought an objective that the administration rejected.

The CIA and the United States have become tarred with Contra atrocities and other Contra human rights violations. These acts of misconduct are probably no better and no worse than the conduct of the Sandinistas. The difference is that the U.S. is financing the Contras.

Since we depend on the Contras to carry out our policies, we must also answer for their actions. Their objective to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua has not, throughout most of this operation, been our objective. In recent weeks the President has adopted their objective. The Contras have dictated American policy, at least as much as the United States has dictated their policy.

The United States has always supported the Contadora process, but this weekend Commander Bermudez said "We don't have to respect any Contadora process."

The President now proposes that the CIA have less control over the Contras than in the past. The CIA's role would be to provide money, arms, and intelligence to the Contras, but not involve itself in day-to-day operations, planning, or oversight. The result of the President's proposal will be even greater identification of the United States with Contra activities, but less U.S. control over them.

5. THIS PROPOSAL MAKES IT MORE DIFFICULT TO OBTAIN REGIONAL SUPPORT FOR UNITED STATES POLICIES AND FOR INITIATIVES TO BRING PEACE TO THE REGION

It is inconsistent for the United States both to support the Contadora process and to seek military support for the Contras. Support for the Contras flagrantly violates one of the Contadora's principles that seeks to guarantee "that the territory of one state is not used to conduct acts of aggression against the territory of another state." U.S. policy should make unmistakably clear its support of the Contadora process. Our friends in the area do not support U.S. military intervention in the area, whether direct or through surrogates;

President Betancur of Colombia reinforced this on April 16 when he said that he and other Latin American leaders: "Firmly believe that any foreign support to guerrilla groups, whatever the origin, is clearly in opposition to the prevailing doctrine in Latin America regarding foreign intervention in the internal affairs of our continent."

He also said of the President's plan that tying negotiations to aid for the rebels made it "no longer a peace proposal, but a preparation for war."

U.S. financial assistance to the Contras is a violation of U.S. treaty obligations under article 18 of the OAS Charter, which provides as follows: "No state or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State."

We should note the impact of any decision at this moment to increase military involvement. The Contadora peace negotiations for Central America are close to reaching full agreement, according to President Betancur and others. The United States should, without equivocation, support those negotiations. When we support renewed funding of the Contras for covert war, we undercut the Contadora process;

Because of its efforts to promote the covert war, the United States has also not been consistent in its support for negotiations with Nicaragua. Direct negotiations with Nicaragua should precede any resort to the military option. As the last few years would indicate, the two cannot be dovetailed successfully.

6. THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL CONTINUES A CIA POLICY WHICH HAS NOT WORKED

The Contras are simply not in a position to achieve the goals the United States seeks in Nicaragua. They cannot defeat the Sandinista forces.

The Contras have never been able to seize and hold territory in Nicaragua. They operate only in the mountains. They have never developed urban support. They haven't even been able to sustain operations in Nicaragua without supply from the outside. They depend heavily on their sanctuaries in Honduras and Costa Rica, without which they could not continue their fight.

They have never fared well in direct confrontation with Sandinista units of appreciable size.

Three years of U.S. support and $80 million in U.S. funding has not produced an insurgency capable of sustaining itself among the population of Nicaragua.

7. THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL CONTINUES A COUNTERPRODUCTIVE POLICY. THERE ARE BETTER WAYS TO CONTAIN COMMUNISM IN CENTRAL AMERICA INSTEAD OF THE COVERT WAR

The covert activity has provided the Sandinistas with a convenient external threat which they have used to justify a host of repressive measures against opposition parties, the press, the church, and the people of Nicaragua. They have used this external threat to justify a military buildup, an unpopular draft, and large scale reliance on Cuban, Soviet, and other Eastern block military allies;

The Sandinista government will have no incentive to moderate its position or its behavior internally or externally as long as a covert action continues which seeks its overthrow. No government willingly submits to such military pressure from a foreign source. The covert action only encourages more extreme positions by the Sandinistas;

Attempts by the United States to renew funding for paramilitary operations against the Sandinista government are undermining the consensus that is developing in this country and in this Congress over our policy toward Central America;

The successful ability of the U.S. Government to deny its involvement in covert operations has always been a criterion for their success. We can no longer deny our involvement in the Contra war. The United States has suffered from the propaganda burden of this covert war in Latin America generally, and in Europe and throughout the Third World. A willingness to defend U.S. legitimate national security interests by military actions is not displayed by this war, just as it was not displayed by the Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. Ineffective and counterproductive military action is interpreted throughout the world as a sign of weakness, not of strength.

8. THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL CONTINUES A POLICY WHICH AMERICAN PEOPLE DO NOT SUPPORT

By a margin of 70 to 18 percent, Americans oppose the policy of U.S. involvement in attempts to overthrow the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. This poll is based on a February 1985 Washington Post-ABC news poll and shows a higher level of opposition to the Contra war than recorded in any of the three previous surveys conducted over the last 18 months;

This poll reflects the deep fears of the American people that current policies are leading to U.S. intervention;

There is a growing consensus in the United States in favor of increased levels of economic and security assistance for friendly and democratic states in Central America at the same time there is growing opposition to the Contra war. U.S. policy should not let the Contra war dominate the U.S. agenda in the region. Rather, it should build on the impo:tant emerging consensus;

9. CONCLUSIONS

Mr. Chairman, we, as a nation, are surely capable of arriving at a policy toward this small, desparately poor Central American country, and addressing the threat that it represents to us, and our friends, without military intervention.

In my view, we have not tried as hard as we could to use other than military means to achieve regional peace and security.

The fundamental question is whether the United States can rise to the challenge of leading the countries of Central America toward peace and development. We cannot do that by promoting war.

We cannot expect to impose democracy by force. There is a better way to deal with our problems in Nicaragua than by fighting this nasty little war. We cannot make peace by making war; we cannot preserve peace by destroying it.

I urge you to oppose further military aid to the Contras.

□ 1640

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity with a great deal of personal concern over the direction of our Nation and what history will record our actions to be in these coming moments with regard to Nicaragua. Being from Florida and being raised in a situation where I saw firsthand a situation develop in Cuba that has come to be most difficult, one of the most if not the most difficult situations we deal with on a day-to-day basis in this hemisphere, having gone to high school with young men who went home to fight in Cuba, in that illfated Bay of Pigs mission, and have them come back and tell me the reports of what was going on in their country, and seeing the results, I cannot help but urge my colleagues to take a new look at this entire situation and, based on this thought: We Democrats should remember that it was a combined committee of Democrats and Republicans that approved covert aid in Nicaragua, and we approved it at a preliminary level and we approved it at a secondary level and we approved it at a tertiary level. Only until that level got to a point where there was concern did we recoil and say maybe we should reconsider. But why did we do it? Why? Because there was a major change, not just in this administration but in the previous administration, in what the Sandinistas were doing and what the tenets of their original revolution were.

Ortega had said publicly,

Costa Rica will be the jewel for our plucking, once we are in place.

Before this administration, as I recall, even came to power, the statement was made around the world that,

We, Nicaragua, will build the largest standing army ever to be seen in this Hemisphere outside of the United States.

These were concerns of Democrats and Republicans. These were concerns of Americans.

Now we do differ, and I do have concerns with some of the actions of the Contras and the politics that go back and forth, but I think we ought to understand that, had we not expressed some sensitivity, where would we be even today? Would there be any willingness on the part of Nicaragua to enter into minor agreements like they did today? Would there be any actions of reciprocity or willingness to deal with the Contadora group?

Recall that I sponsored the Mica amendment 3 years ago on this floor that lost by one vote that said, "Let's all stop, let's all stop at once," and our side, my side, did not agree with that approach at that time, that maybe we should not do anything.

There were 21 original tenets, and we agree with those—freedom of religion, freedom of the press, a pluralistic system for business, all of these tenets published around the world in documents in colleges and universities and in their own revolution that they would adhere to if they took over. And these were the concerns that Democrats and Republicans addressed when they said yes, we need to do something to swing that Sandinista revolution a little more back to its original cause. But not only did they not move back toward their original cause, not only have they not proceeded as quickly as we had hoped, they simply turned their backs and said that that was not the case at all.

Now, let me just say I did not intend to speak in this debate, because I spent many hours in the last debate last year. But I was reading last night a book that I bought secondhand that deals with the legislative history on diplomacy in the United States. It is an interesting book that kind of ends in the 1970's but goes back to the beginnings of this Nation and takes every major crisis that this country has faced and traces diplomatically what the Congress did to address it. And I flipped through, very late last night, the period 1935 to 1939. Believe me, my colleagues, when I tell you so much of what we are saying here today is so appropriate and so equal to what was said in that period: "Let's not get involved, the problem will go away." Our colleagues were talking about nonintervention policies, policies that in essence would look the other way, but the problem did not go away.

I know time is limited on this debate, but let me just say this: I am personally convinced that, regardless of your party affiliation, if we walk away in any major sense from this today, we will face the problem as Americans very directly very soon. First it will be Floridians and Texans and Californians, but eventually it will be all Americans and probably the outrage that we hear now with regard to this will be an outrage that we should have done something years ago.

So I say we may have to look for other approaches, support the Contadora group, but we do not walk away and leave Nicaraguans who are trying to change the destiny in their own country for surely what will be a situation that will draw us into have to send American personnel, which I oppose.

I would support this action and ask that we think about how we got here, how the Democrats and the Republicans on these committees in the House and the Senate originally agreed that we should indeed take some actions to stop what is going on with the Sandinista regime.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 239 and in support of the alternative resolution introduced by Mr. BARNES and Mr. HAMILTON. I also want to associate myself with the remarks made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee.

Let me say at the outset that I am more alarmed with our Central American policies and the divisive impact the debate on this policy is having in our country than I have been with any other issue since the Vietnam war. For those who deride and disregard any comparison between our country's involvement in Southeast Asia and current events in Central America, I ask that you look again. Look at the thousands of American citizens who participated in the march for peace over the weekend, the hundreds who were arrested in front of the White House protesting our Nation's actions in Central America, and all the people who stayed to visit with Members yesterday and share their sense of foreboding and distress at the direction of U.S. policy in the region. Does this not look a bit familiar?

Consider the rhetorical excesses we hear from our President, the distortions and the deceptions, the phony white papers, the same inclination to rely on military solutions when negotiated solutions can be the only lasting answer, the same inability to comprehend the indigenous causes of revolution and to respect the potency of nationalism as an independent political force, the same efforts to blame the critics rather than the flawed policy they criticize.

Very frankly, I have a keen sense of deja vu. I see an all-too-familiar pattern emerging, and I fear we are about to make the same mistakes we made in Vietnam. The fact is that there are important lessons to be learned from our experience in that war. While I do not blame those who would like to put Vietnam entirely behind us and close our consideration of that experience in the current debate, I think we need to recognize that there is absolute truth in the statement that those who refuse to learn from history are doomed to repeat it.

We learned in Vietnam that momentum can build behind a policy, no matter how misguided or flawed that policy may be. Mistakes and misjudgments become compounded as policymakers feel compelled to justify and rationalize their original decisions on the grounds of ever-changing objectives. The logic of any means justifying the ends yields a constant escalation of rhetoric and growing reliance on fabrication to support these failing policies.

My concern about the administration's Central American policy is not with its goals. None of us wants to see the countries of Central America become bases for the projection of Soviet or Cuban military power in our hemisphere. What is at issue, however, is the means by which the President is trying to achieve those goals.

It is perhaps the ultimate irony that this administration's policy which it designed and defends on the grounds that it is preventing the spread of communism in the region, is having precisely the opposite effect. We need to recognize that often what we perceive as strength is viewed by others as beligerence, and we thereby play directly into the hands of Soviet and Cuban propagandists.

I ask my colleagues to consider the disturbing pattern of deception and blatant disregard for congressional intent this administration has displayed in pursuing its agenda in Central America. I am sure that most Members will remember the Washington Post exposé of the fabrications contained in the first white paper released by Secretary of State Alexander Haig 4 years ago, purporting to link the unrest and violence in Central America exclusively to Cuban and Soviet activities in the region. This was followed by the shock of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees who thought that they had authorized a small effort to assist roughly 500 Contras in the interdiction of arms flowing from Nicaragua to El Salvador, and then discovered that the CIA had actually undertaken a far more massive effort to arm and support a combat force in excess of 12,000. Then Members of Congress had to uncover through onsite inspection what our military has undertaken in Honduras, and found to their surprise that the United States had engaged in the development of a permanent military presence in that country. Then came the series of alarming revelations concerning CIA operations including the mining of Nicaraguan harbors—an act so overtly illegal and indefensible that the administration refused to accept the jurisdiction of the World Court when Nicaragua took its complaint to that respected body.

Have we forgotten the horrifying CIA manual, a manual offering explicit instructions for "neutralizing" Sandinista officials and "creating martyrs" for this Contra cause? In the past few weeks we have seen the President fabricating support for his most recent proposal, suggesting, at least by implication, that Latin American statesmen and even the Pope are backing military aid to the Contras. I am sure that all of us read the communication from the Vatican clarifying the Pope's position on this issue, and the pointed observation of the President of Colombia, Mr. Betancur, that the President's proposal is "no longer a peace plan, but a preparation for war." Mr. Betancur went on to state, "I have not spoken with any Latin American leader who feels differently."

Mr. Chairman, this deception must end. The American people understand that the decisions that have been made by the President in formulating and pursuing his policy in Central America do violence to American principles and traditions, undermine American interests worldwide by alienating our closest friends and allies, and are directly counterproductive in terms of our goals within Central America. Moreover, there is a growing fear within the Congress and throughout the Nation that what we are witnessing is a very dangerous escalation of America's military involvement in Central America and an inexorable march toward war.

What is really startling is how little of our own history we comprehend. Our current intervention in Central America is not without precedent. Few Americans are fully cognizant of that history, but the fact is we have militarily intervened on several occasions in Nicaragua, in Guatemala, and elsewhere in the region.

Tragically, in each of these cases the net result of our intervention produced neither lasting peace nor greater democracy, but only served to align us with those seeking to maintain an unjust and repressive status quo. In fact, our intervention has usually made the situation worse, providing the Soviets and their allies the opportunity to turn the region's revolutionary ferment toward their own purposes. If instead of seeking to maintain the status guo in these countries, we were to use our power to channel the revoluntionary aspirations of Latin Americans toward the democratic goals that we espouse, our long-term interests would be far better served.

It is very troubling in this debate that there seems to be a tendency for each side to portray the other in stark terms—all good or all evil. Would we not be better served by open acknowledgment of the imperfections of all sides in the Nicaraguan conflict? One can be totally opposed to the current American efforts to oust the Sandinista government without condoning all that the Sandinistas have done. The fact of the matter is that the Sandinists have yet to fulfill the democratic promise that was at the core of their revolution. Press freedoms continue to be violated. There are clearly inhibitions placed on political expression. However, this does not mean that American support for the Contras makes sense or is any way justified. It does mean that nothing whatever is gained when Sandinista excesses are excused away or when we turn a blind eye to abuses of civil liberties in that country.

Likewise, while there are clearly a number of individuals aligned with the Contra forces who have joined or are supporting those efforts because of democratic motives and their sense of betrayal by the Sandinistas, it is a travesty to characterize all of the Contras, as has the President, as valiant patriots akin to the Founding Fathers of our great Nation. That is an insult to our own heritage and a gross misrepresentation that none of us should tolerate.

The fact is that the vast majority of those in command of the Contra military forces are former members of Somoza's despised National Guard. Estimates indicate that some 46 of the 48 positions in the Contra military command structure are in fact held by former Guardsmen. Are these the moral and visionary men President Reagan equates with our George Washington and Thomas Jefferson?

It is widely acknowledged that many others in the Contra forces are there as mercenaries, or soldiers of fortune, lured by the promise of CIA funds. Are we really to believe that the President would place these men alongside the likes of James Madison?

Mr. Chairman, let each of us cast our vote today to say no more deception, no more distortions, no more lies.

In Central America, as around the world, we must begin to understand that when we assume that people are unable to make their own political choices, we reduce them to mere pawns in our struggle with the Soviet Union and create the very distance and alienation we seek to prevent. We do ourselves and these countries a great disservice when we underestimate the power of nationalism and the desire for independence from all outside domination and interference. This failure in our foreign policy has created disaster time and time again in our history.

There is a better way. We must begin today to recognize that if we are to prevent the spread of communism in this region, then we must demonstrate by concrete actions our respect for national sovereignty, and our superior ability to help solve the region's economic, political, and social problems within a democratic framework. For these are political, not military problems and they require political, not military solutions.

In the end, America's greatest strength is our own revolutionary heritage, and our proud tradition of support for the right of all people to be free and self-determining. It is time for America to reclaim its heritage by ending for once and for all our military intervention in Central America. I urge my colleagues to oppose this effort to release an additional $14 million for the Contras and support instead a redirection of our policy in Central America that will make use of the significant economic and political power at our disposal, and will work in concert with the Contadora nations to produce a lasting, negotiated settlement for this troubled region.

I urge my colleagues to support the proposals offered by Congressmen BARNES and HAMILTON. These proposals would provide true humanitarian assistance to real refugees, not to combatants. This would be assured by having the aid channeled through the International Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Moreover, these proposals provide direct support for the Contadora process by setting aside $4 million to implement any regional peace agreement that may be reached as a result of the Contadora initiatives.

There has been a lot of discussion today about the signals we will send in these upcoming votes. Let us vote in support of the Barnes-Hamilton proposals, and say clearly and loudly that the United States is a nation that respects international law. That we are a people who are committed to political and economic solutions to the problems in Central America. This is an approach which makes sense, this is a policy that can work.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLPE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard the statement made repeatedly that there are more Somozistas in the military command of the FDN, the democratic resistance, and I just would tell you that according to the resource paper put out by the State Department to the press and to everybody, that among the military command, former Sandinistas are 43 percent; former national guardsmen 32 percent; and Campesinos 19 percent.

Of the 56 regional and task force commanders in the FDN, 27 were former Sandinistas; 13 were National Guardsmen, none above the rank of lieutenant; and 12 were farmers. So it just is not so. There are more ex-Somozistas with the Sandinista government and there are more ex-Sandinistas with the democratic resistance.

□ 1700

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time to respond to the gentleman, the point that I think needs to be understood is that former Somozistas are numbered among the highest ranks of Contra command structure. It is simply improbable, to say the least, that such leaders could command credibility among the Nicaraguan population.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLPE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, if I might just conclude that thought. The fact of the matter is, when we lend our own credibility and support to individuals at the command level who are so closely identified with the former dictator Somoza, it is simply politically foolish. It is counterproductive and it plays into the hands of the more radical elements of the Sandinista population.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLPE. I would be pleased to yield now to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is absolutely correct when he refers to the military leadership. I do want to make a point that there is a political leadership within the Contra that has assumed military relationship, military umbrella, Mr. Calero and Mr. Cruz and many others that I would like to respectfully say are, I think, positive forces. They are moderate.

But I think the quote the gentleman made about the make up of the State Department is essentially correct, but so is my colleague who claimed that the leader of the military was.

Mr. WOLPE. I thank the gentleman from New Mexico for his contribution. I was very careful to note in the body of my own statement that the Contras are diverse elements. The military command structure is very clearly identified with the former dictator Somoza. That clearly, I think, is counterproductive in terms of American interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that the time remaining for the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] is 1 hour and 52 minutes, and the time remaining for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is 2 hours and 14 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of criticism about the U.S. role in Central America. I find that remarkable particularly in view of the successes that we have enjoyed in El Salvador over the last 6 years, what with the free elections and the new President, the constituent assembly, and the constitution the Salvadorans now enjoy.

But most particularly, I grieve over the fact that the United States has been blamed for all the ills in Central America when, in fact, it has recently been conceded by even the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] that because of the proximity of Central America; because of the fact that we in Washington are closer to Managua than we are to Los Angeles; because of the importance of the sealanes in the Pacific and in the Caribbean and the Gulf of Mexico, where 50 percent of all our commerce in this Nation flows; because of the potential of immigration into the United States as an outflow from Communist domination, just as the Vietnamese fled from Vietnam when the Communists took over; and because the potential entrenchment of a Marxist regime on our southern border will possibly lead us to deploy troops away from Western Europe into the southern regions.

All of these are substantial reasons to understand why Central America is important to us, and that what happens down there is vital to our future.

But I think that it is more important to understand that we tried the diplomatic process as was espoused by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON]. We tried to get along with the Sandinista government after they overthrew Somoza. In fact, there was a great deal of assistance that flowed from this country to the Sandinista government in its early stages based on its promises of a pluralistic government, based on their promises of freedom of assembly, church, religion, and so forth. We even came up with $118 million in U.S. taxpayer funds in direct bilateral aid, and we helped procure $1.6 billion in multilateral aid from world banks to get them on their feet, to start them on their way toward the democracy that they had promised the world and their people.

But then as time went on, things began to sour; things began to change. We started to realize that there were things that were happening in Nicaragua that did not really conform to their promises that they had made for an open and free society. We discovered that there was oppression, and suppression of religion; that when even the Pope went down to Nicaragua a couple of years ago, he was heckled, and organized mobs disrupted his appearance, and intimidated representatives and leaders of the Catholic Church with greater and greater frequency.

We saw that the one Jewish synagogue in Nicaragua was closed down, seized again by the divine mobs, and expropriated, and that the Jewish families were run out of Nicaragua. The fundamentalist ministers were intimidated, oppressed, harassed, and actually tortured in some instances. I, personally, spoke with a fellow who had his ears cut off. Another fellow I spoke to was thrown in jail and had his fingernails pulled out.

We noticed that the Sandinistas began to imprison people without cause. They have a prison called El Chipote right in the heart of Managua that is off limits to the press, of course. It is a subterranean prison, and it is alleged by numerous people who have been inside it that it is used for torture and oppression of Nicaraguan citizens.

We saw that the Sandinistas started forced labor camps and began to impress the citizens or the peasantry in the hinterlands of Nicaragua into working in these prisons camps for low pay or no pay at all.

We saw that they started Communist indoctrination schools for the children. And they started arming and training terrorists who began to export revolution to the neighbors.

Just recently, in fact as of April 11th through the 14th of this year, a few days ago, seven Nicaraguan agents were captured inside Honduras and admitted that they were smuggling weapons and assisting recruitment and training of Communist guerrillas in Honduras at the instance of the Nicaraguan Government.

We saw that the Nicaraguan Sandinistan government had built the largest army in Central America, with Soviet tanks numbering as many as 300, and Soviet helicopters and armored personnel carriers and rocket launchers, and are threatening to bring in Mig aircraft.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we saw that they were building an air base in Punta Huete which was bigger than most U.S. bases and capable of handling any Soviet aircraft that flies.

We saw that they began to control supplies and prices and all the markets in the country, that they ran off the entrepreneurs, they seized the businesses, expropriated private property, forcing people out of the country or forcing them to sell their businesses and property at arbitrarily low prices.

They begin to take in representatives of the Soviet bloc, including Soviets, Cubans, East Germans, Bulgarians, North Koreans, Vietnamese, Palestinian Liberation Organization people as well as Qadhafi's Libyans.

They seized and closed the only synagogue in Nicaragua, as I mentioned, and they began a universal draft and forced young boys of 15 of age and older into the army, and armed and equipped the largest armed force in Nicaragua, arming as many as 40,000 armed troops and 70,000 reserves. They took in over $500 million in Soviet aid and built the most lethal force in Central America. They continue to aver the force is for defense only against the United States, yet Managua has continually served as a base of operations for terrorist movements and other guerrilla activities aimed at their neighbors.

Under their rule, the Nicaraguan economy has deteriorated horribly. Per capita income has declined by half of what it was before they took over. There are shortages everywhere. There are lines for essentials. The supplies are provided by the Eastern bloc, like Bulgarian and Soviet canned goods.

□ 1710

The last thing they need, of course, is a revolutionary force to undermine their hold and their grip on the people of Nicaragua.

But, Mr. Chairman, they are buying time. The Sandinistas of Nicaragua want the United States out. There are many in this body and many in this country who have said that we should get out, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if we give them time, they will lock their grip, they will entrench themselves, and we will have another Cuba on our southern borders. If that happens, we will make a great mistake.

The people who espouse that we get out of Nicaragua have said that we should have gotten out of El Salvador 5 years ago, and they were wrong when they said we should have gotten out of El Salvador, and they are wrong about Nicaragua. They said we should not participate in and encourage the free elections, and they were wrong then, and they are wrong now. We held on; we kept up economic support for the Salvadorans; we got the first election in March of 1982 when a constituent assembly was elected; we got a constitution drafted by that constituent assembly; and as a result subsequent elections have been held freely, fairly, and openly, a President now governs the democracy of El Salvador. We were right then, and we're right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, El Salvador is not without its problems, but it is trying to struggle, to pull itself up by its bootstraps and come into the 20th century and join the club of the Western civilized nations as one that can govern itself and govern its people freely and openly. But the Nicaraguan Government does not want to join that club. The Nicaraguan Government wants to repress its people, entrench itself, and spread its ideological revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I hope and I pray that we will not let them do that. I urge this body to support the Contra revolutionary freedom fighters, to restore freedom and democracy to Nicaragua, and to ultimately make sure that we do not have to send our young men, our young American soldiers, into that region because it is not necessary. The $14 million will help to guarantee that it never becomes necessary.

Mr. Chairman, it is the Sandinistas who are rejecting negotiations and peace in Nicaragua. Recently declassified intelligence makes that crystal clear. Between April 11 and 14, 1985—note that date—seven Nicaraguan agents were captured inside Honduras. They admitted that they were smuggling weapons and assisting with recruitment and training of Communist guerrillas in Honduras. The leader of the seven, Reymundo Muñoz Diaz—an agent of the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security—also admitted to three trips beginning in November 1984 when they smuggled AK-47 rifles, M-16 rifles, and handguns for guerrillas in Honduras, who seek the overthrow of that Government.

In short, even as we debate here today, the Sandinistas are talking peace but making war.

These recently declassified documents—and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks—touch on several other points raised by the other side in today's debate: First, the church, and second, whether it is our action that is driving the Sandinistas to do the terrible things they do. The answer, of course, is that we are not causing the Sandinistas to be repressive and violent—they have been committed Marxists from the earliest days of their revolution of 1979.

The proof in the declassified intelligence:

First, July and August 1979, Chief of Prisons Federico Lopez ordered execution of 300 former National Guardsmen. Today Lopez sits in the Sandinista Assembly.

Second, 1979, behind the Santiago Masaya volcano, about 75 former National Guard members were executed—fair game for FSLN activists.

Third, 1980, the FSLN made a political decision—which they carried out—to assassinate private sector leader Jorge Salazar. This was a warning to citizens not to dissent against the government. Even the Cubans tried to talk the Sandinistas out of it, but Tomas Borge and Humberto Ortega—current Sandinista leaders—gave the go ahead to Juan Jose Ubeda of the secret police, and Salazar was murdered by Ubeda personally.

Fourth, the secret police, that is, the Department of the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security, has conducted intensive and extensive operations to diminish the effectiveness of the traditional Catholic Church in Nicaragua. Including:

In 1980, funneling money through the secret police to buy influence of a parish priest; and Recruiting people to serve as agents of influence within the church.

I hope my colleagues will review this declassified intelligence material, which I will have at the desk. It shows that while we gave foreign aid to the Sandinistas in 1979 and 1980, and while our colleagues on the other side of the aisle call for nonintervention today, the Sandinistas were and are bent on crushing liberty inside and outside Nicaragua's borders.

SUBJECT: CAPTURE OF SEVEN NICARAGUAN STATE SECURITY AGENTS IN HONDURAS

Text: 1. Seven Nicaraguan support agents for the Honduran Cinchonero guerrilla organization were captured between 11 and 14 April 1985 in southeastern El Pasaiso Department, Honduras. According to reports obtained by the Honduran Security Service, the seven acknowledged that their mission was to smuggle weapons from Nicaragua to Cinchonero groups in Olancho Department, Honduras, and to assist with recruitment and training of Cinchonero guerrilla units in Honduras.

2. According to preliminary information available to the Honduran Security Service. One of the seven. Reymundo (Munoz) Diaz. Described himself as an agent of the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security (DGSE). And coordinator of the group of DGSE agents supporting Cinchonero guerrilla units in Honduras. Mundz said that in three trips beginning in November 1984. He and several of his accomplices smuggled six AK-47 rifles, 24 M-16 rifles, several hand guns, 30 uniforms, boots, medicine, and money to the area of Quebrada Arenas Blancas (142 1N-8551W). On the Patuca River in Olancho Department, Honduras. The weapons were transported by mule from Wamblan (1347N-8540W). Nicaragua, hidden in gunny sacks of corn, while the agents passed themselves off as purchasers of grain. In Arenas Blancas, the arms were delivered to Carlos Alberto (Monge). A Honduran national. Who subsequently passed them on to Cinchonero guerrilla units in formation in the area of Las Planchas (possibly (1502N-8639W). Olancho Department.

3. According to the reports available to the Honduran Service, the seven support agents and other accomplices had as a secondary mission the collection of information on locations and dispositions of troops of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FND) in southeastern El Paraiso Department. The reports also indicated that the Cinchonero guerrilla groups which the Nicaraguan State Security agents were supporting have as one of their missions attacking FDN troops concentrations in Honduras. In addition to attacking Honduran targets.

SUBJECT: SANDINISTA HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

Text: Since 1979, various human rights abuses have been committed in Nicaragua by officials of the Sandinista National Liberation Front [FSLN] and members of the Sandinista Popular Army [EPS]. They include the following:

A. During July and August of 1979, Federico [Lopez], then chief of prisons, ordered the executions of about 300 former national guardsmen with the justification that they were the "ears" of Anastasio [Somoza] in Nicaragua. [Source comment: It is believed that Lopez personally carried out many of these killings. Lopez is currently the FSLN's delegate to region IV and represents the fourth region IV in the Sandinista assembly.]

B. Behind the Santiago Masaya Volcano, about 75 former national guard members were executed in 1979 shortly after the overthrow of Somoza. [Source comment: Former national guardsmen were considered fair game by many FSLN activists, and many of them were indiscriminately killed immediately after the fall of Somoza.]

C. In the fall of 1981, an EPS helicopter was attacked by Indian insurgents as it attempted to land in a Miskito village in eastern Nicaragua near the Honduran border. [Source comment: The village may have been Leimus.] Several EPS soldiers were killed and the pilot was wounded. The pilot continued flying the helicopter and got beyond the reach of the hostile fire. Later, EPS soldiers returned to the village and slaughtered about 45 unarmed boys and men of all ages in retaliation for the helicopter incident.

D. In 1983, the Chief of the Ministry of Interior's Special Moises Ticay Troops in the region IV, First Lt. Victor [Romero], murdered several persons that he suspected of being counterrevolutionaries. [Source comment: Romero was drunk at the time of the murders.] The persons killed were Juan [Obando], Chief of the Nicaraguan Energy Institute [INE] electrical plant in San Miguelito, and a woman leader of the charismatic church and her husband. The victims had their throats slit and were robbed after being killed. Romero and two other persons were tried, convicted and sentenced to serve 17 years for this crime. After serving eight months, however, they were freed by Vice Minister of Interior Luis ((Carrion)), who had been Romero's superior during the revolution. (Source comment: The church leader was survived by three minor children. This incident created a scandal, although it was censored in the local news.)

E. An uprising occurred at Modelo Prison in late 1983, and five persons escaped. Sandinista news accounts said that all five had been killed while trying to escape. At least two of the escaped prisoners, however, were captured alive and beaten in Granada before being taken to Managua. (Source comment: Apparently, the Sandinistas killed the prisoners after recapturing them.)

F. In late 1983 or early 1984, about 30 to 50 commandos of the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE) were captured near the Costa Rican border during an operation run by the General Directorate of State Security (DGSE). All of them were later executed by security personnel. Gerardo ((Arce)), brother of FSLN National Directorate Member Bayardo ((Arce)), was at the time the DGSE chief in region IV, and he was in charge of the operation. Some of the captured ARDE personnel were sent to Managua where they were killed. Others were killed in region IV, and their bodies were scattered over a wide area to make it appear that they had been killed in a pitched battle with the EPS. The DGSE blew up some electrical towers in the area to make it appear that the ARDE personnel had been involved in acts of sabotage. Gerardo Arce ordered the execution of the prisoners in order to make himself appear to be a cold-blooded individual who was capable of killing.

G. In the northern part of Nicaragua it is common for the EPS to kill prisoners suspected of being counterrevolutionaries.

H. In the DGSE's prison, El Chipote, there are five or six special underground cells where prisoners who are marked for execution are taken. The only individual who has keys to these cells is the chief of the DGSE's Department of Operations.

SUBJECT: OPERATIONS OF THE NICARAGUAN GENERAL DIRECTORATE OF STATE SECURITY ((DGSE)) AGAINST THE TRADITIONAL NICARAGUAN CHURCH

Summary: The Department of the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security (DGSE) has conducted intensive and extensive operations to diminish the effectiveness of the traditional church in Nicaragua. These operations have included recruitments of persons to serve as agents of influence within the church to denigrate religious figures before the Nicaraguan people. Attempted control of the San Jeronimo Religious Festival and an intensive and multifaceted operation against Nicaraguan Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo.

Text: 1. The Department of the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security (DGSE) known by the designation "Department for the struggle against ideological diversionism," is responsible for operations to diminish the effectiveness of organizations considered to be hostile to the Sandinista revolution. These include religious groups and personnel, labor unions, journalists, civic organizations and educational institutions. The section is headed by Eva Maria ((Sanking)) Chang, Known by the DGSE pseudonym "Catalina."

2. The operations against the traditional church in Nicaragua have been intensive and extensive. Aspects of the operations have included recruitments of persons to serve as agents of influence within the church and covert action operations designed to denigrate religious figures before the Nicaraguan people. A specific example of this type of operation is the DGSE attention to the San Jeronimo section of Masaya where the important San Jeronimo Religious Festival is held every year during September and October. At one point during the early 1980's, the DGSE funneled U.S. $5,000 to San Jeronimo parish priest. Father Anastasio ((Garcia)), to buy chapel bells from Italy. The gift was ostensibly from the Ministry of Interior and was intended to cause the priest to adopt a favorable attitude toward the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN). The DGSE also has given other gifts to priests, such as video cassette recorders, to try to obtain their cooperation.

3. An additional element of DGSE's operation in San Jeronimo has been its effort to control physically the annual festival to ensure that it is not used for political purposes against the FSLN.

SUBJECT: ASSASSINATION OF NICARAGUAN BUSINESSMAN JORGE SALAZAR BY THE GENERAL DIRECTORATE OF STATE SECURITY ((DGSE)) ON ORDERS FROM THE SANDINISTA NATIONAL LIBERATION FRONT ((FSLN)) WHICH WAS OPPOSED BY THE CUBAN GOVERNMENT

Summary: In the fall of 1980, the National Directorate of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) made a political decision to assassinate private sector leader Jorge Salazar. Salazar had become one of the most outspoken critics of the FSLN within the private sector. And his murder was intended to serve as a warning that such dissent would not be tolerated. The chief of the Cuban counterintelligence advisory mission unsuccessfully attempted to dissuade the Sandinistas from taking this course of action, and the assignment to kill Salazar was given to Juan Jose Ubeda, Deputy Chief of the General Directorate of State Security (DGSE).

Text: 1. In the fall of 1980, the National Directorate of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) made a political decision to assassinate private sector leader Jorge ((Salazar)). Salazar had become an outspoken critic of the FSLN within the private sector and had been attending meetings with other anti-Sandinista businessmen. These meetings took place in the home of Dora Maria ((Lau)), former consul of Nicaragua in Japan under the government of Anastasio ((Somoza)). (Source comment: Lau was popular with Nicaraguan businessmen because she was a very cultured woman. She enjoyed giving parties, to which she invited private sector leaders. The anti-Sandinista meetings grew out of these parties.) Lau attempted to recruit her nephew, Nestor ((Moncada)) Lau, for the private sector cause, not knowing that he was an assistant to Lenin ((Cerna)), Chief of the General Directorate of State Security (DGSE). (Source comment: Because Moncada always wore a military uniform, Lau assumed that he was a member of the Sandinista Popular Army (EPS).) She told him about the meetings and asked him to seek out members of the EPS who were opposed to the Sandinistas regime and would work with the business leaders. Moncada reported the information to Cerna, who in turn reported it to the FSLN National Directorate.

2. The Directorate decided to send two agents posing as disaffected EPS members with Moncada to the meetings with Salazar and the business leaders. These agents were comandante Alvard ((Baltodano)) Cantarero, then Chief of Combat Preparation for the EPS, and EPS Captain Alejandro ((Guevara)). Baltodano is currently a member of the EPS general staff. He is the son of Cabinet Minister Emilio ((Baltodano)) Pallais. Guevara is currently the representative of the EPS in special zone three. Guevara was replaced during the operation by EPS Captain Salvador ((Bravo)). Because Guevara made a bad impression on private sector leaders due to his low intellectual level and limited education, Bravo committed suicide about two years ago. He was the brother of Sandinista hero, Jorge Sinforoso ((Bravo)). Moncada was in charge of coordinating the operation and reported directly to Cerna, but Baltodano, Guevara, and Bravo also filed their own reports. The DGSE agents told Salazar and the businessmen that a plan was being prepared within the EPS to overthrow the Sandinista Government. The DGSE then drew up the purported plan for the agents to present to the businessmen, who offered to financially back the plot.

3. On 17 November 1980, after the DGSE had accumulated information on the anti-Sandinista activities of Salazar and the businessmen, a high-level meeting was held among FSLN national directorate members and DGSE leaders. Those present at the meeting included: Minister of Interior Thomas ((Borge)); Vice Minister of Interior Luis ((Carrion)); Chief of the DGSE Cerna; Deputy Chief of the DGSE Juan Jose ((Ureda)); Minister of Defense Humberto ((Ortega)); Chief of Department of Operations Raul ((Cordon)); DGSE Deputy Chief of Security Roger ((Mayorga)); Chief of the Cuban counterintelligence advisory mission Carlos ((Lingote)); and other national directorate members. (Source comment: Cordon is now chief of the penitentiary system within the Ministry of Interior and Mayorga is the DGSE representative in the first region. Carlos Lingote is probably a pseudonym, as all Cuban advisors use pseudonyms.) During the meeting, Ortega stated that a political decision has been made by the directorate to assassinate Salazar as an example to other private sector leaders that such dissent at high levels within the private section would not be tolerated. (Source comment: Although the DGSE presented an analysis of the case to kill Salazar at the meeting, it was obvious from Ortega's comments that the decision had already been made.) After Ortega's statement, Lingote told the Sandinista leadership that he viewed their decision as a mistake. He said that it would be a grave error that would have political repercussions. Ortega declined to accept the Cuban's advice, saying again that the decision has been made. Lingote then left the meeting to consult with his superiors in Cuba. When he returned, he again tried unsuccessfully to dissuade the Sandinista leadership from enacting their plan to kill Salazar, saying that the Cuban Government did not approve of the plan.

4. At the 17 November meeting, Ubeda was put in charge of the operation to assassinate Salazar. He initially gave Cordon the assignment of eliminating the businessman. But Cordon protested, saying that he could not do it because he was a friend of Salazar's. Because of Cordon's reaction, Ubeda decided to take responsibility for the assassination himself.

5. On 18 November 1980, Moncada called Salazar, saying that he had important information and needed to talk to Salazar privately as soon as possible. Ubeda accompanied Moncada to the meeting site at El Crucero, on the outskirts of Managua, where the former hid himself. Moncada took a duffle bag of M-16 automatic rifles, which he was to plant in Salazar's car to make the latter appear guilty of possession of arms for use in a coup attempt. When Salazar arrived at the meeting site, Moncada placed the weapons in his car, and Salazar began to protest, saying that he could not carry such items in his possesion. Moncada then drew his weapon and fired shots into the air to give the impression to any witnesses within ear shot of the incident that a firefight had taken place betweeen the DGSE and Salazar. Ubeda came forward from his hiding place and shot Salazar. Moncada suffered a nervous breakdown as a result of this operation, and has had psychological problems ever since. He worked for the Department for "struggle against organizations and bands" for some time after the Salazar killing. But as a result of his problems, he has been unemployed since late 1984.

SUBJECT: SPECIAL COMMANDO UNIT OF THE NICARAGUAN GENERAL DIRECTORATE OF STATE SECURITY ((DGSE)) TRAINED BY CUBAN SPECIAL FORCES

Text: 1. Within the Nicaraguan General Directorate of State Security (DGSE). There is a special commando unit known as "multiple action groups" (GAM). The GAM were created for the purpose of penetrating task forces, camps, and the high command of the Nicaragua Democratic Force (FDN).

The Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE), and the Misurasata. (Source comment: The GAM have been in existence for about two years. Members of the GAM are known as "combat agents".) The specific missions of the GAM include assassinating anti-sandinista task force commanders and other insurgent leaders. Locating insurgent camps within and outside of Nicaragua. Creating Chads and disorganization within insurgent forces during Sandinista offensives, and collecting intelligence. GAM personnel work both individually and in groups.

In one GAM operation, which took place in about mid-1983, the GAM attempted to kill an insurgent task force commander. They did not succeed in assassinating the commander, but they did kill several members of his staff, as well as his wife.

2. GAM troops are trained by Cuban special troops in the area adjacent to the Santiago Masaya Volcano. Their training camp is located at the end of the access road to the House of Enrique ((Bolanos)) Gayer, President of the Superior Council of Private enterprise. The location, known as Reparto El Raizon, is at km 20 on the Masaya highway. The GAM receive paratroop and special troops infantry training, as well as training in the use of explosives, self-defense, locksmiths' techniques, communications, and ciphers. They also attend a course of the composition and armaments of U.S. troops at the squad, platoon, company, and battalion levels, and they study the offensive and defensive manuevers of U.S. forces.

3. The Chief of the GAM is First Lieutenant Arnoldo ((Garcia)). The GAM is organizationally part of the DGSE department known as "Periferia," which handles administration and planning. "Periferia" is under the direct authority of DGSE Chief Lenin ((Cerna)).

The freedom fighters are supported by the Nicaraguan people—note the following article in today's New York Times—and it is right for us to support them too.

NICARAGUAN REBELS APPEAR READY TO FIGHT ON EVEN IF AID IS CUT OFF

(By James LeMoyne)

SAN SALVADOR, April 22.—Despite serious political and military problems, guerrillas fighting the Nicaraguan Government have achieved a base of popular support, and their war is likely to continue whether or not Congress votes to give them assistance, according to Nicaraguan refugees, rebels and Western diplomats in the region.

Visits to rebel bases and Nicaraguan refugee camps in the last month indicate that the guerrillas are growing in number and that they have been able to pose a significant threat to the Sandinista Government. Their principal support seems to lie in northern Nicaragua, where the level of fighting and the number of exiles fleeing to Honduras appear to indicate that something close to civil war is being waged.

Two Salvadoran guerrilla officials who have spent considerable time in Nicaragua said in separate interviews that they believed the anti-Sandinista rebels were a serious problem. One of the Salvadorans has been involved in organizing the left for over 20 years.

The Salvadorans said they believed the rebels would wage a long war that would not lead to a military victory but would considerably weaken Nicaragua.

WAR WILL GO ON

"I have told the Nicaraguan comrades that they are in a situation like Mozambique with South Africa," one of the Salvadoran leftists said. "The war will go on, and with American economic pressure they can slowly be strangled."

The existence of a degree of popular support for the guerrillas has become clearer in recent months as the rebel forces have swelled, even though American financing has been cut off.

Accounts from Nicaraguan refugees and recent rebel recruits in Honduras gathered in the last month also indicate that the rebels have greater support than is generally realized, principally among the conservative farming communities across northern Nicaragua.

The clearest indication of the rebels' appeal, according to both guerrilla officials and Western diplomats in the region, is that the Sandinistas have felt compelled in the last two months to relocate more than 30,000 peasants sympathetic to the gurerrillas to camps in Government-controlled territory.

"The Sandinistas think Reagan created the rebels," said a Nicaraguan exile leader, Arturo Cruz, in an interview in Costa Rica. "They are wrong. The insurgency will continue because citizens of my country are in an armed fight."

Mr. Cruz, a former Nicaraguan Ambassador to Washington, has lobbied for aid to the rebels and called on the Nicaraguan Government to negotiate an end to the conflict.

MILITARY VICTORY SEEMS UNLIKELY

The guerrillas do not appear capable of militarily defeating the Sandinistas and, with their backers concentrated in the rural north, it seems unlikely that they can hope for the sort of broad insurrection that brought the Sandinistas to power in 1979.

What seems more likely is a prolonged, bitter fight in which each side counts on committed backers and Nicaragua remains polarized. The rebels seem capable of inflicting considerable damage on the Nicaraguan economy and of maintaining political pressure on the Government.

Rebel officials say they have made an effort in the last year to wage a small-unit guerrilla war, thereby avoiding heavy casualities. They do not, and probably cannot, control fixed positions inside Nicaragua, but say they are holding real-guard areas in Jinotega and Zelaya Provinces.

PEOPLE FLEEING ACROSS BORDER

A separate indication of the Nicaraguan Government's problem is the rapidly increasing flow of exiles fleeing across Nicaragua's borders to Honduras and Costa Rica. According to a United Nations official in Costa Rica, more than 1,000 Nicaraguan refugees have entered the country in the last two weeks, half as many as officially entered in all of 1984.

Many of the refugees are middle-class students who have fled the draft in Nicaragua and have no desire to fight for the rebels. But hundreds of others are peasants, many of whom can be seen training at the main rebel camp on the Honduran-Nicaraguan border.

The rebel group that appears to be growing stronger is the Nicaraguan Democratic Force. It is principally led by former members of the Nicaraguan National Guard, but its rank and file is a 14,000-man army composed mostly of peasants who express deep grievances against the Sandinista Government.

CRITICISMS OF REBEL SOLDIERS

Rebel soldiers, dozens of whom spoke in interviews with a reporter during a visit to their camp last month, offered a sharply competing and considerably more conservative vision of how Nicaragua should be ruled than the socialist program offered by the Sandinistas. The rebels criticized rationing, membership in the political militia, state control of crops and prices and Government friction with the Roman Catholic Church, all of which they attributed to the Sandinistas.

A measure of the seriousness with which the Nicaraguan Government takes the rebel threat is its expenditure of more than 40 percent of this year's budget on defense. The war dominates Nicaraguan politics and has badly dented the economy, according to Western diplomats in the region and several press reports from Managua.

A key issue that has divided rebel groups is the nature of their leadership, particularly the presence of former National Guard officers in the Nicaraguan Democratic Force. Human rights violations have also been a point of contention within the rebel movement.

Interviews with officials from all major rebel groups indicate that a majority believe that the movement needs new leadership. Mr. Cruz was the person most frequently mentioned as capable of uniting the rebels, but he has so far refused to take a leading role in the armed movement.

Although the rebels themselves say they have been badly hurt militarily by the cutoff in United States aid, Western diplomats who monitor the guerrillas say they still enjoy some advantages. The rebels are able to operate out of secure sanctuaries in Honduras, and they have a veteran combat force that fights on terrain that it knows well. One diplomat in Honduras said the rebels had not waged as wide a campaign of sabotage as they are capable of.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have tried to roll all of the forces in Nicaragua into one ball—all bad. They could not be further from the truth. People by the thousands are fleeing the repression of the Communist Sandinista government in Nicaragua, and young men are joining the freedom fighters while fleeing the military repression of the Communist Sandinista military.

My colleagues have said there is nothing to fear from Nicaragua. How about Cuba? How about if and when El Salvador falls? Will there be something to fear then? How about Honduras?

We will not see a direct frontal assault like we saw when Hitler was crossing the Rhine in World War II. What we are going to see are wars of liberation by Communist guerrillas, low-intensity warfare. When will we respond? When we are an island in a sea of Communist States?

One of my other colleagues said that we are driving the Communist Sandinistas into the arms of the Soviets, the Soviet bloc. How? We gave them $118 million when they first took power, and they turned immediately to the Soviet Union. We are not pushing them into the Soviet bloc; they are already there. Last year they received 18,000 tons of war materials from the Soviets.

When I was in Nicaragua 2 weeks ago, I talked to church leaders, business leaders, political leaders, and human rights advocates, and all of them, with the exception of the mouthpieces of the Sandinista government, said that if we withdraw support for the Contras, if there is no organized opposition to the Sandinista government, the Communists will solidify their position within that country, the repression will increase, and they will undoubtedly export revolution throughout Central America.

Not only are they working toward that now, but they are teaching the next-generation revolution. My colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey, talked about the educational text they are using, using handgrenades and machineguns to teach addition and multiplication. So they are not planning for just today but for tomorrow and revolution into the future.

We should look at what they have said in the past. We should look at the Communists, not only in Nicaragua but throughout the world, and we should listen to them. I think that is the biggest thing we have ignored today. We have not listened to what the Communists have had to say.

In 1916, Lenin said:

Socialists cannot be opposed to war without ceasing to be socialists. Only after we strike down, firmly conquer and expropriate the bourgeoisie in the entire world, and not only one country, will wars become impossible."

In 1955, Khrushchev said:

We must realize that we cannot coexist eternally * * * one of us must go to the grave. We do not want to go to grave. They do not want to go to their grave either. So what can be done? We must push them to their grave.

In 1958, Khrushchev said:

Our state renders aid to other countries because we communists, Marxist-Leninists, do not remain closed up within our frontiers. We consider the cause of building socialism and communism to be a great international affair and objective.

In 1971, Brezhnev said:

The complete triumph of the socialist cause all over the world is inevitable. And we shall not spare ourselves in the fight for this triumph, for the happiness of the working people!

In 1979, Andropov said:

Marxism-Leninism is the textbook for achieving socialist world revolution and the building of a new society in every country of the world.

In 1975: Castro said:

The revolutionary fighters of Cuba, true to the principle of international solidarity, facilitated the formation of armed forces and militias in a number of progressive countries, unhesitatingly and decisively supported peoples facing imperialist aggression. They have time and again shed their blood in other lands that have asked for their modest help.

And, of course, Castro said in 1958 that it was a lie that the Cuban Government was Communist-infiltrated. Then in 1961, 2 years later, he said: "I am a Marxist-Leninist and will be one until the day I die."

Then let us get to Nicaragua. In 1981, on August 25, Humberto Ortega said: "Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution, the instrument of analysis of our vanguard to understand the historical process and to create the revolution. Marxism-Leninism and Sandinismo are insolubly united, and because of our moral strength, our Sandinismo and our doctrine is that of Marxism-Leninism."

And then this is the most telling remark I have read. Tomas Borge in June of 1984 said: "This Revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist from the moment Sandino fought in La Segovia."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in 1983, Defense Minister Umberto Ortega said: "* * * the military buildup is not in response to an external threat but is in fulfillment of the historical mission of the Sandinista party."

And in 1983, while being interviewed, Mr. Borge was asked: "* * * will you respond to the * * * remark that Nicaragua is the first domino in Latin America? That since the revolution triumphed here, it will be exported to El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico?"

And Borge said, "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that's absolutely true."

Winston Churchill said 40 years ago, when talking of Hitler, that World War II was an unnecessary war because we could have prevented it if we had listened to Hitler. We can prevent American involvement in Central America with our boys being killed and maimed if we would just listen to what the Communists have to say. It is not Nicaragua that is the real danger to us; it is the failure of the United States of America to do something about Nicaragua that is the real danger.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution and in support of the Barnes-Hamilton alternative. U.S. foreign policy in Central America is out of control. It is costing the American taxpayers billions of dollars. There is no clear direction of U.S. foreign policy. Its failure is threatening the lives of brave Americans and innocent people in the region. And, finally, it is alienating hundreds of millions of people in Latin America.

No one in this body, to my knowledge, questions the importance of the political stability of the nations in Central America. No one in this body, to my knowledge, is not concerned about the association of the Sandinistas with Communists.

The question before us is, how do we deal with that association with communism?

□ 1720

Friend after friend from Latin America have told us that militarism is no answer. Expert after expert in our country have testified that militarism is not a solution in Central America.

President Alfonsin, a recent recipient of the Democracy Award, said that the problem in Central America is not military. The problem is economic, political and social.

Our friend, Belisario Betancur, President of Colombia, repeated that assessment, that the problem is not military. The problem is one of poverty, malnutrition, social injustice, political corruption and those terrible conditions causing ferment and discontent that explodes into revolution.

I think that the alternative presented by Mr. BARNES and Mr. HAMILTON gives the Contadora process an opportunity to address the real problems, an opportunity to succeed in advancing the principles upon which our own Government is based. This would give democratic capitalism in the region of Central America an opportunity to compete with Marxist Socialism ideologically.

We have seen time and time again throughout the 20th century where a paternalistic militaristic American policy in Latin America produces hatred, resentment and angry cries "Yankee go home." Only when we attempt to address the aspirations of the people of Latin America as we would address the aspirations of our own citizens in this country do we find good neighbors who join us in cooperation to achieve the principles taught by Simon Bolivar, a disciple of Washington and Jefferson. Bolivar was recognized as the liberator of Latin America from foreign domination.

A foreign policy which abandons the principles which our own Government advocates is destined to failure. We have abandoned our own principles times and time again in dealing with the nations of Central America. It is time that we began to learn from our own revolutionary history, to review our national principles and to follow the light that we offer as hope to other peoples around the world. I believe that democracy can compete ideologically with communism.

Since 1945, communism has demonstrated time and time again that it cannot compete with capitalism, beginning in 1948 with Tito and as recently as 1978 with the People's Republic of China.

Fidel Castro states openly that the United States-China model is his goal for future Cuban-United States relations.

It is time we Americans started reading our own book, started believing our own ideals, practicing what we preach, and adopt those ideals as a guide for U.S. policy in Central America.

Give democracy a chance. Give our ideals a chance. Give the people of Central America the opportunity to enjoy the same freedoms that we claim for ourselves.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.].

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I would imagine that everyone who has listened to all of the testimony and statements here the last few hours has already made up his mind as to what he intends and plans to do. I have myself. I intend to support the President in the position that he is taking today.

I do not question and I do not think anyone does, the motives or the integrity of anyone who has taken a stand at this place, and who has taken a position different from the way I feel. They are sincere, honest people, who are seeking what they think is for the best interests of our country. However, I would like to share with you for just a moment an occurrence that happened a few weeks ago when Congressman SONNY MONTGOMERY and I, and other members of his codel had an opportunity to visit seven countries, Panama, Venezuela, Honduras, Costa Rica, Belize, Ecuador, and El Salvador. We spent a week in those countries. I do not take the position that by going one time and visiting those people that I am an expert on Central America. I do not take that position, but I do want to share with you some information that was given to us that I think should be made a part of this RECORD. This information was presented to us in intelligence briefings. We were told that since Mr. Ortega has been in power that this is the first time that direct shipments have come to his country from the Soviet Union, that prior to his assuming power it came from circuitous routes for his use and benefit.

We were also told, and this to me is cogent to what we are discussing today, that foreign military advisers in Nicaragua today total 3,770. That these military advisers come from Cuba, Soviet Union, East Germany, Libya, the PLO organization, and North Korea.

Now, I pose this question to my friends. Why are those military advisers in that country? Would anyone take the position that they are there to protect our interests? Would anyone take the position that they are in that country to try to further democracy? Of course not. They are there, in my opinion, to try to do the same thing to that country that they have done to Cuba and that is to make it a satellite of the Soviet Union.

I live in east Texas and I know that some of the fighting there is closer to my hometown than my hometown is to Washington, DC. That in itself gives me great concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. I am concerned about not voting this $14 million aid for another reason. I would much rather see those people fight it out down there themselves than to ever have American troops go down into Central America and shed an ounce of blood.

I do not think you can compare it with the Vietnam matter because of the distance involved, if nothing else.

So I would state to my friends to consider why those 3,700 people are there and if you can convince me that they are there for the betterment of the United States of America and for the betterment of democracy and that they are doing things that would be better for my children and grandchildren, I will switch over this minute and lead the fight and vote with you. I do not believe you can show me that.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I want to specifically pick up on the arguments of an earlier speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas, who in a sense was asking what are these votes in Nicaragua really all about.

There are a number of ostrich Democrats who would have us believe that there is no danger from Nicaragua. Some even laugh at the idea.

There are ostrich Democrats who would have us believe there is no communism in Nicaragua.

The ostrich Democrats would have us believe, from an earlier speaker, that it is a "militaristic America" and Ronald Reagan who threatens peace in Central America.

The ostrich Democrats promise us that if only America pulls out, there will be peace.

The ostrich Democrats promise us that if America unilaterally quits, the Nicaraguan Communists will be reasonable.

We have heard the ostrich Democrats before in Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, Angola, Afghanistan, and Grenada.

Again and again ostrich Democrats promise peace through American weakness. Many human beings died, others were imprisoned, Communist tyrannies were imposed; the Soviet Union became stronger, the United States became weaker.

Have you seen the movie "The Killing Fields"? Cambodians died after ostrich Democrats in this Congress crippled America.

Here are the Grenada documents. Again and again ostrich Democrats promised us that Grenada was not Communist and the Soviet Union was not gaining an ally against the United States.

□ 1730

This book, these actual Communist documents prove beyond any reasonable doubt Leninism exists, the Soviet Union is real, America does have enemies.

Ostrich Democrats deny the lesson of Grenada. Again and again today the ostrich Democrats said there is no proof of Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan Communist efforts to undermine Nicaragua's neighbors.

Let me offer the physical proof of the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan Communist offensive in El Salvador and Honduras. Let me say in advance to my colleagues, these exhibits are all harmless but they have been harmful. These exhibits are authenticated captured weapons from El Salvador. They are on loan from the El Salvadoran Government to the U.S. Defense Department. They have been dismantled. They meet every kind of rule of safety.

This is the stock of an American weapon captured in Vietnam which the Communists captured in El Salvadora after it came from North Vietnam to Cuba to Nicaragua, and then to El Salvador.

This is a similar American weapon captured, we know because of the stock numbers. This was left in Vietnam after this Congress cut off aid to South Vietnam. It was then captured by the North Vietnamese, shipped to Cuba, transshipped to Nicaragua, and captured in El Salvador.

This is a particularly interesting little device because the same device, this is a rifle-propelled grenade, this particular device was the same lock number as was found in Grenada where we absolutely knew it was brought under contract from the Soviet Union to Cuba and then transshipped to Grenada. This was found in El Salvador.

This is a North Vietnamese 82 millimeter mortar sight modified to fit captured American equipment in Vietnam, shipped from North Vietnam, captured in El Salvador after it came through Nicaragua.

This is a Soviet grenade pin found near an electric utility generating station in El Salvador where it was left by the guerrillas after they blew up the station. It came through Nicaragua from the Soviet Union to El Salvador.

Finally, and I will not leave this here, this is a Bulgarian rifle round from the same factory number 10, shipped from Bulgaria to Cuba to Nicaragua, captured in El Salvador.

Now let me say to our friends across the aisle, I am going to leave these weapons sit here on exhibit, and I am going to leave a copy of the Grenada documents on exhibit.

As each ostrich Democrat denies the truth of Leninism and the Soviet military alliance against the United States, have them read Marshall Ogarkov in the Grenada papers.

As each ostrich Democrat denies that the Nicaraguan Communists are undermining their neighbors, have them come over and examine these weapons on exhibit. Remember that there are thousands more of captured weapons just like these that we do not have here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. If I have time.

President Kennedy said in his inaugural address, and I quote from an earlier donkey Democrat: "Let every nation know whether it wishes us well or ill that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, to assure the survival and success of liberty. This much we pledge and more."

Ostrich Democrats say, "We shall pay no price, we shall bear no burden, meet no hardship, support few friends to assure the survival of liberty."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank my colleague.

I wish to remind my colleague, I do not know if he has been here for the whole debate, but I am proud to say that I commend the minority for their bipartisanship in the course of the debate. I also commend my colleagues on the majority.

What the gentleman has just done is destroy this whole bipartisan exercise that I think by a weak media event. This is a responsible debate, and we are all Americans here, not "ostrich" Democrats or conservative Republicans. The gentleman from Georgia is debasing the quality of this debate. We all want to do what is best for this country, and we don't need a media weapons display to make our points.

Mr. GINGRICH. If I may take back my time——

Mr. RICHARDSON. By an act of demogoguery.

Mr. GINGRICH. I take back my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Which I regret very much.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the words of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON] be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words.

□ 1733

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me continue, if the gentleman will withdraw.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me talk about demagoguery for a second and why I talk about ostrich Democrats. This book is actual Communist document, this is not demagoguery. These weapons are actual Communist weapons shipped through Cuba to Nicaragua and El Salvador. That is not demagoguery. And it is your wing of the party which is killing freedom in Central America. It is not Republicans, it is not the decent Democrats. You are darned right, when your end of the party dominates this House, you set the rules, you bring up the resolutions, you cripple freedom, you weaken America, I will talk about ostrich Democrats. When you want to cease doing that I will be very bipartisan.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleagues for yielding. I have been most observant of the debate today because it probably is the most important debate that we will be engaging in anytime in the near future, because it has to do with whether or not we will recognize that we have brothers to the south of us who are looking to us for leadership. There is a lot said today about concern for human rights and outrage, and we have had a lot of that. We had a lot of outrage in the past against the U.S.S.R., the Soviets, for the slaughter that they engaged in in Poland, in Hungary, in Czechoslovakia, in Afghanistan, in Southeast Asia, the horn of Africa and central Africa. We have had outrage against the Soviet Union for the shooting down of innocent people, including a former colleague of ours, on flight 007 of the Korean Air Lines, well remembered.

We have had outrage at what has happened when Fidel Castro took power in Cuba, because we felt that there had been outrage committed and that he was going to repair that, but there was no comment made when he lined up thousands upon thousands of people against the wall and shot them simply because they opposed what he had done and had established a dictatorship there.

We have been outraged at what has happened during the Somoza/Sandinista fight in Cuba, when the Sandinistas, with our help, came to power and established a Communist government there, identified as such by themselves because the Sandinista Party was the Communist Party of Nicaragua before they did take power. We have done nothing to show respect for representative government, outrage—temporarily.

Let me just say that a recent poll taken indicated results from 50,000 people contacted, that 85 percent of the people across the Nation, 85 percent of the people were in favor of aid to the Contras in Nicaragua and in Honduras.

I will tell you that it must have outraged a lot of people, too, when we recognized that the Sandinistas came to power behind the barrel of a gun just as the Fidelistas under Fidel Castro came to power behind the barrel of a gun in Cuba. The freedom fighters who are called the Contras are the remnants of what was presumably set out to be done at the time the Somocistas were overthrown in Nicaragua, and that was to establish not a democracy, necessarily, but some kind of a government which would provide liberty and freedom and respect for the individual in Nicaragua. Regardless of what has been said here today, the information available to me is that the Contras are made up of about 2 percent, 2 percent of the remnants of the National Guard of Nicaragua and 42 percent are former Sandinistas, or people who helped the Sandinistas come to power. That is an established fact, at least according to the information that I have. Let me tell you, along with other colleagues who have indicated travel into that portion of the world during the Easter recess, I was privileged to accompany a codel to 7 countries in Latin America. And, as compared to a year ago, the people throughout the lands south of us have changed their attitudes a great deal. Previously they did respect the United States, they did look to us for leadership, but they would not confess to that or to outright friendship because it was not popular to be too friendly with the colossus of the North.

Today those people openly profess their friendship, openly ask for the leadership of the United States of America and openly state their horror of the terror that exists in Nicaragua because they know this will come to their lands if they do not get the leadership that we will be able to provide them and if we do not support the Contras.

This is the most important vote for them on Latin America that they are watching today. They are watching it much more closely than we are here in America, because it means if this vote is not taken in favor of the Contras, it means that we will once again, once again leave our friends at the last minute.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RUDD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman, my friend, from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STUMP. I yield an additional 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.
